Mr. GEO. R. SIMS' HAIR RENEWER.

Called by him "TATCHO."

(Romany: "GENUINE," "GOOD," "TRUE.")

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright, and journalist an eminent authority on hair restorer? Eager for an explanation, a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims. . . .

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation.

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. TWO LATITUDES.

PART I.—LATITUDE 51 DEG. NORTH.

"BUT, Ralph, do you think, after all, we are right to let him go?" asked Mrs. Warburton of her nephew, as she anxiously watched her son slowly getting into the dog-cart with the caution of a chronic invalid.

"Yes, yes. Of course, yes! It will do him all the good in the world on a morning like this! I'll take care of him, never fear. Ta-ta, auntie! Don't worry yourself about us, we shan't be long. Back sharp to lunch; and a good basket of trout with us!"

And with the last words Ralph Warburton sprang to the seat beside his cousin, gathered up the reins, and drove away from the door-steps, where his uncle and aunt, Hugh's parents, were standing.

Broadholme, the Warburton's place, had a good deal of ground about it. There was a fine beech wood, and a long reach of trout stream belonging to it; but somehow or another Ralph had taken a fancy to a little piece of the same stream three or four miles off. To him the Broadholme trout were as nothing compared to the Holmeside trout. When he went fishing, which was as many days in the week as he could contrive to get free, he always went after the Holmeside trout. He bragged all over the country of those trout, and the number of them he caught.

The present Broadholme residence was as charming a house as was to be found for miles around.

But a shadow lay upon the beautiful house. Hugh Warburton, the only child, the young man who had mounted the dog-cart so cautiously, was that shadow, as his robust cousin, who had not a parent left in this world, was just then the sunshine.

Mr. and Mrs. Warburton stood watching the trap as it rapidly passed through the long drive.

"Have we done right?" asked the mother. "Isn't there a touch of east still in the wind? Is his coat thick enough?"

"O, my dear, Ralph will take care of him. Do him good! Glad Ralph managed to get him out. Fine fellow, Ralph!" said the father, with a heartiness of speech he did not feel; for inwardly he was frightfully jealous of his nephew's health and strength. It seemed to him a wrong both to himself and his son. Why should Ralph be so well when Hugh—

The parents each knew what the other was feeling. With a heavy sigh they turned away, the one to her morning room, the other to his stables. It was sad how each had avoided looking at the other.

As for the two young men, they were soon bowling along the high road in fine style.

The roads were dry and dusty; damp, cold, and winter seemed to have fled away for ever. The light air was half-intoxicating. They left the trap in the village. Murray, the man, put it up at the Greyhound. They turned down by a little rustic bridge, and walked by the side of the Lutterbourn until

"O, here we are?" cried Ralph. "Here's the very sunniest nook on the whole stream. Blest if that bit of wall isn't quite hot!"

"Too much sun for fishing. You'll never get a bite in such water as that," said Hugh. "However, I'll have a cast and try, just for the fun of the thing."

"The water here always suits me, that's the beauty of it," said Ralph laughing. "Now, have you got all you want? All right then. I fish over that wall."

"What, among the apple blossom?" asked Hugh, looking up into his cousin's face, with his two luminous eyes, which always seemed unnaturally large, suddenly spreading as it were all over his face.

Ralph laughed, the colour rose up to the roots of his hair; he turned away whistling—he had a very true and musical whistle—a well-known air from "Patience": "Prithee, pretty maiden," etc., and he walked straight up to the wall, leant both his arms on the top of it, and looked about among the lichen-covered stems of the old apple trees in the orchard.

Now if Ralph Warburton meant the words "pretty maiden" to describe that object of his dreams who was at that very moment advancing towards him under a shower of fluttering pink blossoms a light breeze had displaced, no term could well be less appropriate.

Helen Beresford, of Holmeside, was not merely "pretty maiden," with flaxen hair and speed-well eyes, and a waist like a wasp's, she was "a daughter of the gods, divinely tall," and, in fact, she was exactly the same height as Ralph, and he was not short for a man.

She came to meet him with free, glad steps, and a something of almost childlike tenderness in her blushing face and tremulous mouth.

They shook hands over the orchard wall—that is to say, they did not shake hands, because she put out her hand, which was soft and round, but distinctly powerful, and he held it in both of his, while he said a good many things that need not be put down.

"Why, that is your cousin?" said she presently.

"Yes. It was so fine—he wanted so much to come out, poor fellow! So I brought him down here to fish—else, you know, I could hardly have come myself, and until to-morrow would have been such an awful time."

"Poor fellow! He looks happy, though!" said Helen, with her voice full of pity. She had the tenderest heart in all the world.

"Come out and speak to him," said Ralph; and by way of making her come out, he put both his hands on the low wall and vaulted over into the orchard.

"It's absurd to go out just yet, though," said he, and taking her arm as if he had a right both to it and her, they walked up and down among the apple trees for a few minutes in silence.

"Helen," he said presently, very seriously, "do we understand each other?"

"I suppose so," she answered softly, and instantly began to tremble all over.

"Then it's only the question of the confounded tin," he went on.

"I suppose so," she repeated still more softly and nervously.

"Then we'd better tell granny? Yes, and Hugh?" he suggested.

"I suppose we'd better; or, perhaps, we'd better wait until—until we can see our way clearer."

"This uncertainty is horrible," began Ralph.

"It is very trying," she murmured; "still, we must be brave."

"You're always brave, bless you!"

"No, I'm not."

"Yes, you are; I wish I'd half your pluck."

"That wouldn't be much."

"But you can't think how repulsive it is to me—to—to—"

"To be poor? Oh, there are worse things than that!"

"No, no, it isn't that; it's—it's the horrible knowledge that when that poor fellow goes—and he must go—I shall be my uncle's heir, and—well, then, of course, everything will be different. You can't think how dreadful it is to me to see him about. I often feel I can't stand it—I must go. If it hadn't been for you I should have gone. But he's so fond of me; he can't bear any one else about him. And I'm fond of him too. I never had a brother, so I can't say what it feels like to have one, but I couldn't be fonder of a brother; and—but there, it's horrible to me—it really is! And I've been such an unlucky beggar too!"

"Well, the luck will turn now; it can't go on for ever, you know."

"I'm an ungrateful brute for saying so, as it's won me you, Helen."

Here fortunately there was another shower of apple blossom, which shall be allowed to screen them for a few seconds.

"At any rate, up to my time of knowing you, I was always such an unlucky beggar," resumed Ralph. "My uncle's been good to me, as uncles go—very different from a father and that sort of thing. When I was plucked for the Civil Service, I thought I'd like to learn tea."

"Learn tea?" asked Helen.

"Yes, I was going out to Assam; then I came down here for a few days to recruit—tea was such a frightful grind, and I found poor Hugh awfully bad, and he made no end of a fuss when I wanted to leave. My aunt and uncle were half out of their minds about him. 'What's all the tea in the world compared to poor Hugh's comfort? If he wants you to stay, you must stay,' they said; so I hung on here. But of course it's the very thing I ought not to have done; though I don't know how it is, it's only just lately that anything has seemed to matter much. I'm afraid you'll find me—"

"No, I shan't," said Helen. "Ah, there's granny out on the lawn!"

"Shall we?" asked Ralph, slightly raising his eyebrows.

"Perhaps we'd better," she faltered.

So they both went off and told granny, who, strange to say, was not in the least surprised to hear it.

"Well, to punish you for your wickedness, I shall keep you prisoner in my castle of Holmeside until after lunch," said granny.

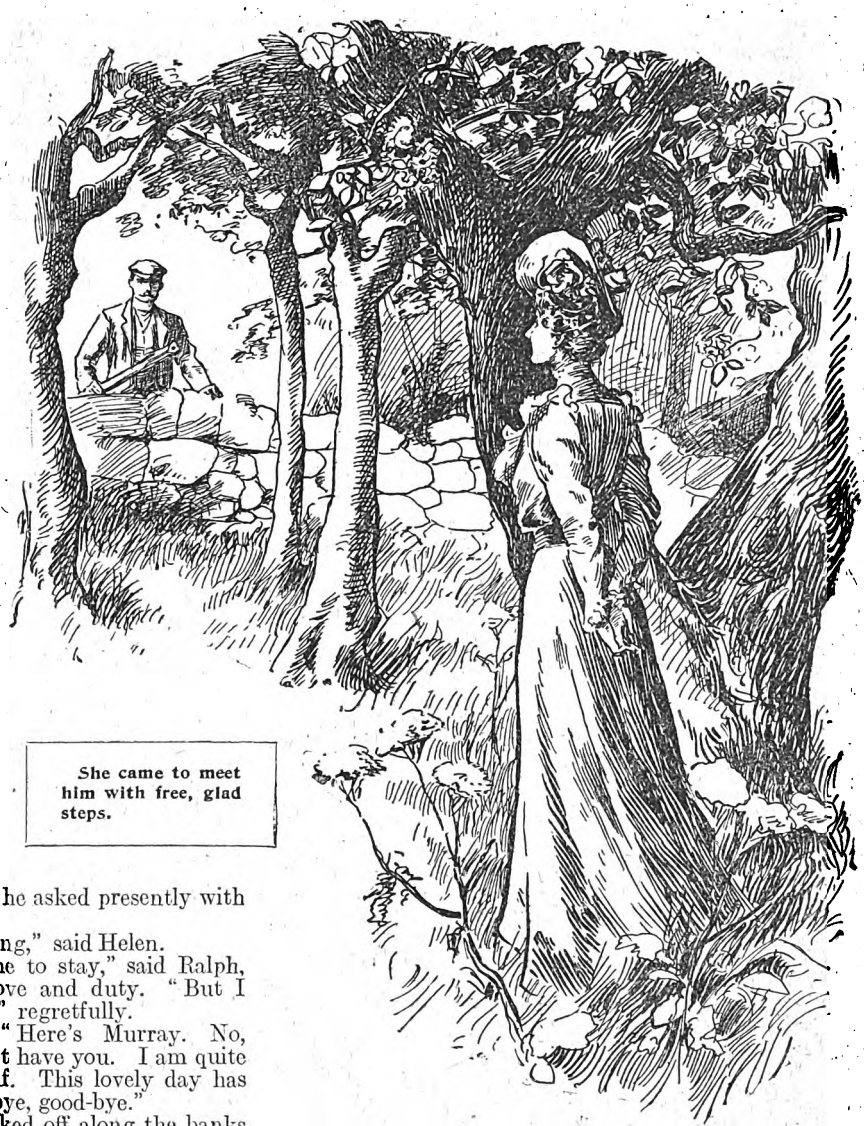
"Oh, but I've promised to be back sharp to lunch, and the others will be frantic if we're late. Good Heavens!" looking at his watch, "we shall hardly do it as it is Come, Helen, come. Good-bye, Mrs. Beresford."

And the engaged couple hurried off. Just as they turned out of the orchard gate they saw Hugh coming towards them.

Ralph left Helen's side for a moment and said:

"Hugh, old fellow, I'm the happiest man in the world! We've settled it all, haven't we, Helen? And she says she approves of you as a cousin."

"Very good of her! I am sure I return the compliment a thousand-fold," said Hugh; but he could not get through the sentence without a cough.



She came to meet him with free, glad steps.

"Isn't it time to be going?" he asked presently with another cough.

"Do come in and have something," said Helen.

"Mrs. Beresford has asked me to stay," said Ralph, beginning to waver between love and duty. "But I don't see how we can manage it!" regretfully.

"Why not?" said Hugh. "Here's Murray. No, Ralph, you shan't come; I won't have you. I am quite capable of taking care of myself. This lovely day has done me no end of good. Good-bye, good-bye."

And he turned away and walked off along the banks almost as briskly as if nothing were the matter with him.

They looked after him for a moment, then went towards the house arm in arm, talking happily.

Two hours of happiness; two hours of a present, so perfect, so exquisitely blissful, that it seemed to have neither past nor future. They stand alone, do those two hours, in the memory of a man and woman—unique, impossible to repeat; the beginning of their affianced life, the end, Holmeside, old Mrs. Beresford's cottage, was a very small and modest residence, but it made up in charm, so far as Ralph Warburton was concerned, what it lost in size: to him it was altogether perfect. The tiny drawing-room was half bow-window, all twined about with dark-stemmed jasmine and the tender young leaves of a climbing rose.

He and she sat in that bow-window very close together, and talked in whispers after lunch when granny had gone to take her nap. But they did not say very much; their great happiness had made them quieter.

In a long pause between their broken talk, the sound of a horse's hoofs in rapid motion reached them; it came nearer very swiftly; it arrested Ralph's ear. He turned sharply to the window; in another instant "Golightly," the fastest horse in the Broadholme stables, was in sight. Murray was on him; they were tearing along the road at the very top of the thoroughbred's speed.

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Ralph, and dashed out of the room and through the shrubbery.

Murray pulled up short in front of the gate.

"What's amiss?" shouted Ralph, the man's face striking him with cold terror.

"Bad news, sir; bad news!" exclaimed Murray, shaking his head.

"Be quick! What's wrong?" cried Ralph.

"Mr. Hugh's just about killed himself!" said Murray. "He would drive that great pulling brute; all I could say wouldn't stop him. You shouldn't have left, Mr. Ralph; he wouldn't mind me. But he's done for himself—broken a blood vessel the minute he put foot in the house. Best get back, sir, quick as you can, if you want to see him again. We've been tearing about for doctors. I've just been to the post-office with a telegram to a London physician; but I knew where you was, sir, so I thought I'd better give you a hint. The squire's taking on awful!"

"Here, I'll ride back 'Golightly.' You get something from the Greyhound," said Ralph; then hurrying, pale as death into the house.

"I must go! Good-bye, good-bye!" he cried wildly, stammered out the fatal news, kissed Helen once with white lips, mounted 'Golightly,' and galloped back to Broadholme as fast as the horse would take him.

A couple of out-door men were waiting about the Warburtons' house; neither spoke a word as they took his horse. He sprang up the steps and entered the quaint hall. His uncle was pacing up and down in a state of frenzy. He walked straight up to Ralph and shook his clenched fist in his face, crying, in a voice he was obliged to subdue:

"You've murdered my son! You've killed my boy! How dare you show your face in this room? I tell you you've killed my boy!"

"Where is he?" asked Ralph wildly.

"What's that to you?" demanded the Squire. "I tell you, you've murdered my son! You might have waited!" he added, with a bitter taunt, "you'd not have had long to wait! But you've overdone it, sir! You shall smart for it!"

"Where is he?" repeated Ralph, trying to push past his uncle, and too overwrought for courtesy. "Where is he?"

"What's that to you? Leave the house this moment?" stormed the maddened father. "This roof can't cover both of us!"

He tried to bar the way, but Ralph was too much for him.

"He wants me!" he cried under his breath, springing up the stairs.

"He wants no one now! Come back I say; don't go one step further!"

"He wants me, and he shall have me!" returned Ralph.

"Come back you, you, sir! come back!" his uncle called after him, smothering his voice as best he could, but gesticulating with fury.

Ralph hurried on.

"Tell my aunt I'm here," he whispered to a girl who was waiting outside Hugh's door.

She nodded slowly, lifting the corner of her apron to her eyes as she did so. In a moment or two Mrs. Warburton came to him.

"O, Ralph! Ralph!" she cried, trying to stifle both her voice and her sobs; "why did you leave him? O, you've killed him! you've killed my darling!"

"Does he want me?" asked Ralph, almost choking with emotion.

"O," sobbed the mother, "his poor eyes have been asking for you all the time, and you never came—you never came!"

"May I go into him now?" said Ralph huskily.

"Leave the house, sir! Am I the master of my own house or not?" exclaimed Mr. Warburton, who had followed his nephew up stairs, seizing Ralph's arm with a powerful grip. "You dare to go into my boy's room! You've murdered him, sir—murdered him!"

"O, don't! don't," cried the wife, trying to separate the two men. "Our darling needs him, dear; he must come!"

"Am I master here, I want to know?" demanded the husband.

"No, no; you're not master to-day!" said the wife, in wild agony. "Death's master now! Dear, you must let him come with me, indeed you must! Come, Ralph; he wants you."

They went softly into the darkened room. There was a still, marble face on the pillow—a marble hand on the quilt. Ralph took the chair by the bedside, and without a word placed his own strong hand over that cold frail one his cousin had no power to lift.

Hugh opened his eyes, let them rest on Ralph, and smiled faintly, as if he had at last found what he was seeking and was content; then he closed them again, and appeared to fall asleep.

Ralph sat there quietly hour after hour, as the day faded into night, and until the first flush of red touched the sky.

But before the dawning it was all over. Then Ralph rose from his watching and stole out of the house. For him, wandering homeless, all had come to an end; except the consciousness that for ever the gnawing sense of guilt would never leave him.

As if by instinct he groped his way down to Holmeside—along by the broad highway—down through the wet banks of the Lutterbourn. At last he was with her again; he hardly knew how it happened, she was in his arms, or he in hers.

"We must part—we must part for ever! I am not fit for you now! His face—I shall always see his face! I'm an outcast and a vagabond on the earth!"

But she clung to him; she would not let him go.

"Then so am I! It was the fault of both of us."

"You cannot love me now, Helen."

"Now, and for ever—for ever and a day!"

"I must hide myself at the world's end! You couldn't follow me so far?"

"To the world's end! aye, and to a mile beyond it!"

PART II.—LATITUDE 8 DEG. NORTH.

A WAVELESS sea, bluer than the bluest sapphire, on which float myriads of great white jelly-fish, faintly lapping a narrow belt of golden sand; dense vegetation growing almost to the water's edge; gigantic cotton-trees, stately palms, slender cocoa-nuts with wide spreading tufts of feathery foliage and clusters of green fruit, and broad-leaved bananas. Embedded in this ocean of verdure, innumerable round mud huts with pointed roofs of bamboo thatching, and tall square houses with corrugated iron gables, on which the tropical sun beats pitilessly; a West African town clustering around the feet of dark-wooded mountains under an exquisite opaline sky—lightness, brightness, heat, and the sun everywhere—and everywhere colour, pure and vivid as a tropical flower.

A verandah of one of those white houses—a wide verandah shaded from the blinding glare by hanging mats of woven grass; a young Englishman pacing restlessly up and down, now and then stopping to raise the matting and gaze impatiently seaward. The silence when he stops, and his footfall does not break it, is deathlike. He listens—listens—paces up and down in a growing fever of unrest, again touches the mat. Hark! At last the boom of the signal-gun! He drags back the blind, eagerly looks at the too well-known flag-staff; the flag is being run up—the mail is sighted. Then comes the worst of the waiting.

"Good Heavens! how she's crawling!" he exclaims, as he fixedly watches the steamer in the offing.

He has waited so long—so long patiently accepted a separation that was inevitable; now, with the steamer in sight, time seems insufferable. But it goes by—it goes by slowly, but it goes!

He leaves the house and the friends that are looking after him in the town—for his home is far away in the wilds and hurries down to a little wharf, where he finds a huge Kroo-man with a blue tattoo-mark about half-an-inch wide running from the top of his black forehead to the tip of his nose, lolling half-asleep in a large boat.

"Bannah Will!" he shouts, "make you get crew one time! Mail done come."

In a few minutes after great shouting of—

"Hi! you Frying Pan! Hi! you Slap Jack! Hi! you Lahai Hi! You Bottle of Beer! You lazy creatures!" Bannah Will manages to collect his "boys," the Englishman jumps into the boat, the black giant pushes off, and away they pull from the shore, where they watch the steamer until they can see where she will anchor; for as there is no proper landing-place it is always uncertain where she may stop. But they are nearing the vessel every minute. After all—will she be there? What if she is not? No, no, that would be too dreadful to happen. She must be there!

But to return to our narrative, and the sober past tense. Two years and a half before this, a fellow countryman of Bannah Will, with his boys, had the honour of bringing Ralph Warburton himself on shore, when he first arrived on the West Coast. He had had a bad time of it, one way and another, ever since that fatal day when he had lingered among the English apple trees with Helen Beresford. He had failed in a trust; he deserved to be punished—he did not deny it; he was as severe with himself as any man could be, but his punishment had been a hard one; still, it had done him good—it had made a man of him.

He had dropped talking of such trifling tasks as he had had to perform in England as "an awful grind." He knew, he learnt very soon after his arrival on the coast, that up to that time he had hardly done a good day's work in his life. After a couple of years incessant toil, broken only by African fevers, he had returned to England to recruit his health.

He had not ventured so much as to look at Broadholme; but he had married Helen, stayed at Holmeside six weeks and left her there with granny.

It had been a dreadful parting, worse even than the first one; but he had been firm.

"I can't let you be killed, Helen! Even for me you mustn't kill yourself!" And he had gone without her.

It was an awful wrench; but there was an epidemic among the Europeans; the death-rate after his return to the coast was fearful; he was thankful she was safe at home.

The epidemic spared him, however; it took the men above him; he had learnt palm oil and other African produce well; he could cope with the wily native; and so he found himself the manager of Yolaba Factory on the Bockeroo river, and began to cherish a vague hope he might one day be able to see his wife again.

One evening, just after he had taken the oversight of Yolaba, he was sitting on the verandah in the bright moonlight alone, watching a great snake slowly gliding across the inclosure in front of his dwelling.

He was the only Englishman within many miles. He was tired, ill, depressed, craving for some one to speak to, when in came one of his men.

"Book done come, sir!"

"Book" proved to be a long letter from Helen; it had a black border. The sight made him tremble—his nerves were always in a frightful state out there—but it was in her hand. It covered many pages of thin paper, but the gist of it was this—

"My Dearest,—I am coming. You cannot stop me now. I shall have started before this reaches you. Poor granny's little annuity died with her; but the trifle she was able to save will just pay for my outfit and passage. I leave by the Gonda on the 18th November."

It was the Gonda towards which Bannah Will and his crew pulled Ralph Warburton across the sapphire sea, that washed the shore of the African town clustered around the base of the dark mountains; that town was a hundred and fifty miles from Ralph's new home.

Well, Bannah Will pulled about and watched the steamer; they came nearer and nearer; Ralph suddenly felt his heart all but jumping out of his body. There she was on the deck—there was his Helen!

"Hi! de missis done come!" shouted Bannah Will gleefully, as he saw Warburton waving his hat with all his might.

"Yes!" cried Warburton wildly, "de missis done come! de missis done come for true!"

O, but the bobbing up and down in that boat! The seeing each other, the waving, the signalling, the not being able to stop!

But at last—ah, well.

Yet, somehow there was an element of matter-of-factness about it that was incongruous, almost laughable. Luggage and that sort of thing would jostle up against the other sort of thing, you know; and there was so much to do, so much to see, such a lot of people to say "good-bye" to, so many to say "how do you do?" to; such a strange new country, such a kind, open-hearted hospitality within the square white house that rose among the verdure of the town, such sympathy—for out there, who does not know the anguish of parting, the bliss of meeting?—such, in fact, it was all a bewilderment of delight to Helen, in spite of the overpowering heat and the glare everywhere.

"But we're not at home yet, darling, you know," said Ralph.

"Home," said Helen. "How strange it seems to have a home that is not in England!"

"Well," said he, with a shrug of the shoulders, "of course it isn't really home—that is, it hasn't been yet; but it's going to be different now de missis done come!"

"Holmeside never seemed like home to me after you were gone," said Helen. "So I came to the conclusion that where you were must be home. Do you feel—I mean, I suppose you are glad I've come?"

"Glad! If you knew the torture of loneliness I've endured, you'd wonder I was here to meet you—that's all."

"Poor old man," said Helen; and she gave him a look which, not being able to stand, he interrupted in the proper way, there being no one about just then.

They had to do a hundred and fifty miles in an open boat before they could call themselves at home, so after two or three days "in town," Mr. and Mrs. Warburton said good-bye to even such vestiges of European life as were to be found there, and set out for the lonely factory on the far-distant Bockeroo River.

After three days in the boat, and two nights spent—one at the mission station on the coast, and the other on a small island, where they were the only Europeans—they left the open sea, and pulled a few miles up the wide mouth of the Bockeroo River, under a brilliant moonlight, until presently the monotonous dip of the oars ceased to break the death-like silence before a narrow wharf, behind which was distinctly visible a long white building with a veranda running the entire length of it.

How still! how utterly lonely it all was! Not a creature to be seen, not a sound heard, no light; no trace of any human being! Surely it must be more than a mile beyond the world's end!

"How's this!" cried Ralph angrily. "No one about! Where's the watchman?"

"Rope-yarn!" he shouted. "Rope-yarn!" he repeated several times at the top of his voice; and a minute or two afterwards, a light moved slowly down to the water's edge.

"Here, Bannah Will, make you carry the missis!" continued Ralph.

"Hi, you Bottle of Beer, make you come help carry de missis!" Bannah Will shouted in his turn; and together they managed to lift Helen through the shallow water, and then returned to fetch her husband.

"Is that our home, Ralph?" asked Helen, as soon as he was within speaking distance.

"No darling; that's the store. Here, Rope-yarn, make you show the house one time!"

Rope-yarn, holding his lantern close to the ground, for fear of treading on a snake, went before them, up a rough path, across a bit of country road, and entered, by rough wooden gates, a wide inclosed space, within which was another long white building. Through the yard, up a flight of brick steps, went Rope-yarn and the young married couple. On the verandah, Ralph dismissed the man.

"Now, my love," he said, and together they entered a great bare room. He turned and kissed her. "Our new home, Helen. Welcome to Yolaba!"

"At last!" she said, with a sigh of content, clinging to him for one instant before she looked around.

"At last!" he echoed. "And not much to see now you've got here!" he went on presently, altering his tone.

There was the great bare room—eight windows, through which the brilliant moonlight was pouring; four doors, two cane chairs, a well-worn English dining-table, a sofa, and two packing-cases from Whiteley's.

"You're not over-furnished, my dear!" said Helen. "But never mind; there's you!"

"And you!"

"But this will never do!"

"Won't it?"

"No; there are the cases to unpack. You've never seen me yet as a woman of business, you know."

"You don't mean to say you're going to do that to-night?"

"I am, though!"

Those cases were unpacked that night.

At half past five next morning they were again in the long bare room, and Ralph was saying:

"Now, Helen, now come and look at your new home! Come on to the verandah."

She followed him, and then stood speechless for a while, taking in the utter loveliness of the scene.

This is what she saw: a broad river; far off in the distance the sea, its breakers splashing like silver. Near at hand, the path, by which she had come last night, she now saw bordered on each side with a hedge covered with pink blossoms, over which countless humming birds, more brilliant than jewels, were hovering, their tiny bodies quivering and sparkling in the sun as they sucked the honey through their long straight beaks. A bread-nut tree, with large shiny dark green leaves, all but looked in at the young English couple on the verandah, and palms were everywhere; and everywhere the busy little rice birds, gorgeous in black and yellow velvet, were stripping the green off the broad palm leaves, chatter, chatter, chattering incessantly. A solitary cocoa-nut tree watched over a cemented duck-pond in one corner of the inclosed space in front of the house; in another a group of glossy black-skinned girls, with gleaming white teeth, were drawing water at a thatched-roofed well, laughing and talking as if life were the greatest joke in the world.

"How do you like it now, Helen?" asked Ralph, who had been gazing, not at the scenery, but at his wife's rapt face.

"It can't be real!" she murmured dreamily.

"It is good to look at, isn't it?" said Ralph.

"Surely it can't be so unhealthy as you say! It's too lovely—it's too lovely even to be real!"

"Then you're not sorry you've come?" he asked.

She put out her hand; he took it.

"I'd like to kiss you for that," he said fondly. "But those girls can see us. We always have to be setting examples here. Well, now, there's housekeeping beginning. Here comes your fishmonger."

A boy, attired in a red cotton handkerchief, came up the path, carrying a bunch of brilliant fish, just caught, and threaded on a piece of grass. A minute after the native cook came in.

"Boy done bring fish? Say eight copper, sar!"

"Here, Helen, give him fourpence; I'm going to turn all this sort of thing over to you," said Ralph, and then, looking again towards the yard, "Ah," he exclaims, "here comes a particular pet of mine!"

A little tot of a girl, in a loose blue and white muslin garment, and coral earrings in her baby ears, the prettiest little black creature imaginable, was coming towards the house, poising a great melon on her woolly head.

"The sweet little thing!" cried Helen. "Call her up. Do let me hear you speak to her."

Ralph called her.

"Good morning, sar. Good morning, marm. Me mammy say six coppers, sar," piped the most musical voice in the world.

"What a darling! Threepence to pay, Ralph."

Further conversation was prevented by the resonant tones of the factory gong. Ralph drank off the cup of tea that had been waiting for him.

"Well, dear, we must part until eleven o'clock; so good-bye for a time.

Simple details these; but it was Helen's first morning on the Bockeroo River. They were impressed on her heart for ever.

At eleven Ralph came in, vigorously mopping his face.

"By Jove! By Jove!" he exclaimed, as he caught sight of his wife arrayed in a loose princess robe of cool white batiste, the wide sleeves showing her smooth, firm arms. "O, I say! By Jove!"

It was his method of expressing astonishment and admiration.

Certainly if Helen Beresford in her serge among the apple blossoms of Holmeside had looked a grand creature,

Helen Warburton at Yolaba in her white robe was grander.

"And what a breakfast table! A whole set of china, I'll declare! Now I begin to understand the expression, 'A woman of faculty.'"

Helen smiled: it is so nice to be praised by a husband—a fact that is sometimes forgotten. She smiled, took his hot hand, and led him to an object covered by a cloth.

"Guess!" she said mysteriously.

"Couldn't! My brains won't run to so much excitement," said he, sinking into a chair.

"I must help you, then. What is this?"

"Holly, by Jove! You don't mean to say—but not don't tell me till after breakfast, and I'm strong enough to bear it. You don't mean to tell me—I'll declare, next Wednesday's Christmas Day! So it is! I know, I know! It's our Christmas pudding!"

* * * * *

"Here's a pretty go!" ejaculated Ralph, as he came in to breakfast one morning, scowling furiously, and mopping his face more vigorously than ever. "Here's Jackson, my only Englishman, down with fever! Heaven knows what I'm to do among that pack of thieving rascals. I can't keep my eye on them all; I have to be all over the place. There'll be fine plundering;" and Ralph began to nibble at his lips and moustache, as his manner was when overwrought and nervous.

"Who is looking after Jackson?" asked Helen, as she handed her husband the tea he so greatly needed.

"Black nurse," said Ralph. "First-rate; never leaves the patient an instant; but what I'm to do without him Heaven knows, I don't."

"What is it you want done, Ralph? I mean, what is it that's most particular?"

"Oh, I want somebody with an eye," cried Ralph moodily. It was hotter than ever that morning

"An eye! I have two—at your service, if they can be of any use to you," said Helen, with that admirable coolness of hers.

"O, I can't take you in there," groaned Ralph.

"Should I be of the slightest use?" asked Helen.

"Why, of course! What a question!"

"Very well; then I shall come."

"Well, you are a brick! But I don't like it."

"Just the thing I shall enjoy. Bless you, Ralph, you don't know me even yet as a woman of business! I feel I've heaps of unexpended energy left still."

"Energy! How can any one who isn't a salamander have a scrap of energy in this furnace?" groaned Ralph, letting his arms fall limply on each side of his Madeira chair.

"Still, the place must be driven," put in Helen.

"Con-con-confound it, yes!"

Half-an-hour later Helen was on her way to the factory; "factory" being the local word for "store."

A number of native canoes were drawn up near the wharf. A negro was sleeping by the water's edge, with the rope that held his boat tied to his toe. In the various sheds palm-oil was being measured, and other native produce being collected and weighed.

Helen went up a flight of steps into an enormous room, very well built. Through the room ran a long counter, at the back of which were rows of shelves displaying Madras handkerchiefs, bright prints, blue baftas, crockery, tobacco, tinned provisions, tools, beads, and indeed, to quote Ralph, "everything from a needle to an anchor." As the store had not been long reopened, it was just then very popular with the natives. It was crowded all day long.

"What a din! Shall I ever be able to hear myself speak?" said Helen to herself, as she paused bewildered.

The noise was frightful; the room filled with people from all sorts of out-of-the-way places on the neighbouring rivers, all chattering, all wanting to be served at once. The heat was overpowering; and the odour—paugh! A hundred glittering pairs of eyes were turned on the tall white woman in her sweeping robes.

Mutterings ran through the crowd.

"Hi, daddy, de missis done come! Hi, mammy, de missis done come one time! De missis fine woman for true!"

That clear organising brain of hers soon made order out of chaos. In a very short time Helen found that she had three things to do—to keep an eye that nothing was stolen, to write out "good notes" or orders for the native traders who sold palm-oil or palm-nuts downstairs, and bought blue baftas or Madras handkerchiefs upstairs, and to "look after the pieces" generally.

She did it well. She liked it. It was singularly congenial to her; and, above all, it was invaluable to Ralph, who seemed compensated for all his troubles whenever he snatched a hasty glance at her neat brown head and white-robed figure.

The Englishman, Jackson, got well; but still Helen kept her post at the desk, and still her watchful eye held the wiliest native in awe.

So Ralph and Helen worked together until one afternoon, when, there happening to be a comparative lull in business, Helen left the desk and took a chair in the doorway, between her husband's private office and the store. She had another chair in front of her, over which was thrown a gay-coloured scarf, such as they sold to the natives for body-scarves, and Helen, who always must have her hands busy, was ravelling out the ends to make the fringe, while she kept an eye to things in general, when she felt a slight pain across the brows. It was very slight, but it was peculiar.

"Fever!" she said; and she laid down her work at once.

At once—and for ever. She left the half-fringed scarf hanging over the back of the chair, and crossed the floor to her husband, who was at the desk in the middle of the room.

"There's such a curious pain across here," she said, putting her hand just above her eyes.

Ralph looked up at her; his face changed, his heart sank.

"I daren't leave. Jackson must stay in the palm oil shed. Go up to the house at once. Get some hot tea. Lie down. Pile on all your thickest things," he said hurriedly.

She went away alone, through the burning glare of the sunshine; but she was shivering with icy coldness when she reached the house. Burning heat succeeded the cold. She was down with fever.

It was a terrible attack. She grew worse and worse. She suffered horrors unimaginable by those who have never gone through them. Ralph was half mad with dread; he knew only too well how critical her state was; but the inexorable factory had to be driven all the same. It was most distressing to leave her; but business would not stop because Ralph Warburton's wife was hovering between life and death. They neither of them ever knew how they managed to live through the next few days.

The fever subsided; but the weakness that followed was almost more appalling. She could do nothing but cry by the hour together from sheer prostration. Then to make things worse, if possible, a series of tornadoes ushered in all the miseries of the rainy season.

One evening when Ralph came in, Helen was lying on the sofa weeping piteously, and too weak even to turn to welcome him. He tried to comfort her, to rouse her, to get her to take something; but all in vain. He was in despair; she seemed sinking before his eyes. He could not stand it; an hour afterwards he was down with fever himself. That attack—it was a bad one while it lasted, probably saved his wife's life. In her terror for him she shook off her own illness, until he partially recovered.

One evening about five o'clock, Ralph, who had just managed to drag himself about the factory all day, came in quite done up, more dead than alive, and sat down in the veranda by Helen's side.

It was a fine evening. Helen had been sitting there for some time, watching the line of silver breakers far off at the river's mouth, the big tears streaming slowly down her face as she looked at them. They seemed, that distant open sea seemed, to her the only way back to civilisation, to England, to home. She dried up her tears as well as she could when she saw her husband coming; but her eyes would keep brimming over; she was so weak, so home-sick, and so was he.

"O, those two hours at Holmeside—what have they done for us?" Ralph groaned. "Shall we scrape all together, and go back and starve?"

Ralph now had the most melancholy way of putting things. Helen broke into a hopeless fit of bitter weeping. Before she could sob out an answer the black cook appeared.

"We no got noting for dinner, marm."

"What, not even a fowl?" asked Ralph.

"He done finish, sar."

There was a dead silence after this announcement. Out of doors all was still; even Helen had ceased sobbing for an instant.

Suddenly Ralph bent forward, as if listening eagerly, holding up his hand to keep the black man from uttering another word. He listened—far off, from miles and miles away down the river, came stealing, only to be distinguished by the practised ear, the peculiar chant of a canoe crew.

"It's the boat with the letters!" he exclaimed.

It stopped presently at the little landing-stage; the head man of the crew brought up a japanned tin box. It held letters and papers.

A letter from England; another letter with a deep black border. It was from Ralph's aunt, it was kind, but heart-broken. His uncle was dead. He died forgiving him. Broadholme was Ralph's; and so was the money the letter contained.

A fortnight later Bannah Will and his crew pulled Ralph and his wife back to the town that clusters round the base of the wooded mountains, but not, this time, over a smooth and waveless sea. As they stepped on to the deck of the English steamer Helen cried fervently:

"Oh, let me kiss the boards!"

But the bright sun came out again; the lovely West Coast looked lovelier than ever.

"After all," said Helen, as she and her husband stood side by side gazing on the receding shore, "after all, it is very, very beautiful."

"Especially when seen from the deck of a homeward-bound steamer," said Ralph, as if concluding his wife's sentence.

An Adventure of Felix Merryweather.

Amateur Investigator of Crime.

Felix Merryweather was a would-be investigator of crime. He had never been professionally engaged but he lived in continual hopes. When a retired corn-chandler has arrived at the age of sixty it is not usual for him to embark on the "lot that is not a happy one." Nor is it to be supposed he can possibly make anything else but a rod for his own back by indulging in such a strange hobby.

Felix, however, thought otherwise. He had been led away from the normal aspirations and contentment of his three score years, by a certain celebrated magazine, and the marvellous achievements of a famous detective whose name had become a household word. One of the earliest effects of this fascination for anything and everything concerning the doings of the aforesaid character of fiction, was the removal of all that was Merryweather's to Baker Street. This was a bold move—in more senses than one; for he had amongst his possessions a wife, whose scruples were not so easily overcome.

"You must be simply mad!" she said, soon after the move; "shutting yourself up in this horrible neighbourhood; what with the yells of costermongers and newsboys all day, and the whistling for cabs and policemen all night—why, it's enough to drive a sane person silly!"

"True—true—my dear!" Felix had replied glibly; "but think of the splendid study of character; think how great it is to deduce the false from the fair. Why, in time I shall be able to accurately tell from the voices of itinerant callers the very quality of their goods!"

At which Mrs. Merryweather sniffed disdainfully.

"Now, my dear Martha," he continued impressively, "only this morning I complained to you about the milk Smith left. I distinctly heard an unusual ring in the man's yodel. It was not a genuine cry of Milk-oh. My deductive faculties enabled me to see immediately that one of two things had occurred; the man had either doctored his milk and betrayed himself unintentionally or he had drunk some, and the added water with boracic acid spoke for themselves."

Martha had put up with several such instances of her husband's constructive abilities. Unfortunately for her, Baker Street yielded a good many, and proved a happy hunting-ground for Felix's hobby.

There was not a crime committed in the whole of the metropolis of which he was unaware.

He carefully preserved each newspaper cutting that dealt with the police-courts, and had every case at his fingers' ends.

He was very strong on motives, and could discourse by the hour on what prompted so and so to do so and so, when there was not even the shadow of possibility of his knowing.

With practice he became an adept in the study of foot-step sounds, and could readily detect in the silence of the night the difference between the "pit" of a homeward bound chorus-girl and the "pat" of Robert on his beat.

He was wont to hint that even dust-carts left infallible marks along the tracks traversed, which could be detected with some difficulty by anyone who cared to study the subject.

In spite of all, Felix, for several weeks after his sojourn in Baker Street, could get no case.

He had a dressing-gown made, most faithfully copied from the pattern of the one worn by his fictitional master. It absolutely bristled with suggestions and methods. One could easily conjure up, as Felix did, by steadfastly gazing at it the representation of a plan of Dartmoor, the Birdcage at Newgate, the corridors of New Scotland Yard, and a condemned cell.

He went so far as to procure a hypodermic syringe, but at the last moment felt too nervous to inject, so he decided to use the article as a "prop."

At last it dawned upon him that the only way to get a case was to advertise.

If the mountain would not come to Mahomet—Mahomet must go to the mountain.

Accordingly an advertisement appeared in all the leading daily papers one morning to the effect that if anyone wanted anything done Felix Merryweather was the man to do it.

The second morning after this advertisement came out Felix had just breakfasted, when a terrific ringing at the front door bell announced a visitor.

He rubbed his hands exultantly: "A case—a case, Martha, at last! Show them up here, whoever they are!" he shouted.

Then throwing himself into an easy chair, he placed his finger tips together in the most professional manner, and awaited his visitor. Heavy footsteps soon resounded upon the staircase, and the door was suddenly flung open violently.

Evidently the visitor was in a temper, for instead of knocking he had literally kicked the door open.

Merryweather jumped up nervously, as a big man with a red face blundered into the room.

"Is your name Merryweather?" he shouted, with all the force triple expansion lungs could give.

"Yes," said Felix meekly, as he eyed the stick his visitor carried suspiciously.

"Very well, I want your advice—and you can hook it," said the burly one, turning to Mrs. Merryweather, who stood there anxiously.

That lady thereupon gave him an indignant glare, and swept from the room.

"Won't you sit down?" Merryweather said timidly when they were alone.

"No, I do my business standing—you're a detective?"

"Yes."

"You can find out anything about anyone, eh?"

"Yes."

"I want you to find out something for me, d'ye see?"

"I am sure I shall be very pleased."

"Someone is making a fool of me, and when I find out who it is I mean to break every bone in his body!"

This sentence came out with a roar, and to add more force to it the visitor brought his stick down heavily on the table, causing the cups and saucers to dance wildly.

"Pray calm yourself," said Merryweather, relieved to find he was not personally threatened.

"Er—a case of blackmail?"

"Black—umph! It's nothing but a red mail. Look at these, man," and he threw on the table a packet of letters.

Merryweather undid the fastenings, and drew the contents from the first envelope.

There was no letter, but merely a white card on which appeared a small red cross, with the somewhat enigmatical word "Remember," written underneath. The other eleven envelopes contained an exact facsimile.

With fears fast vanishing and increasing interest, Merryweather critically examined them. He noticed each envelope was addressed in the same handwriting to:

Mr. Bull,
Butcher,
St. Marylebone.

"You are Mr. Bull, of course?" he asked.

"I am."

"By the postmarks you have received these at the rate of one a week?"

"Every Saturday morning for twelve weeks; the last came this morning, and I won't be insulted any longer. Just you find out who the sender is. I'll do the rest, d'ye hear?"

"Let me see! Hum! All these have been sent by the same party?" said Merryweather, as he again carefully scrutinised the envelopes through a large magnifying-glass.

"Any fool can see that," said Mr. Bull testily.

"Now, I have a theory," commenced Merryweather, when another bang resounded on the table.

"I don't want any theory," thundered Mr. Bull. "I want the man, and by next Saturday too, or I'll brand you as an impostor!" And without another word the wrathful visitor burst out of the apartment.

For a moment Merryweather was speechless, but he quickly recovered himself, for the mystery of the Red Crosses fascinated him.

His irate wife entered the room the moment the boom of the front door proclaimed that Mr. Bull had left.

She found her spouse crawling along the carpeted floor with a tape measure in one hand and the magnifying glass in the other. Every now and then he paused to sneeze, for his nose was within an inch of the dusty carpet.

"What on earth are you doing?" she gasped.

Merryweather stopped, and sitting on his heels, said impressively:

"Now, Martha, you know my methods—or I should say his methods, I never neglect trifles no matter how small they are. My object is to obtain the size of my client's boots. There must be some impression on the carpet. Armed with a record like that there is no knowing when the knowledge might be of vital importance."

"Mind the next time those boots are near they do not leave an impression on you," Mrs. Merryweather said sententiously.

Her husband evidently did not hear what she said, for he continued his investigations in spite of her remonstrances.

He afterwards proceeded to go over the apologies for letters again. They certainly did not yield much data. In fact, with the exception of the handwriting and the postmark—none at all. The former was in a bold hand, such as anyone from a schoolboy to a warehouseman might use, the latter stated that the Euston Road was the office of origin.

They all bore the same impress.

"Well," said his wife after an unusually long pause. "What do they mean?"

"I think these crosses are sent with a sinister design. Our client's life is in danger, and there is no time to be lost in getting on the tracks of the miscreant."

"Felix Merryweather," impressively exclaimed Martha, "I've had enough of this tomfoolery. If a crime is intended, the police ought to take the matter in hand, what good is it for you to poke your nose into other people's business?"

"In matters of this kind, great delicacy is needed, my dear, the police would be powerless—you must leave me alone for awhile and I can then think out the mystery."

When he was alone Merryweather took a violin from a case and played all the most mournful airs he could think of, from Ben Bolt to Chopin's Marche Funebre.

He played for over two hours, and then smoked three pipes right off. When Martha opened the door to announce lunch she was immediately driven back by dense fumes of the vilest tobacco-smoke possible. For a whole week Merryweather spent his mornings in the same way.

In the afternoons and evenings he haunted the precincts of the Euston Road post-office and the Empire respectively.

Friday night came, and no clue had been discovered or headway made at all in spite of his exertions, and he was about to take his violin from its case once more when a ring was heard at the front door, and the next moment the servant handed him a note.

"From my client," he muttered as he tore the envelope open, and so it proved. It ran: "The inclosed has just arrived. Come round to me at once.—JOHN BULL."

Trembling with excitement Merryweather unfolded the letter inclosed. Undoubtedly it came from the same quarter as the cards, for there was the red cross largely displayed, and beneath were the following words:

"Do not fail to come to-night at 8.30 p.m. to 150, Tenby Street, W.—For the day of retribution is at hand."

There was no signature appended.

"Good gracious," gasped Merryweather, "the scoundrels—this is a decoy, they mean murder." And he wiped the perspiration from his brow. Then pulling out his watch he noted it was then 8 o'clock. There was not a moment to be lost.

"Where are you going now?" said his wife, coming in as he was struggling into his overcoat.

"Only to see Mr. Bull, my dear," he replied, with a nervous hesitation, for he was fixed so to speak, with her eye.

"Felix," she cried, suddenly bursting into tears, "you are going on some dangerous errand. Oh, why did you ever take up this horrid business?"

"I shan't be long dear," he murmured as he endeavoured to stop the saline torrent of wifely devotion with a red silk handkerchief.

"Let me come too," she urged between her sobs, "we have always stood together, let us die together."

But Merryweather was obdurate on this point, he had no intention whatever of sacrificing his own life, and he certainly would not risk hers. So amidst a storm of hysterical remonstrance, he strode from the domestic hearth on his important mission, leaving her to her sad reflections.

Mr. Bull was fully prepared for keeping the mysterious appointment, and when Merryweather arrived they set off immediately. The butcher's pugnacious demeanour had not abated in the very least, and as he strode along with his little old companion by his side, he continually uttered curses loud and deep, against the anonymous correspondent.

That he, John Bull, should be a butt for somebody's threats simply took his breath away. There was a bad time however coming for whoever it was, when the meeting should take place.

The moment they entered Tenby Street it was patent that something unusual was in progress. Merryweather's trained eye saw that at a glance, for the whole place was in an extraordinary turmoil.

Crowds of people blocked the pavements, seeming to be labouring under great excitement. The roadway was jammed with every variety of vehicle imaginable, from the coster's barrow to an up-to-date motor-car. Everybody was trying to get to the middle part of the street where the numbers of the houses ran highest.

Each moment fresh contingents poured into the street from both ends.

Every class and every profession were represented in that motley throng!

It was the strangest crowd ever brought together. Shoe-blacks, sweeps, printers' devils, lady type-writers, soldiers, gentlemen who had studied the nice conduct of their walking sticks, and hospital nurses, all surged along in the one direction. The few policemen were powerless, Mafeking night was but a twinkling star in the sky compared with this.

The butcher was flabbergasted and so was Merryweather.

What did it all mean?

Ribald cries and shouts of the mob rendered conversation impossible. All the windows of the houses were thrown wide open, and countless heads appeared.

The excitement was only increased when several fire-engines galloped up from all parts, while behind them a strong force of police ploughed their way through the noisy gathering.

Of the two the firemen made the best headway, for in less time than it takes to tell they set the hose at play, and a stream of water shot out, driving the masses away like chaff before the wind.

Ill-fate decreed that Merryweather and his companion were drawn into the full vortex. Between a lumbering coal cart and a brewer's dray they were impelled ever onward by the irresistible force from behind.

Hatless, coatless, drenched to the skin, and almost torn to pieces, they eventually reached their homes thoroughly exhausted.

Felix Merryweather that night registered a solemn vow this should be his first and last case in detective work.

The next morning's paper gave some explanation as to what really had occurred. Several hospital students to perpetrate a practical joke, had cribbed an idea from a celebrated humourist—which had had far-reaching results. Sending supposed orders to various firms requesting goods to be delivered at a certain time, and inserting interesting advertisements in all the papers, they had contrived this delightful little surprise. A false alarm to the nearest fire-station turned out the brigade, and the police followed. Other dodges, such as the red cross cards to men of Mr. Bull's pugnacious disposition, and others too numerous to mention, had merely heaped fuel on to the fire, and the tout ensemble produced their desired effect—i.e.—a riot.

Shortly after this painful episode Felix Merryweather, to Martha's great delight, removed all his goods and chattels from the house in Baker Street to a picturesque cottage in a quiet retiring country village, where the rest of his days he said should be devoted to the study of natural history!

Tom Tarrant's Emergency Ration.

Colour-Sergeant Thomas Tarrant, late 4th Royal Warwickshire Regiment, as a veteran who had seen service in every quarter almost of the globe, is always worth listening to upon the subject of his many escapes by trench and field.

He is not by any means an old man, as mere years go, but a nasty wound or two, especially an ugly sword-cut that nearly severed his left arm at the shoulder, and which, even to-day, is a source of periodical pain and trouble to him, have contributed to visibly age him; although in carriage, and mentally, he is as upright and as clear-headed as ever.

An unusually modest man, it is with the utmost difficulty that he can be got to talk of his own personal doings. He will discourse by the hour together upon general military matters, or of a comrade's prowess or endurance; but he is strangely and persistently reticent where and whenever his own share comes in.

There had for some time been a story afloat with regard to an heroic action of his that I had long desired to hear from his own lips. It was only on one evening when I had literally pinned him into his particular arm-chair by the fire in the coffee-room, and manifested my deliberate intention to let him have no peace until he had duly satisfied my curiosity, that I was successful in extracting the narrative from him.

"Nothing—nothing—there was nothing in it," said he, between long puffs at his pipe.

"Well, sergeant!" I said, "let us be the judges as to that. Why unduly belittle yourself? We know that you are no braggart, and in a certain sense your modesty is highly creditable to you; but, well, in fact (and I speak, I am sure, for all present) in fact I—we want to hear the tale."

First fidgetting about a bit, and then carefully knocking his pipe out on the top bar of the grate, the old soldier drew himself smartly up, and began:

"There'll be a lot as'll say as what I'm going to tell you isn't true; because, as they say, there wasn't such a thing as an 'emergency ration' known in the Army at the time when Kitchener avenged Gordon.

"And they're right in a way, for the way they look at it there wasn't; but you'll see before I've done that my story depends upon the spirit of the thing, and that to all intents and purposes, 'emergency rations,' if unofficial, and unrecognised by the authorities, have been existent for many a year.

"Of course you know as I'm staff-sergeant now, as I lives out and does my bit of recruiting; but in the days I speak of I wasn't married, and lived in barracks.

"There'd been a lot of talk in the regiment about its chance of selection for active service, if Government decided to back up the Sirdar with a British force, sufficient, with the 'fellah' troops, to crush the Mahdi for good and all.

"There was but one opinion with regard to the justice of the cause. Some of us had fought under Gordon in China (I, for one) while at least two had served with him in the earlier days of his Governorship of the Soudan.

"I don't think as there was a man of the 'Warwickshire's,' save one, as didn't jump to go, when the 'route' came at last, with the order to increase to full strength, and for departure in six weeks for Alexandria.

"This one was Hartley Prawle, a gentleman ranker, who had joined some six months before.

"He was a big, red-haired chap, and like most people of that colour, fiery and bad-tempered generally.

"It was my duty to do the 'licking-into-shape' of the recruits of the regiment; and amongst those who in due course passed through my hands was Private Prawle.

"At the time I could not quite understand why he should have taken such a dislike to me, as he undoubtedly did.

"I treated him no worse than the other 'rookeys,' beyond having to be more strict with him, owing to his slowness in mastering the manual and other drills.

"Tarrant!" said the Colonel to me one day, soon after Prawle joined, "that fellow wants well looking after! Never mind his fine speech and manners—make him toe the mark the same as another man. I'll have no gilt-edged soldiers in my regiment!"

"But I fancy I knew how to manage my men better than the Colonel did; for until the advent of Private Prawle, I had always contrived, without failing in duty, to be on good terms with the 'new chums.'

"Prawle was so backward and slovenly in his drill and military duties generally, that I was forced to include him in the latest batch of recruits during the last week or two's training before leaving England.

Digitized by Google

"He not only didn't like this, but was downright savage, and took every opportunity of 'kicking out' whenever he thought he could do so with impunity.

"I had been compelled to report him for gross disobedience and disorderliness; the result being three days' extra pack drill!

"I can see him now, marching doggedly up and down the parade, his face as red as his coat with passion, and his lips moving in half-suppressed cursing of me as his tormentor.

"His hour up, he halted at command, for me to 'dismiss' him,

"I had done this, and was turning away to go to my own quarters, when, without word of warning, he clubbed his rifle, and swinging it round in the air, dealt me a murderous blow on the back of the head, knocking me down, and rendering me unconscious.

"I was laid up for several days, so that it was nearly a fortnight before I attended in the orderly-room to bear witness against my assailant.

"I'm not, I can conscientiously say, a revengeful man; no one can ever say that I took advantage of his weakness, however much I may have personally suffered by it.

"I think that in this case I felt even more sorry for Prawle than angry with him.

"Bad-tempered, and all that, he certainly was; but, believing, as I do, that every man has some good points about him, if you can only know 'em, and, that by giving a dog a bad name, you practically condemn and execute him; I went before the Court Martial well-disposed than otherwise towards the prisoner.

"But it was of no use.

"Dogged, sullen, and with an evil-expression in his eyes, as I stepped forward to give my testimony, that boded ill for me should it ever be in his power in the future to do me a mischief, he persistently refused to plead either one way or the other.

"He had of course rendered himself liable to at least two years' imprisonment, and to be drummed out, and had circumstances not been as they were, he would, as sure as his name was what it was, have had to pay the penalty.

"'Sentence is deferred,' said the Colonel at the close of the proceedings. 'Halt! Sergeant!' he continued to me, as I was moving out of the room. 'Captain McIntyre tells me that, barring ill-temper, and a sort of laziness of disposition, Private Prawle has the making of a fine soldier in him. I suppose he knows, the man being in his company.

"'Now you have had the fellow in hand a good while—what's your opinion of him? You've suffered through him, I know, but I give you credit for bearing no malice, Come, now, Tarrant, is Prawle a subject for lenient treatment, seeing that we badly want all the fighting material we can get or keep!

"'Well, sir,' I said, saluting, 'if you'll pardon my freedom, it's like this. I should like to say that though he made me see stars, and many on 'em, and isn't, as you may say, particularly 'gone' on me, still I can't help feeling as Private Prawle is worth giving another chance to. He's got the fighting instinct—got it strong—and though he lets out sometimes wild and blind-like, depend upon it, sir, as he'll strike a good blow at this or at any other time, for Queen and country.

"'You are a generous enemy, seregant,' remarked the Colonel, 'and if we decide, owing to our need for men at this time, to look over his offence, he will have you to thank for it, for we should have been guided entirely by your report, and recommendation. Let him be brought up to-morrow morning before 10 o'clock parade.'

"The sentence passed on him was:

"'Confined to barracks until the day of embarkation.'

"Prawle escaped further punishment; but it was thought best to put him into another company, and so I saw but little of him, even when on board the transport, right up to our landing at Alexandria.

* * * * *

"It was the evening after Omdurman.

"Tired, bruised, hungry, thirsty, the troops were being withdrawn to their lines as quickly as might be.

"The smashing of the dervishes had been complete—absolutely complete—as all the world knows.

"The pursuit was over; the Khalifa's power was shattered to its very foundation; and the way was now open for General Kitchener right up to the Citadel of Khartoum.

"There are always stragglers on such occasions; men who, slightly wounded, perhaps have dropped by the way, and—have been overlooked; others who, of deliberate intention, have sneaked away, deserting their colours; while (as here) there were many who, just exhausted by the exertions of the day, sought some quiet corner, under a bush or a dwarf palm, in the hope of gaining if only a little rest.

"It was my fortune to be among the former of these.

"Early in the engagement I had been cut down by a ferocious dervish, mounted on a white horse, his scimitar sheering clean through the left shoulder to the bone.

"The loss of blood, together with the agony of the wound, made me feel sick and faint, so much so, that for a little while, at any rate, I cared not a jot whether I lived or died.

"Then I revived a bit, after managing to get a drink of water from my bottle. This was a job, as, somehow, the latter had got twisted under me, and the pain in my arm and shoulder made movement of any kind excruciating torture.

"It was curious that, in spite of my wound, I should, when my thirst was quenched, have developed an almost savage hunger.

"I had eaten nothing for over four-and-twenty hours, so it was not to be wondered at that I should feel a bit peckish.

"As I have said, there was no such thing as an official 'emergency ration' known to the Army in those days. But Tommy Atkins is resourceful, if he is anything at all and, when he can, looks well after 'number one.'

"Guessing that there would be a long fast, I (as no doubt did many others) provided myself before starting for the day's work, with a substantial mouthful or two. This I had concealed about me, trusting that when the need came I should find opportunity for discussing it.

"There was always the danger of being 'snagged' by native field thieves, or guerilla parties of the enemy. I didn't care a button who the disturbers of my peace might be, provided only that they did not appear on the scene before I had finished my snack.

"I had just contrived to wriggle the handkerchief containing it out of my breast, when I heard my name faintly spoken from the other side of the tree under which I had taken shelter.

"Even before I dragged myself round, and faced the speaker, I knew who it was that I should find.

"It was Private Prawle.

"He lay in a heap, with his head resting sideways against the palm-stem.

"'Sergeant!' he says, with an odd smile in his eyes, and about the corners of his mouth, 'this is a good time for you to get your own back, isn't it?'

"I never felt so awfully mean in all my life as I did at that minute, with that there handkerchief of sly victuals in my fist, and this poor chap a-dying maybe, for the want of a bite and a sup!

"'Why, Prawle!' I says, 'What's up? Are you hurt?'

"'I don't know, sergeant, exactly,' says he. 'I'm not in any pain, and my head feels all right, though a bit giddy, but my legs! It's darned rum! but they havn't a bit of feeling in 'em! I might as well have wooden legs!'

"'Yes, that is rum!' I says, though I knew only too well that it were a dead bad sign his being in no pain, 'we must try and get you in first chance. I've got a bit of a scratch myself, but it'll be all O.K. when plaister and bandage come along!'

"'I say, sergeant,' he whispers then, 'I'm awful hungry' (so was I, Heaven knows; my stomach seemed like a concertina, with all the wind out). 'You haven't a toothful of anything to eat about you, have you?'

"Then he caught sight of my 'emergency ration,' and he just looked ever so wistful, first at it, and then at me, as though he could eat the both of us; and till I felt that uncomfortable and wicked as I could hardly bear myself.

"Right in front of us was a big sand-hill. On the right of it were our lines, while away to the left of it stretched a camel-trod, rutty track, leading into the desert, in the direction of Wady Halfa.

"I raised my head as soon as Prawle had asked me the question about the food, and said something as quickened every sense of hope and fear within me.

"From the right I could see approaching, at a hard gallop, a cavalry picket in search of unfortunates like ourselves, their lance heads and steel accoutrements glistening bravely in the flood of bright moonlight.

"I could also make out, riding hard up towards us along the track on the left, a crowd of wild, burnouse-clad figures.

"It was a race between life and death.

"Prawle saw them—both of them, as I did, and beseechingly begged of me a morsel, before, as was most probable, the earlier arrival of our enemies, made it impossible.

"What could I do? The man had once injured me—deeply, but Heaven knows! I had forgotten the offence, and had long since forgiven him.

"I should not miss the poor meal if the dervishes got it first, for I should assuredly then sup in Paradise!

"'Here, Prawle!' I says, 'eat this—every crumb of it! Make haste, man, or it will be too late!'

"Then I looked more intently and saw that the British were gaining, and that, given good luck, we might yet get the odd trick, and be saved—both of us.

"Then two cries came sounding almost together—the dervish 'Allah!' and the never-to-be-imitated shout from British throats. They ring in my ears now!

"But the effort to satisfy his over-mastering craving for food had been too much for poor Prawle.

"He tried to raise himself on his elbow to greet our comrades, who now were well in advance, but could not, and sank back fainting.

"Captain McIntyre, of our own regiment, the Warwickshires, who had accompanied the picket, was the first to dismount and speak to me.

"The dervishes, seeing that the race was lost—to them, turned sharp round, after discharging their matchlocks wildly, and at random, and galloped away in a cloud of dust towards the desert.

"'It's poor Prawle, sir,' says I to the captain. 'I don't know if I've done right, but he was so mortal hungry, he said, and—and—sir, I couldn't deny him the mouthful I had in my pocket!'

"'Right!' said the bluff old cavalry major, pushing his way up to Prawle, who was still unconscious, and lifting the poor chap's head on to his knee. 'Right! why of course you did right! It was just what he needed, man, something to give him strength. He'll mend—he'll mend! or—well, I'll eat my boots!'

"And, sure enough, mend he did! and when he fell, only a few months ago, at Modder River, I hear as it was while fighting like two men to save his major—Major McIntyre, during a Boer surprise.

"He had his faults, as who of us has not, but he was a fine soldier and a brave man.

"As for me, I have lived not to regret, even by ever so little, the transfer of my 'ration' on that night by the well of the Atbara at Omdurman.

"There, I hope you're satisfied, and, perhaps, you'll be good enough to send out for a new pipe."

He had used his old one to such purpose as a graphic illustrator of his story, that it was smashed to atoms.

THE LOVERS OF YVONNE

By RAFAEL SABATINI.

SUMMARY.

ANDREA DE MANCINI, a nephew of Cardinal Mazarin, is found one day by the latter in the Palais Royal, Paris, in a state of intoxication. Gaston de Luynes, the narrator of this story, and fencing-master to de Mancini, is blamed by the Cardinal for allowing his nephew to get into such a condition, and is removed from his position of fencing-master.

Eugène de Canaples insults de Mancini and a duel is arranged, but the Cardinal hears of it and tells de Luynes that it must not take place. De Luynes realises that if he does not prevent it the Cardinal has power to do him great harm, and accordingly raises a quarrel with de Canaples which ends in a fight, de Canaples being severely wounded. The onlookers are enraged with de Luynes because he indiscreetly lets fall the fact that he raised this quarrel so as to prevent a duel between de Mancini and de Canaples, and he has to flee for his life. To escape his pursuers he springs on the step of a passing carriage, and the ladies inside let him shelter there for a time, but when he says that he has wounded de Canaples they order him to alight.

De Luynes then accompanies de Mancini to the home of Eugène de Canaples, whose sister, Yvonne, Cardinal Mazarin wishes de Mancini to marry. Yvonne and her sister, Genevieve, who were the ladies who befriended de Luynes, arrive at the inn where the two men are stopping, and de Mancini is much taken with Genevieve. The Chevalier de Canaples receives de Luynes and de Mancini very cordially at his chateau.

To please Andrea was, however, of chief importance in his plans, and to that motive I owe it that he pressed me to remain a guest at the château. I declined the honor with the best grace I could command, determined that whilst Andrea remained at Canaples I would lodge at the Lys de France in Blois, independent and free to come or go as my fancy bade me. His invitation that I should at least dine at Canaples I accepted, but with the condition that he should repeat his invitation after he had heard something that I wished to tell him. He assented, with a puzzled look, and when presently Andrea repaired to his apartments, and we were alone, I began:

"You have doubtless received news, Monsieur, of a certain affair in which your son had recently the misfortune to be dangerously wounded?"

We were standing by the great marble fireplace, and Canaples was resting one of his feet upon the huge brass audirons. He made a gesture of impatience as I spoke.

"My son, sir, is a fool! A good-for-nothing fool! Oh, I have heard of this affair, a vulgar tavern brawl, the fifth in which his name has been involved and besmirched. I had news this morning by a courier dispatched me by my friend St. Simon, who imagines that I am deeply concerned in that young profligate. I learn that he is out of danger, and that in a month or so he will be about again and ready to disgrace the name of Canaples afresh. But there, sir; I crave your pardon for the interruption."

I bowed, and when in answer to my questions he told me that he was in ignorance of the details of the affair I spoke of, I set about laying those details before him. Beginning with the original provocation in the Palais Royal, and ending with the fight in the horse-market, I related the whole story to him, but in an impersonal manner, and keeping my own name out of my narrative. When I had done, Canaples muttered an oath of the days of the fourth Henry.

"Ventre St. Gris! Does the dog carry his audacity so far as to dare come betwixt me and my wishes, and to strive against them? He sought to kill Mancini, eh? Would to Heaven he had died by the hand of this fellow who shielded the lad!"

"Monsieur!" I cried, aghast at so unnatural an expression.

"Pah!" he cried harshly. "He is my son in name alone; filial he never was."

"Nevertheless, Monsieur, he is still your son, your heir."

"My heir? And what, pray, does he inherit? A title—a barren, landless title! By his shameful conduct he alienated the affection of his uncle, and his uncle has disinherited him in favour of Yvonne. 'Tis she who will be mistress of this château, with its acres of land reaching from here to Blois, and three times as far on the other side. My brother, sir, was the rich Canaples, the owner of all this, and by his testament I am his heir during my lifetime, the estates going to Yvonne at my death. So that you see I have naught to leave; but if I had, not a farthing should go to my worthless son."

He spread his thin hands before the blaze, and for a moment there was silence. Then I proceeded to tell him of the cabal which had been formed against Mancini, and of the part played by St. Auban. At the mention of that name he started as if I had stung him.

"What?" he thundered. "Is that ruffian also in the affair? Heavens! His motives are not far to seek. He is a suitor—an unfavored suitor—for the hand of Yvonne, that seemingly still hopes. But you have not told me, Monsieur, the name of this man who has stood betwixt Andrea and his assassins."

"Can you not guess, Monsieur?" quoth I, looking him squarely in the face. "Did you not hear Andrea call me, even now, his protector?"

"You? And with what motive, pray?"

"At first, as I have told you, because the Cardinal gave me no choice in the matter touching your son. Since then my motive has lain in my friendship for the boy. He has been kind and affectionate to one who has known little kindness or affection in life. I seek to repay him by advancing his interests and happiness. That, Monsieur, is why I am here to-day to shield him from St. Auban and his fellows should they appear again, as I believe they will."

The old man stood up and eyed me for a moment as steadily as his vacillating glance would permit him; then he held out his hand.

"I trust, Monsieur," he said, "that you will do me the honor to dine with us, and that whilst you are at Blois we shall see you at Canaples as often as it may please you to cross its threshold."

I took his hand, but without enthusiasm, for I understood that his words sprang from no warmth of heart for me, but merely from the fact that he beheld in me a likely ally to his designs of raising his daughter to the rank of duchess.

Eugène de Canaples may have been a good-for-nothing knave; still, methought, his character scarce justified the callous indifference manifested by this selfish, weak-minded old man towards his own son.

There was a knock at the door, and a lackey, the same Guilbert whom I had seen at Choisy in Mademoiselle's company, appeared with the announcement that the Chevalier was served.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE FORESHADOW OF DISASTER.

IN the spacious dining salon of the Château de Canaples I found the two daughters of my host awaiting us, those same two ladies of the coach in Place Vendôme and of the hostelry at Choisy—the dark and stately icicle, Yvonne, and the fair, playful doll, Geneviève.

I bowed my best bow as the Chevalier presented me, and from the corner of my eye, with inward malice, I watched them as I did so. Geneviève curtsied with a puzzled air and a sidelong glance at her sister. Yvonne accorded me the faintest, the coldest inclination of the head, whilst her cheeks assumed a colour that was unwonted.

"We have met before I think, Monsieur," she said disdainfully.

"True, Mademoiselle—once," I answered, thinking only of the coach.

"Twice, Monsieur," she corrected; whereupon I recalled how she had surprised me with my arm about the waist of the inn-keeper's daughter, and had Heaven given me shame, I might have blushed. But if sweet Yvonne thought to bring Gaston de Luynes to task for profiting by the good things which God's Providence sent his way, she was led by vanity into a prodigious error.

"Twice indeed, Mademoiselle. But the service which you rendered me upon the first occasion was so present to my mind just now that it eclipsed the memory of our second meeting. I have ever since desired, Mademoiselle, that an opportunity might be mine wherein to thank you for the preservation of my life. I do so now, and at your service do I lay that life which you preserved, and which is therefore as much yours as mine."

Strive as I might I could not rid my tone of an ironical inflection. I was goaded to it by her attitude, by the scornful turn of her lip, and the disdainful glance of her grey eyes—she had her father's eyes, saving that her gaze was as steadfast as his was furtive.

"What is this, quoth Canaples. "You owe your life to my daughter? Pray tell me of it."

"With all my heart?" I made haste to answer before Mademoiselle could speak. "A week ago I disagreed upon a question of great delicacy with a certain gentleman who shall be nameless. The obvious result attended our disagreement, and we fought 'neath the eyes of a vast company of spectators. Right was on my side, and the gentleman hurt himself upon my sword. Well, sir, the crowd snarled at me as though it were my fault that this had so befallen, and I flouted the crowd in answer. They were a hundred opposed to one, and so confident did this circumstance render them of their superiority, that for once those whelps displayed sufficient valour to attack me. I fled; and as a coach chanced to come that way, I clutched at the window and hung there. Within the coach there were two ladies, and one of them, taking compassion upon me, invited me to enter, and thus rescued me. That lady, sir," I ended with a bow, "was Mademoiselle, your daughter."

In his eyes I read it that he had guessed the name of my nameless gentleman.

The ladies were struck dumb by my apparent effrontery. Yvonne at last recovered sufficiently to ask if my presence at the château arose from my being attached to M. de Mancini. Now, attached is an unpleasant word. A courtier is attached to the king; a soldier, to the army; there is humiliation in neither of these. But to a private gentleman a man may be only attached as his secretary, his valet, or, possibly, as his bravo. Therein lay the sting of her carefully chosen word.

"I am M. de Mancini's friend," I answered with simple dignity.

For all reply she raised her eyebrows in token of surprise; Canaples looked askance. I bit my lip, and an awkward silence followed, which luckily was quickly ended by the appearance of Andrea.

The ladies received him graciously, and a faint blush might—to searching eyes—have been perceived upon Geneviève's cheek.

There came a delicate exchange of compliments, after which we got to table, and for my part I did ample justice to the viands.

I sat beside Geneviève, and opposite Andrea, who occupied the place of the honored guest, at the host's right hand, with Yvonne beside him. Me it concerned little where I sat, since the repast was all that I could look for; not so the others. Andrea scowled at me because I was nearer to Geneviève than he, and Yvonne frowned at me for other reasons. By Geneviève I was utterly disregarded, and my endeavours to converse were sorely unsuccessful.

I clearly saw that Yvonne but awaited an opportunity to unmask me, and denounce me to her father as the man who had sought his son's life.

This opportunity, however, came not until the moment of my departure from the Château that evening. I was crossing the hall with the Chevalier de Canaples, and we had stopped for a moment to admire a piece of old chain armour of the days of the Crusaders. Andrea and Geneviève had preceded us, and passed out through the open doorway, whilst Yvonne lingered upon the threshold looking back.

"I trust M. de Luynes," said Canaples, as we moved towards her, "that you will remember my invitation, and that whilst you remain at Blois we shall see you here as often as you may be pleased to come; indeed, I trust that you will be a daily visitor."

Before I could utter a reply, "Father," exclaimed Mademoiselle, coming forward, "do you know to whom you are offering the hospitality of Canaples?"

"Why that question, child? To M. de Luynes, M. de Mancini's friend."

"And the would-be murderer of Eugène," she added fiercely.

Canaples started.

"Surely such affairs are not for women to meddle with," he cried. "Moreover, M. de Luynes has already given me all details of the affair."

Her eyes grew very wide at that.

"He has told you? Yet you invite him hither?" she exclaimed.

"M. de Luynes has naught wherewith to reproach himself, nor have I. Those details which he has given me I may not impart to you; suffice it, however, that I am satisfied that his conduct could not have been other than it was, whereas that of my son reflects but little credit upon his name."

She stamped her foot; and her eyes, blazing with anger, passed from one to the other of us.

"And you—you believe this man's story?"

"Yvonne!"

"Possibly," I interposed coolly, "Mademoiselle may have received some false account of it that justifies her evident unbelief in what I may have told you."

It is not easy to give a lie unless you can prove it a lie. I made her realise this, and she bit her lip in vexation. "Gad! What a pretty viper I thought her at that moment!

"Let me add, Yvonne," said her father, "that M. de Luynes and I are old comrades in arms." Then turning to me, "My daughter, sir, is but a child, and therefore hasty to pass judgment upon matters beyond her understanding. Forget this foolish outburst, and remember only my assurance of an ever cordial welcome."

"With all my heart," I answered, after a moment's deliberation, during which I had argued that for once I must stifle pride if I would serve Andrea.

"Ough!" was all Mademoiselle's comment as she turned her back upon me. Nevertheless I bowed and flourished my beaver to her retreating figure.

Clearly Mademoiselle entertained for me exactly that degree of fondness which a pious nun may feel for the devil, and if I might draw conclusions from what evidences I had had of the strength of her character and the weakness of her father's, our sojourn at Blois promised to afford me little delectation. In fact, I foresaw many difficulties that might lead to disaster should our Paris friends appear upon the scene, a contingency this that seemed over-imminent.

It was not my wont, howbeit, to brood over the evils that the future might hold, and to this I owe it that I slept soundly that night in my room at the Lys de France

It was a pleasant enough chamber on the first floor, overlooking the street, and having an alcove attached to it which served for Michelot.

Next day I visited the Château de Canaples early in the afternoon. The weather was milder, and the glow of the sun heralded at last the near approach of spring, and brightened wondrously a landscape that had yesterday worn so forbidding a look.

"Father," exclaimed Mademoiselle, coming forward, "do you know to whom you are offering the hospitality of Canaples?"

This change it must have been that drew the ladies, and Andrea with them, to walk in the park, where I came upon them as I rode up. Their laughter rippled merrily, and they appeared upon the best of terms until they espied me. My advent was like a cloud that foretells a storm, and drove Mesdemoiselles away after they had accorded me a greeting that contained scant graciousness.

All unruffled by this act, from which I gathered that Yvonne the strong had tutored Geneviève the frail concerning me, I consigned my horse to a groom of the Château, and linked arms with Andréa.

"Well, boy," quoth I, "what progress?"

He smiled radiantly.

"My hopes are all surpassed. It exceeds belief that so poor a thing as I should find favour in her eyes—what eyes, Gaston!" He broke off with a sigh of rapture.

"You have certainly lost no time. And so already you know that you find favour, eh! How do you know that?"

"How? Need a man be told such things? There is an inexpressible——"

"My good Andrea, seek not to express it therefore," I interrupted hastily. "Let it suffice that the inexpressible exists and makes you happy. His Eminence will doubtless share your joy. Have you written to him?"

The mirth faded from the lad's face at the words, as the blossom fades 'neath the blighting touch of frost. What he said was so undutiful from a nephew touching his uncle, particularly when that uncle is a prelate, that I refrain from penning it.

We were joined just then by the Chevalier, and together we strolled round to the rose-garden, now, alas! naught but black and naked bushes, and down to the edge of the Loire, yellow and swollen by the recent rains.

"How lovely must be this place in summer!" I mused, looking across the water towards Chambord. "And, Gad," I cried, suddenly changing my meditations, "what an ideal fencing ground is this even turf!"

"The swordsman's instinct," laughed Canaples.

And with that our talk shifted to swords, swordsmen, and swordplay, until I suggested to Andrea that he should resume his practice, whereupon the Chevalier offered to set a room at our disposal.

"Nay, if you will pardon me, Monsieur, 'tis not a room we want," I answered. "A room is well enough at the outset, but it is the common error of fencing-masters to continue their tutoring on a wooden floor. It results from this that when the neophyte handles a real sword and defends his life upon the turf, the ground has a new feeling; its elasticity or even its slipperiness discomposes him and set him at a disadvantage."

He agreed with me, whilst Andrea expressed a wish to try the turf. Foils were brought, and we whiled away the best part of half-an-hour. In the end, the Chevalier, who had watched my play intently, offered to try a bout with me. And so amazed was he with the result, that he had not done talking of it when I left Canaples a few hours later, a homage this that earned me some more than ordinarily unfriendly glances from Yvonne. No doubt, since the accomplishment was mine, it became in her eyes characteristic of a bully and a ruffler.

During the week that followed, I visited the Château with regularity, and with equal regularity did Andrea receive his fencing lessons. The object of his presence at Canaples, however, was being frustrated more and more each day, so far as the Cardinal and the Chevalier were concerned.

He raved to me of Geneviève, the one perfect woman in all the world, and brought into it by a kind Providence for his own particular delectation. In truth, love is like a rabid dog—whom it bites it renders mad; so open grew his wooing, and so ardent that one evening I thought well to take him aside and caution him.

"My dear Andrea," said I, "if you will love Geneviève, you will, and there's an end of it. But if you would not have the Chevalier pack you back to Paris and the anger of my Lord Cardinal, be circumspect, and, at least when M. de Canaples is by, divide your homage equally betwixt the two. 'Twere well if you dissembled even a slight preference for Yvonne; she will not be misled by it, seeing how unmistakable at all other seasons must be your wooing of Geneviève."

He was forced to avow the wisdom of my counsel, and to be guided by it.

Nevertheless I rode back to my hostelry in no pleasant frame of mind. It was more than likely that a short shrift and a length of hemp would be the acknowledgment I should anon receive from Mazarin for my participation in the miscarriage of his desires.

I felt that disaster was on the wing. Call it a premonition, call it what you will. I know but this: that as I rode into the courtyard of the Lys de France at dusk, the first man my eyes alighted on was the Marquis César de St. Auban and, in conversation with him, six of the most arrant looking ruffians that ever came out of Paris.

CHAPTER IX.

Of how a Whip Proved a Better Argument than a Tongue.

"I CRAVE Monsieur's pardon, but there is a gentleman below who desires to speak with you immediately."

"How does this gentleman call himself, M. l'Hôte?"

"M. le Marquis de St. Auban," answered the landlord, still standing in the doorway.

It wanted an hour or so to noon on the day following that of St. Auban's arrival at Blois, and I was on the point of setting out for the Château on an errand of warning.

It occurred to me to refuse to see the Marquis; but remembering betimes that from your enemy's speech you may sometimes learn where to look for his next attack, I thought better of it and bade my host admit him.

I strode over to the fire, and stirring the burning logs, I put my back to the blaze and waited.

Steps sounded on the stairs; there was the shuffling of the landlord's slippered feet, and the firm tread of my visitor, accompanied by the jingle of spurs and the clank of his scabbard as it struck the balustrade. Then my door was again opened, and St. Auban, as superbly dressed as ever, was admitted.

We bowed formally, as men bow who are about to cross swords, and whilst I waited for him to speak, I noted that his face was pale and bore the impress of suppressed anger.

"So, M. de Luynes, again we meet."

"By your seeking, M. le Marquis."

"You are not polite."

"You are not opportune."

He smiled dangerously.

"I learn, Monsieur, that you are a daily visitor at the Château de Canaples."

"Well, sir, what of it?"

"This—I have been to Canaples this morning, and knowing that you will learn anon, from that old dotard, what passed between us, I prefer that you shall hear it first from me."

I bowed to conceal a smile.

"Thanks to you, M. de Luynes, I was ordered from the house. I—César de St. Auban—have been ordered from the house of a provincial upstart, thanks to the calumnies which you poured into his ears."

"Calumnies! Was that the word?"

"I choose the word that suits me best," he answered, and the rage that was in him at the affront he had suffered at the hands of the Chevalier de Canaples was fast rising to the surface. "I warned you at Choisy of what would befall. Your opposition and your alliance with M. de Mancini are futile. You think to have gained a victory by winning over to your side an old fool who will sacrifice his honour to see his daughter a duchess; but I tell you, sir——"

"That you hope to see her a marchioness," I put in calmly. "You see, M. de St. Auban, I have learnt something since I came to Blois."

He grew livid with passion.

"You shall learn more ere you quit it, you meddler! You shall be taught to keep that long nose of yours out of matters that concern you not."

I laughed. "Loud threats!" I answered jeeringly.

"Never fear," he cried; "there is more to follow. To your cost shall you learn it. By Gad, sir, do you think that I am to suffer a Sicilian adventurer and a broken tavern ruffler to interfere with my designs?"

Still I kept my temper.

"So," I said in a bantering tone, "you confess that you have designs. Good! But what says the lady, eh? I am told that she is not outrageously enamoured of you; for all your beauty."

Beside himself with passion, his hand sought his sword. But the gesture was spasmodic.

"Knave!" he snarled.

"Knave to me? Have a care, St. Auban; or I'll find you a shroud for a wedding garment."

"Knave!" he repeated with a snarl. "What price are you paid by that boy?"

"By Heaven, St. Auban! You shall answer for this."

"Answer for it? To you!" And he laughed harshly. "You are mad, my master. When did a St. Auban cross swords with a man of your stamp?"

"M. le Marquis," I said, with a calmness that came of a stupendous effort, "at Choisy you sought my friendship with high-sounding talk of principles that opposed you to the proposed alliance 'twixt the houses of Mancini and Canaples. Since then I have learnt that your motives were purely personal. From my discovery I hold you to be a liar."

"Monsieur!"

"I have not yet done. You refuse to cross swords with me on the pretext that you do not fight men of my stamp. I am no saint, sir, I confess. But my sins cannot wash out my name—the name of a family accounted as good as that of St. Auban, and one from which a constable of France has sprung, whereas yours has never yet bred aught but profligates and debauchees. You are little better than I am, Marquis; indeed, you do many things that I would not do, that I have never done. For instance, whilst refusing to cross blades with me, who am a soldier, and a man of the sword, you seek to pick a fight with a beardless boy who hardly knows the use of a rapier, and who, wittingly at least, has done you no wrong. Now, my master, you may call me profligate, ruffler, gamester, duellist—what you will; but there are two viler things you cannot dub me, and which, methinks, I have proven you to be—liar and craven."

And as I spoke the burning words I stood close up to him and tapped his breast as if to drive the epithets into his very heart.

"Now, master craven," I shouted, "will that make you change your mind?"

Rage he felt indeed, and his distorted countenance was a sight fearful to behold.

"Now, my master," I added, setting my arms akimbo, and laughing brutally in his face, "will you fight?"

For a moment he wavered, and surely methought that I had drawn him. Then, "No," he cried passionately. "I will not do dishonour to my sword." And turning, he made for the door, leaving me baffled.

"Go, sir," I shouted, "but fame shall stalk fast behind you. Liar and craven will I dub you throughout the whole of France."

He stopped 'neath the lintel, and faced me again.

"Fool!" he sneered. "You'll need dispatch to spread my fame so far. By this time to-morrow you'll be arrested. In three days you'll be in the Bastille, and there shall you lie until you rot."

"Loud threats again!" I laughed, hoping by the taunt to learn more.

"Loud, perchance, but not empty. Learn that the Cardinal has knowledge of your association with Mancini, and means to separate you. An officer of the guards is on his way to Blois. He is at Meung by now. He bears a warrant for your arrest, and delivery to the governor of the Bastille. Thereafter none may say what will betide." And with a coarse burst of laughter he left me, banging the door as he passed out.

For a moment I stood there stricken by his parting words. He had sought to wound me and in this he had succeeded. But at what cost to himself? In his blind rage, the fool had shown me that which he should have zealously concealed, and what to him was but a stinging threat, was to me a timely warning. I saw the necessity for immediate action. Two things must I do—kill St. Auban first, then fly the Cardinal's warrant as best I could. I cast about me for means to carry out the first of these intentions. My eye fell upon my riding-whip lying on a chair close to my hand, and the sight of it brought me the idea I sought. Seizing it I bounded out of the room and down the stairs three steps at a time.

Along the corridor I sped, and into the common-room, which at the moment was tolerably full. As I entered by one door, the Marquis was within three paces of the other, leading to the courtyard.

My whip in the air, I sprang after him; and he, hearing the rush of my onslaught, turned, then uttered a cry of pain, as I brought the lash caressingly about his shoulders.

"Now, master craven," I shouted, "will that change your mind?"

With an almost inarticulate cry he sought to draw there and then; but those about flung themselves upon us, and held us apart—I passive and unresisting, the Marquis bellowing, struggling, and foaming at the mouth.

"To meet you now would be to murder you, Marquis," I said coolly. "Send your friends to me to appoint the time."

"So be it," he cried, his eyes blazing with a hate unspeakable. "At eight to-morrow morning I shall await you on the green behind the castle of Blois."

"At eight o'clock I shall be there," I answered. "And now, gentlemen, if you will unhand me, I will return to my apartments."

They let me go, but with many a growl and angry look, for in their eyes I was no more than a coarse aggressor, while their sympathy was all for St. Auban.

Quite Willing to Leave.

A GOVERNOR of a prison was inspecting the convicts, and during the inspection he remarked to one of them: "See here, man, you are not doing this right, you know; that sort of thing will never do." The convict calmly laid down his tools and said: "Guv'nor, I'm willing to be turned off and discharged if my work don't suit. I never applied for this job or the situation, and if my work ain't satisfactory, I'm willing to go."

Anxious to Please.

HE was a new clerk in a big retail establishment, and was anxious to make a record as a salesman. When he had been in the shop a few days a young lady came in and inquired, "Can you let me look at some safety bicycles?" He turned away to get information about the stock, and, returning, said, with a winsome smile, "I am very sorry, miss, we're out of safety bicycles; but we have some splendid safety matches."

The Natural Thing.

THE clouds were gathering threateningly over the hills. There was an ominous silence in the air, and all the evidence pointed to the likelihood of a terrible thunderstorm occurring. She had just refused his offer of marriage; but, now that danger threatened, she showed she valued his protection by the way she nestled up to him. "I'm afraid of the lightning," she murmured. "No wonder," sighed the despairing adorer, "when your heart is made of steel."

Something to Say.

IN a Western police court a small boy was about to receive sentence for some petty crime. It was evidently his first offence, and he was not familiar with court usages. When the magistrate asked the usual question before pronouncing sentence, he varied the form a little—carelessly, or perhaps as a slight relief to its monotony. "Well, my boy, have you anything you can say to the Bench?" "Yes, sir," said the frightened boy. "You have!" The case had been very clear against the prisoner. "Speak up, then, and let us hear it." To the amazement of everyone who was present, the little fellow began:

"The boy stood on the burning deck.
Whence all but he had fled!"

So keen was the appreciation of the ludicrous in the listeners that the ingenious youth was allowed to complete the poem without interruption.

Wouldn't be Mean.

"WHAT do you charge by the hour?" quoth a raw Scot, the other day, to a cabby, who was loitering near Charing Cross. "Half-a-crown," said the man. The Scot jumped in and asked to be driven to the Admiralty, where he had business. At the Admiralty the hall porter informed him that the official whom he wished to see was not in; so the visitor from the North desired to be taken back to Charing Cross. As he descended he looked at his watch. The trip had occupied seven minutes. "Ah!" he said, "we were only gone seven minutes, but we'll call it ten. Ten minutes at half-a-crown an hour is fivepence. We'll call it sixpence. I don't wish to be mean." The cabman saw matters in a different light, and a crowd assembled. There were hot words on both sides, and a policeman interfered; but, as the canny one could not be convinced that he had acted in any but the most generous manner, the matter had ultimately to be taken to the police court.

MARCO THE JESTER.

THE clown, brave in his warpaint, and waiting his cue, seemed to pale under the chalk and bismuth—a spasmodic shiver, also, appearing to shake him from head to foot.

Then a shrill whistle.

"Marco!" was shouted by a brazen-throated boy; his voice echoing through the stables and dressing-tents in the neighbourhood of the ring.

"Marco! Marco!" yelled the thousand expectantly delighted people, the roar of welcome, as the object of it all strolled into the arena, making the vast canvas rock again, and tremble to its very peg-cords.

And Marco was evidently himself again, for he never so much as winked an eyelid. This air of assumed stolid indifference but added, however, to the general satisfaction and hilarity, it being the main characteristic of the famous droll's humour.

In private life a silent, reserved man, it was curious to note that his chief professional successes seemed to have been won by something peculiarly akin to the same method.

His quips, his queer outlandish antics were all uttered with a quiet, easy gravity, irresistibly funny.

Time was when he and the bright side of life had been better, the best of friends; and, as thereby hangs a tale, it will be as well to hark back a matter of eight years or more, in order to give it due and proper telling.

Joshua Alden's father was an ironmaster in a large way of business in Smethwick, near Birmingham. Come of an old Quaker stock, he seemed to have inherited (superficially, at any rate) a double portion of the spirit—the bigoted side of it—of the "Friends'" founder and patron saint. Keen, and as some declared, suspiciously unscrupulous in his business dealings, he presented to the world a front, stern and uncompromising to a degree.

Having but one child, a son, him he brought up in the strictest accord with his own particular views, so that the lad, and later on the man, came to regard his father in the light of a domestic nuisance and despot, to be ignored or defied as opportunity offered.

Follow his father's calling he would not, and so it was that when old Caleb heard, upon good authority, that his son, whose habits and mode of life had for long been a source of trouble to him, was infatuated with a "belle-of-the-ring;" and that a marriage between them was likely to ensue, he was furious, and spoke hard things.

Joshua, not to be behindhand in the fight for the sceptre, recriminated with many a bitter word, reproaching his father with having, by hypocritical restriction and enforcements, so marred his son's life, as to make of it that which should for ever be a crying witness against him in his parental character.

Seeing that nothing was to be looked for from his father, Joshua resolved to turn the gift of "fooling" (for gift it is), for which, as an amateur he had a certain reputation, to practical account.

Saroni's Circus, the best on the road, and of which Estelle Dubois (professionally known as "L'Estelle") was the queen, the bright particular star, was still in the neighbourhood. Every year, for a season of several months, it occupied a large wooden building on the east side of the town, using the place also as convenient winter quarters.

With Saroni himself Joshua had a more than passing acquaintance—influence even—of a sort. To him, therefore, he applied for employment as a mimic in the ring.

"You!" said the showman, "What for you want to 'clown'? A rich man—you! You fool me—but, yes?"

"Never was more serious in my life," replied the other. "Will you see what I can do? Yes or no!"

"Well, I try you! Come to-morrow morning for rehearsal, then at night we will see! We will see!"

The trial "show," triumphantly successful, resulted in a five years' engagement.

That the presence in the company of Estelle Dubois largely influenced Joshua's determination, there can be no doubt. It could not well be otherwise, seeing how he loved her.

Her "turn," or in ring parlance, her "act," consisted in a combination of bare-backed equilibristic horsemanship, in which, by reason of her neatness of execution, and dainty gracefulness of style, she was unsurpassed, while her personal beauty was as that of a fairy-queen, intensified a hundred times.

There was not a man belonging to the circus but worshipped her, but without avail. Smiles, indeed, had she for all, but these though, as the recipients fondly imagined, kindly meant, were not in any sense "love" smiles, but were part of her professional paraphernalia.

Young Joshua, or as he now styled himself, "Marco, the jester," never attempted to soften his father in any way, when once he had severed himself from his home.

Had he been more a man of the world, he would certainly have noticed that Estelle cooled a little in her manner towards him, when it was clear that his chances as heir to a wealthy man were no longer of any value.

But he was of so frankly unsuspicious a nature, that to believe her capable of such a thought concerning him and his prospects never once entered his head.

In the company was a gymnast, a Frenchman, Henri Bleuse, by name. This man Joshua from the very first instinctively disliked. Bleuse, too, soon made it apparent in more ways than one, that the new clown was in no wise a favourite of his. Though there was not the slightest indication, either of word or of manner, that the foreigner entertained for Estelle anything beyond the feeling of admiration common to every man in the troupe, a little incident that occurred a few weeks after Joshua joined, rendered the latter uneasy and anxious.

It was very simple.

One evening, during the performance, and while Marco was standing in the shadow of the curtain waiting his entry, he heard voices the other side of the canvas.

"I am sick to death of it—me!"

Marco started, the speaker was Estelle. Then he listened intently.

"Bien! So am I! But patience, patience, and—then—contente."

"Ah! So you say always! But no, it comes—never!"

"I tell you it will come, petite! It will come! One little week, and—pouf! the man will speak, and you will laugh!"

"Shall I? I do not think so; but have your way. Hush! Allez! they call me!"

Joshua heard no more. In another moment a vision of white tulle flashed past him, and bounded into the ring. At the same instant almost, Bleuse, the gymnast, strolled up to where the droll stood, and tapped him playfully on the shoulder.

"Ah! M'sieu Marco! It is the beautiful one! Eh?"

For the life of him Joshua could not answer the man; and as his own name now echoed loudly, he walked slowly out on to the stage and gravely saluted the master of the ring.

That night, after the "show," Joshua determined to put his hopes to the test, and ask Estelle to be his wife. But, somehow, she contrived to evade giving him the opportunity. Try as he would she eluded him.

Then, the word was passed for the Continental tour. This was always Saroni's rich harvest-time, and preparations went on apace for the transference of everything and everybody to French soil.

They were to open in Compiègne (beloved of the third Bonaparte, the Man of Destiny); the first point of a triumphal progress, of which laughter-loving Vienna should be the end and crown.

On the eve of departure from England, Joshua succeeded in capturing Estelle for a brief moment. He told her that his private means were now exhausted; that there was no prospect of replenishment from his father's purse, and that thenceforward he must depend for support upon his professional earnings.

There was just the slightest possible shade of disappointment visible in her eyes, in the very smallest, almost imperceptible contraction of her pretty brows. But Joshua was in the mood rather to doubt his own senses than the object of his love. Still, he could not quite put the troublous thought away from him that something untoward (what, he knew not), was in the air.

He had loaded her in the shape of presents with the best that money could buy, while the money lasted, but now—well—there was an end to luxury and unlimited largesse. Hard, stern times, and the loveless son, the homeless, disinherited wanderer looked hungrily for a sympathetic response from the one into whose keeping he had surrendered his very self—his very soul!

She listened to him in that light-hearted way of hers that always had the power to hypnotise him, and to make of him an only too willing slave.

"When shall it be?—say, Estelle! When shall it be? Have pity on me! for suspense and the misery of hope deferred is torturing me beyond my power to bear!"

A light touch on his arm with the fan she always carried; a light, tinkling laugh, a few merry words in rapid French—words utterly unintelligible to the average Englishman—and she was gone.

Compiègne besieged and conquered, Saroni's combination departed for the sunny south within a week, pitching in the near vicinity of Marseilles.

Beneath the blue skies of southern France Joshua forgot, or seemed to forget, the past in the present, and yielded himself to the glorious influence of warmth, sunshine, and the perfumed air of Europe's wonder-garden.

On the third day of their arrival in the city, and there being, for some reason, no day performance, Joshua started for a ramble through the more ancient parts of the quaint old seaport.

At mid-day he entered a café on the main wharf, ordered, in his best French, a frugal meal, and looked curiously about him.

It was a fairly large place of the third-rate sort, most of the tables being unoccupied.

Near where he had planted himself, however, there was seated a party of four, three men and a woman.

From certain time-honoured indications of dress and demeanour; as, too, from certain becks, nods, smiles, and whispered confidences of the garrulous garçon, it was clear that it was a wedding feast, and that the morning's deed was being celebrated in the noontide cup.

The clown was hidden to a great extent from the view of the feasters by a large palm, but could distinctly see the faces of two of the quartette; both being unknown to him.

The other pair, one being the woman, had their backs to Joshua, and he, the place being dark and gloomy, could not form any accurate judgment as to their personal appearance.

Yet there was something strangely familiar to him in the contour and general air of both of them.

With many loud "here's to you's," did the guests at the little banquet pledge the healths of the evident bride and groom, and all this amidst much laughter and volubility.

Then the woman's voice made the listener's ears to tingle, and his heart to beat, for he knew it.

"Ah, but yes! He is the silly fool!—the what you call—moth—eh! Innocent? Yes! Not worth that, this good M'sieu Josué Olten! Non!" and the speaker sharply snapped her fingers, breaking out into a silvery laugh of derision.

Yes, he knew her! It was she—Estelle!—and her companion—her new-made husband, was Bleuse, the gymnast! He saw it all now

The gist of that which he heard was that he had been fooled—miserably fooled! The two, Estelle Dubois, and Henri Bleuse, had, all through the piece, been using him as a profitable orange, which, now that it was dry and nothing but peel, they had thrown down and trodden underfoot.

It seemed that they had agreed to keep secret the fact of their own engagement in order that they might, by means of the woman's wiles, the more surely draw the son of a notoriously rich man, into the net of their scheme of plunder.

Now that their victim had, perforce, disgorged his last penny, the farce, so far as he was concerned, was at an end; the jest, a sorry one, was played out, and the dupe was to be promptly dropped.

How, Joshua could not quite make out; he only knew that it was to be as soon as possible.

Then, he reflected that the end would probably be attained by means of a quarrel to be fixed upon him by the man.

If that were so, why he, Joshua, would be the first in the field.

Always, as we have seen, of a calm, impassive nature (save and except with regard to his love), he rose leisurely from his seat behind the palm, and walked across to where sat the merrymakers, all unconscious of his presence in their midst.

Taking up a full glass of wine from off the table, that stood in front of Bleuse, the clown dashed it deliberately in the gymnast's face.

Noise there was, and clamour, aided by a woman's shrieks, enough to waken the dead.

The garcon, apprehending trouble, closed the outer door, and besought the parties to depart peacefully, and arrange their quarrel elsewhere.

This had the effect of bringing matters to a conclusion.

In France it is yet possible, as everybody knows, to settle "affairs of honour" with sword or pistol, without much risk of incurring punishment. A challenge, therefore, on the part of Bleuse, was but a natural consequence, the Frenchman having, as the insulted, the option of choice of weapons, chose the sword.

Joshua, in the old days, had been reputed a good swordsman, beyond the average, he having gained expertness with foil and basket-hilt under the eye of a renowned master of fence.

They met in a quiet spot, just outside the city, and there, in the presence of two of their comrades, Joshua ran his antagonist through the body at the third pass.

It was but the work of a couple of minutes, hardly that.

Within the hour the survivor was safe on board a steamer, and bound for the Thames.

It took all his ready money, but then it meant freedom and perhaps even more than that.

It is some years now since it all happened, but although Marco, the droll, is at the summit of his profession, and rides upon the topmost crest of popular favour, he is a man out of whom the heart has been taken, for he lives as one quite indifferent to the future, in that it can never efface the past.

A short while since the one missing thread in the miserably tangled skein was supplied him unexpectedly.

Said his informant: "Your father, convinced that you were in every way outside the pale of Quaker sanctity (as he conceived it), contracted a violent and unnatural animus towards you. This feeling led him to secretly bribe the woman to lure you on to your own undoing, and in order that he might the more feasibly disinherit you. That, when the truth should out, your heart might be unmercifully wrung, he cared not; rather indeed did he glory in your surely coming misery."

"And this man was my father!" said Joshua. "God forgive him!"

He never again saw Estelle Bleuse, nee Dubois, although a whisper went the round of the profession that she had been seen, under another name, in Buenos Ayres, a queen as ever, the world at her feet. R. E.

THE BROKEN CHAIR.

GIACOMO went rapidly up the stairs to the fifth floor, and when he had reached the last landing, on which two doors opened, one at the right, and the other at the left he paused for a moment, drew a key from his pocket, and for a long time regarded the left-hand door, heaved a deep sigh, and then opened the door on the right.

As he stepped over the threshold he turned his h ad quickly and again gazed longingly at the other door, gave a second sigh, and finally stepped inside. On entering his little room, he removed his overcoat, took a chair, placed it beside the wall, seated himself thereon astride, lighted a cigarette and remained thus, watching the clouds of smoke that ascended to the ceiling, every few minutes placing his ear against the wall.

Suddenly, his face, hitherto clouded, assumed an expression of joy. Some one was moving about in the other room.

"She has come home," murmured the young man, and, in fact, a sound of chairs and dishes could now be heard.

"She is preparing supper," again murmured Giacomo, and, leaning his head against the wall, he tried to catch every movement of his neighbour, for, though he could not see her, he was happy in feeling that she was there, and in thus being able to live next door to her.

Poor Giacomo! He feared that he should never again behold her, and this was indeed a great grief to him. At one time he had been accustomed to see her often, for he used to arrange to meet her on the stairs, and there he was wont to await her coming for hours, and on seeing her approach at a distance of hastily ascending a few steps in order to give her time to arrive, when he would go slowly down stairs, feigning to meet her by chance.

Her name was Carlotta. She supported herself by doing embroidery, going out early every morning and returning to her home in the evening.

Digitized by Google

She had come to live in this house the preceding year. At first he had only thought of her as a pretty girl, and no more. Then, by degrees, living there thus beside her, he had ended by always thinking of her and by loving her with his whole heart. If she had only been willing to say a word or two to him, or if he had only had the courage to speak, his declaration would have been brief, but conclusive—thus, for instance:

"Signorina, I love you. Will you be my wife?"

But then, alas, in order to offer his hand to the girl it was necessary that the hand should contain something, and Giacomo, unfortunately, had nothing. He was a painter whose canvases found no purchasers, so that the poor boy had been compelled to sell his furniture in order to pay his rent. Nothing now remained save his bed and this wretched, shabby old cane chair, that was only held together by a miracle and on which he was now seated smoking, and lending an ear to the slightest sound that proceeded from the other side of the wall.

Sometimes when seated as usual, astride his chair, he would close his eyes and give free rein to his imagination.

"Who knows of what she may now be thinking?" he would ask himself. "Who knows but that she may even suspect that I am here beside her? Ah, if she only knew how I loved her!" And the temptation would then seize him to make some disturbance in order to attract the girl's attention, such as the discharge of a weapon like some make-believe assassin, who fires a revolver loaded with powder at a passing prince simply that people may talk about him. But the fear of displeasing her restrained him, and he preferred that she should never know that he loved her rather than to be sure that she would never care for him.

Then he fell to building castles in the air.

"It is impossible," thought he, "that she should never think of me at all. She knows that there is such a person as myself; that I live directly adjoining her. When she comes home she can see that there is a light in my room through the door that I leave ajar. Like all women she must have some curiosity and at times must surely ask herself what I am doing, and why I never go out. Perhaps she has already noticed me, notwithstanding my awkwardness, possibly precisely on that account. She may even have divined that I love her. She may expect me to declare myself, and, seeing that I dare not do so, perhaps she will make the first advances. But how can I manage that she shall not delay doing so?"

And Giacomo, still astride his chair, continued his reflections. Suppose he were to write her a letter and push it under the door? He had often thought of doing so. But, then, would the girl have read it? And, even admitting that she had, would not the very first words have wounded her? Should he try and get her to speak of some one? But of whom, then? They had no friend in common. No, no. All these means were decidedly objectionable or impossible. There was nothing to be done but to wait. But, oh, how long would he have to do so?

Meanwhile it was growing late, and Carlotta, in her little room, was making the needle fly rapidly. She had decided to finish the piece of work begun that night, and in order not to fall asleep she was singing.

Giacomo naturally sat up likewise, still in the same position, listening, and mechanically keeping time with his body to the measure of the melody. When the tune was a slow one, all went well, but when it grew quicker his motions became dangerous, for the poor trembling chair was constrained to execute gymnastics far beyond its strength.

After awhile the girl began to grow weary, and the grand arias which she had been singing from the first to the last notes were followed by fragments of songs interrupted now and again, while the tones of her voice grew lower and sweeter, and to cavatinas succeeded "romances" and "reveries."

Giacomo, still seated upon his chair, was not getting drowsy, but continued to stay there, listening to the songs as in a sort of dream, mechanically keeping time by the swaying of his body to the measure of the music.

Carlotta also was falling asleep, but then decided not to go to bed till her work was quite finished, and so made a supreme effort to shake off the drowsiness that was overpowering her, and in order to do so, suddenly began lustily to sing a waltz. Giacomo was now dreaming. Of course he was dreaming of waltzing, and so moved himself about, keeping time to the music, but to this final proof of its strength the chair refused to respond and, with a fearful screeching sound, gave way, dragging down in its fall the unfortunate cavalier.

This caused such a terrific crash that Carlotta, overcome with fright, uttered a loud cry, but Giacomo was silent, for the poor fellow in falling had struck his head against the bed, and now lay stretched upon the floor in a deep swoon.

When he finally regained consciousness, he found himself lying on his bed with his head bandaged, and there beside him, watching over him while embroidering, and seated upon a chair that was neither old nor shabby he beheld a lovely young girl, and whom should it be but Carlotta!

"How is this?" he exclaimed. "You here, signorina?"

"Yes, signor. Last night after the commotion caused by your fall, not hearing any further sound, I feared that some misfortune had befallen you, and so came here and found you in a faint. Now, however, you are much better, and in a few days you will be quite yourself again. But tell me, how in the world did you ever happen to fall off your chair in so strange a manner?"

Giacomo did not reply, and blushed deeply. But women are quick to divine the sentiments that they inspire, and Carlotta was not long in reading the young man's heart.

And now Giacomo and Carlotta are husband and wife, and as happy as it is possible to be in this world. Carlotta is no longer compelled to embroider. The sale of some of her husband's pictures, for he is now beginning to be known, is sufficient to provide for them both. They are living in a simple but pretty apartment, tastefully furnished, and are held in high esteem by all who know them.

One thing, however, causes their friends to wonder. In the place of honour, in the centre of their tiny drawing room, there stands a great ugly cane chair which is in so rickety a condition that in order to maintain it in an upright position Carlotta has been compelled to bind it together with cords.

How Jones Broke Whales to Harness.

"It is strange," said Jones reflectively, as he puffed vigorously at his cigar, "that Jackson Peters never tells us of any more of his ideas for inventions. The last thing was his ingenious notion of putting hinges on the trunks of fruit trees, so that in case of high wind they could be turned down. You never perfected that plan, did you, Jackson?" And Jones turned towards the young man with great apparent interest.

"The thing could be done," answered Peters, as if Jones had cast doubts on its practicability. "And it would be a great boon to fruit-growers in draughty parts of the country. Lately I've been wondering that more progress is not made by inventors in the line of submarine war-boats."

"Possibly you could get some marine hints from an account of my experience with the Leviathan Towing and Transportation Line, which I worked in the late eighties," admitted Jones. "You remember the line, Robinson?"

Robinson answered "Yes," without a blush.

"One night after I went to bed," continued Jones, "it occurred to me that, though hundreds of land animals are of use to man while living, not one of the sea animals has ever been put to any practical use till dead. It seemed probable that the most useful purpose to which living land animals were put by man was as draught animals, of which we may take the horse and the ox as examples. Why were not the animals of the sea used for draught purposes? I became so excited that I lay awake all night thinking about it. The result was the Leviathan Towing and Transportation Line.

"During all my life to think has been to act, therefore you need not be surprised to know that in a month I had left Liverpool on a chartered whaling steamer, looking for whales. I had decided that the whale was the animal most suited to my purpose. Off the coast of Labrador we sighted a large school of whales. Fortunately it was a graded school, so to say, consisting of true whales, Greenland whales, humpbacked whales, fin-backed whales, spermaceti whales, and so forth.

"We had considerable trouble in driving them at first, but I rigged up a fog-horn with a reed, so it would say 'shoo,' and they soon learnt what it meant, and we worked them along down the coast by easy stages. A good many of the more skittish ran back, and I thought at one time that I might have to send a tug ahead with a herring on the end of a stick to coax them; but we finally got them down to Gardiner's Bay, Long Island, and grounded them in the shallow water.

"Of course it has always been self-evident that the whale would make a splendid driving animal if he could be controlled. The most important and hardest thing was clearly to keep him from diving. A careful study showed me that the whale could not dive without first putting his head down; therefore, all that was needed was a bearing rein sufficiently strong to restrain him in that respect.

"I selected a fine whale about seventy-five feet long, which I had noticed was a good traveller, and proceeded to harness him. I put a bit about four inches in diameter in his mouth, with ten-foot check rings on each side. From this bit I ran a hawser along his back, and round his tail, where the flukes are joined to the body. I then put on a large collar, attached a mud barge by four-inch wire cables, and turned him towards deep water for a trial spin.

"Naturally, of course, that whale did not readily take to harness. He reared up, rolled over, charged ahead, struck out fiercely with his flukes, blew a stream of water like an artesian well, and otherwise misbehaved himself. His efforts to dive were something startling, but the bearing-rein held, and he finally gave it up.

"I had wire-cable reins connected with the wheel in the pilot-house, and stood there and guided him, occasionally touching him up with a bamboo fishing-rod. In two hours I could manage him fairly well, and in a week he was fully broken, though he always remained hard-mouthed, and was never what you might call a lady's whale.

"I then went on and broke the others of the school for harness. I found the Greenlands made the best draught animals, and I used them in towing lighters, canal boats, barges, and so forth, either driving them single, or two abreast. The fin-backs I soon discovered were the best driving beasts, being light, active and stylish.

"I took a young and quick-stroke fin-back for my own private use, and used him on my yacht. He was a free goer, and a little inclined to fight shy at lighthouses and promontories, but gentle as a kitten. He could throw spray in the face of any other whale along the coast. He was better on a smooth track, but did not make a bad showing outside, where the track was heavy. He was always rather nervous about being harnessed, and it usually took two men to get him into the shafts.

"I gave up the business on account of the continued opposition of the steamboat people. They made various ridiculous charges, and got the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals excited. The absurd cry was set up that my bearing reins were cruel, and that I was docking the flukes of my driving animals. They also got a law enacted requiring me to stop every fifty miles and feed my whales out of a nose-bag made from a balloon—something utterly uncalled for.

"The charge of fast driving was likewise made against me, and a law was passed prohibiting a speed of above forty-five miles an hour. Finally I gave the whole scheme up and turned my whales loose. I am essentially a man of peace, esteeming quietude above all things. Strife is as distasteful to me as an untruth.

"The whales lapsed into barbarism, but did not utterly forget their cunning. Two years later, when the barque Curlew tried to take my fin-back off the coast of Greenland, he dodged the harpoon, took it in his mouth like a tooth-pick, and punched the boats so full of holes with it that they looked like nutmeg-graters." SIR HUGH ELVILLE was not in the best of tempers as he walked aimlessly through the avenue which led to the public road.

Every now and again he would stop and vent his spleen by cutting off the head of some unoffending flower; while the dog which he was leading by a chain would come in for a share of his master's wrath. Reaching the lodge gates the baronet turned at right angles, and continued his walk beside the hedge which formed the boundary of the park.

The anger of the old nobleman seemed to increase with each successive step.

"The estate is going to the dogs, and there is nothing but bankruptcy staring me in the face. I have had to curtail my establishment, and before long I shall have to give up the pack. These are small matters, but they are the forerunners of complete and irretrievable ruin."

Reaching a quiet spot he again commenced his maledictions:

"Thanks to those rascals—Felwin and Bardale—I am reduced to this. It was no error in judgment on their part when they advised me to sell out my Government stocks and purchase mining shares with the proceeds. The transaction has involved me in losses such as I shall never retrieve. This comes of reposing absolute confidence in stockbrokers, who have had but their own nefarious ends in view from the beginning—— "

The remainder of the sentence was left unfinished, for, proceeding up the lane behind the hedge, was his daughter Gwendoline, and by her side walked Bernadin Vallertin, the sight of whom seemed to drive the baronet into renewed frenzy.

Unseen, but seeing, the latter peered through the hedge, and, for the moment, he appeared to lose control of himself. His first impulse was to dash forward and at once put a stop to the interview; but, as there was no means of egress, he contented himself with watching the pair until they disappeared in the distance, and then he recommenced his tirade against his misfortunes.

"And that it should have come to this! My only child to take up with a common adventurer—a Frenchman, whose origin is such that he seeks to hide it from us, and that, too, after an acquaintance of a year's duration.

"I have warned Gwendoline; but all to no purpose apparently. Sterner methods, therefore, are called for. The presuming foreigner must be taught once and for all that his advances are impertinent, and that they are not in accordance with the traditions of the House of Elville!"

The baronet turned proudly upon his heel, and made his way back slowly in the direction of the mansion.

"And you find the company of Bernadin Vallertin more congenial than that of your father's more intimate friends?"

The question was put by Elville to his daughter on the morning after he had been a witness to her meeting with the Frenchman.

Gwendoline tried in vain to suppress the blush that rose to her cheeks as she replied:

"I cannot quite understand you, father; I am at a loss to know what it is that prompts you to make such an inquiry."

"Is it necessary for me to explain myself? Surely, my child, you would not go so far as to deny that you spent a considerable portion of your time yesterday in a ramble with the man to whom I am alluding."

The tell-tale crimson which rose to the girl's face told its own story. To deceive her father never entered into her mind. She had a predilection for the handsome foreigner, it was true, but, knowing her father's hasty disposition, she hesitated to acquaint him with the fact that the meeting with Vallertin had been prearranged.

"Has it come to this—for the only living representative of the House of Elville to be brought down to the level of an unknown foreigner? Are not the losses which I have sustained through the knavery of my brokers sufficient of themselves, or must you—my only child, add still further to my humiliation by encouraging one of the common people?"

"But, father," pleaded the girl, with tears in her eyes "surely you are prejudiced—unreasonably prejudiced against Bernadin!"

"Bernadin! You must indeed have made progress in this familiarity if you can speak of that upstart by his Christian name? Really, Gwendoline, I shall soon begin to think that you are attempting to test the limits of my patience. Have you not the entrée into the highest society in the county? Have I not given you every opportunity that lies in my power that you may associate with your equals in birth and position? Must I accuse you of ingratitude as well as bad taste? Who is this Frenchman, I should like to know, who presumes to associate with his betters? A chance acquaintance that we made at Aix les Bains—nothing else!"

"And an acquaintance, father, whom you favoured. You lavished every praise upon him when we met at the Hotel Angleterre, and you remarked at the time how highly you esteemed him. He was your constant companion for weeks, and you must surely forget that you gave him an open invitation to Hawleigh Towers in the event of his ever paying a visit to England. I must confess that I cannot understand this sudden change in your opinions, and I think you must have some hidden reason for taking such a dislike to the man whom you were once pleased to regard as a desirable friend."

"Then I am to be called to account by my own daughter!" exclaimed Erville, with warmth. "I do not deny that the acquaintanceship of Bernadin Vallertin was congenial—the temporary acquaintance, I should say. He is a man of considerable fortune, and as such, he proved of great service to me. I have no doubt that I should have been exposed to consequences which, at the time, I trembled to think of, had it not been for his intervention. I was losing heavily at the tables, but a timely loan from him saved me. That loan was repaid in due course, and I never dreamt that he would one day take up his residence in the neighbourhood of Hawleigh Towers as he has now done. As a travelling acquaintance I appreciated his company, but, at home, I consider that it is undesirable, and any advances on his part I regard in the light of an unqualified impertinence."

The last utterance of the Baronet was accompanied by an impatient stamp of the foot, and Gwendoline saw that further argument was useless.

After the above recorded interview was over, Sir Hugh Elville retired to his study.

For the space of a full half-hour he sat meditating in front of the fire. Several letters were lying upon the table, the sight of which caused him no little uneasiness. Only too well did he divine their contents. Summoning up courage he at last ventured to open them. He had not been mistaken in his surmises as to the tenor of the batch of correspondence which was addressed to him. Demands for a speedy settlement of long-standing debts, coupled with threats of litigation in the event of non-payment by certain specified dates, stared him in the face.

He groaned aloud as he turned over the heap. The unfortunate speculations he had been advised to make had left him without ready money. The deeds of his estates were in the hands of his bankers as cover against the heavy overdraft which they had granted him.

He was at his wits' end to know how to meet his liabilities. He recalled the meeting of Gwendoline and the Frenchman, and then he muttered to himself—"I could have put a stop to this degradation if I had had the money. Gwendoline, without doubt, is infatuated with the dashing foreigner, and I would have taken her away for a year's travelling to cure her of her folly. But it is useless now to think of such a course. My absence would be regarded in the light of an attempt to

How the Doctors Make Money.

£4,000,000 OUT OF COUGHS AND COLDS.

The English climate—especially at this season—is a source of untold wealth to the medical fraternity. A recent estimate shows that the people of the British Isles spend £4,000,000 on coughs and colds; £3,500,000 on bronchitis; £2,750,000 on pneumonia and £1,250,000 on asthma. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness cost one and three-halfpence a box or two and ninepence for a box containing three times the quantity, and they are the safest and surest preventive of coughs and colds, with their more serious after-consequences. They speedily put the liver, digestive organs and kidneys to rights, and keep them in healthy condition. The secretions of the body thus safeguarded, and the bile flow and the flow of gastric juice put into order, vigorous liver action and hearty digestive powers are the consequences. Tone is imparted to the system, and the strength and vigour generated, which is necessary to throw off, not only colds and coughs, but the more serious disorders, bronchitis, asthma, pneumonia, and pleurisy.

For the trying weather to be expected during the next few months, when rapid changes of temperature sleet, rain, hail and wind will severely try the best of constitutions, the wisest method is to act on the defensive, and to avert the season's ailments by use of this famous vegetable preparation. Every chemist stocks Chas. Forde's Bile Beans, or you may obtain post free, from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, E.C., by sending prices one and three-halfpence or two and ninepence per box. Bile Beans are sold only in sealed boxes; never loose.

evade my creditors. Disgrace stares me in the face; but bankruptcy is preferable to the alliance of an Elville with one of the 'herd!' Vallertin has wealth, of that I am assured, and I know that he would remove my financial difficulties, were I to receive him as a future member of our family. That, alas, would be the price of his favour—but it cannot be dreamt of—I will not entertain the thought for a single moment!"

A haughty expression passed over Elville's features as he added, "To-morrow, Gwendoline shall know that I forbid her to meet the Frenchman, that, henceforth, he is to be a stranger to the Towers. She shall hear my commands the first thing, and then I will proceed to London and interview the family solicitors."

* * * * *

Sir Hugh was as good as his word.

Immediately he rose on the morning after he had come to the decision to terminate the friendship between his daughter and Vallertin, he gave orders for the brougham to be ready to take him to the station, and in the meanwhile he waited for Gwendoline to put in her appearance at the breakfast-table.

This, however, she failed to do at the appointed time, but her maid brought word to say that her young mistress was feeling indisposed, and that she preferred to take her breakfast in her bedroom.

"Indisposed, indeed! A case of love sickness, which will soon be cured. I am not to be frustrated, and Gwendoline will see before long the wisdom of my resolution."

The meal was hurried through, for the first train was due to start in less than an hour.

Having a few minutes to spare, Elville snatched up a sheet of paper, and writing out the decision he had made on the night previous, he directed one of the servants to give it to his daughter without delay.

The brougham drove off, and a few moments later Gwendoline, pale from the effects of a sleepless night, and with her eyes full of tears, descended the staircase and made her way into the study.

She had made up her mind as to the course to pursue. Deeply as she loved Bernadin, her duty to her father stood before every other consideration. She had anticipated that her parent would forbid all further friendship with Bernadin; and, with a heavy heart, she commenced a letter to her lover and explained to him the reason why she was now forbidden all intercourse with him.

The visit to the family solicitors had been productive of no better results than Sir Hugh had expected.

Immediately he returned, he shut himself up in his study and gave way to the gloomiest reflections.

He was a ruined man, and he knew that nothing short of a miracle could save him from ignominy.

He unlocked the drawers of his bureau and took out the letters which he had gone through the night before. Several others of like import had arrived during his visit to London, and, with a trembling hand he sorted them, first in one order, then in another.

He scarcely knew what he was doing. He seemed to be dazed as he meditated upon the inevitable consequences of his rash speculations. Unlocking the door of a cabinet, he took out a decanter of brandy. He had poured out a glassful of the spirit and was on the point of swallowing it when a tapping on the door arrested his attention.

"A visitor to see you, sir!"

"A visitor, at this hour of the day!" exclaimed the ·onet, as he snatched up the card which was lying upon the salver. He read the inscription—a name that was quite unfamiliar to him.

"The Count d'Esrolles! I know no one of that title—a perfect stranger to me—I have not even a creditor of that name."

Making his way to the reception room, Elville found awaiting him there no other than Bernadin.

"An unexpected visit this, Monsieur Vallertin." Sir Hugh remarked icily.

"Count d'Esrolles, if you please," added the Frenchman with a coolness that took the baronet aback.

"Count d'Esrolles!" ejaculated the latter with amazement. He hardly knew what interpretation to put upon Bernadin's revelation. He thought that it was but a fresh piece of impertinence on the part of Vallertin who, reading the other's countenance, replied:

"Yes. I am Bernadin Vallertin—also Count d'Esrolles. You hesitate, perhaps, in accepting my claim to that title, but I can give you proofs of my identity—here is one."

Bernadin, as he spoke, produced from his pocket a copy of Le Monde Illustré, in which he pointed out a page that was devoted to a likeness of a man who bore the name—Le Comte d'Esrolles.

Elville saw at a glance that the portrait was that of Bernadin himself.

"You, doubtless, are able to divine the motives which have led me to seek this interview. In plain words, I ask for the hand of your daughter. I have good reason to believe that Gwendoline is not wholly indifferent to my advances. I will not dwell at length upon the object which has prompted me to come into this neighbourhood, and to pass myself as 'Monsieur Vallertin.' It was from love of your daughter alone that I acted the part of a friend in need when you were in difficulties at Aix. It is from love of her that I have hidden my present whereabouts from my own family, who are averse to my seeking a union with a foreigner. You will pardon me these candid statements, but circumstances demand a freedom of speech, which otherwise I should never have dreamt of adopting. Gwendoline has already acquainted me with the fact that you have forbidden a continuance of our friendship; and now that I have given you an explanation, am I to understand that you still regard my suit as unwelcome?"

Elville quavered as he listened to the straightforward avowal of the man who was addressing him, and he felt keenly the rebuke which was administered to his proud spirit. In a broken voice he replied:

"Forgive me, d'Esrolles, my hastiness. I am utterly ashamed of the unhappy attitude that I have adopted, and I crave your pardon!"

* * * * *

"Gwendoline, darling!" whispered Bernadin in the ear of his lovely bride, "I have a secret which I cannot keep any longer from you. How it has pained me, no tongue can tell—that I should have been guilty of deceiving your father, but it was my only course to win you, and to save him from utter ruin. I am Bernadin Vallertin—plain 'Monsieur,' and nothing else!"

"And your title was but an assumed one, Bernadin?"

"Yes, and no, Gwendoline!" Le Comte d'Esrolles was but my stage name. Ten years ago did I play that part at the Theatre Français, and, with such a degree of success that I was able to retire from the stage one of the richest men in the profession!"

Short Stories That . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 6th. Postcards only, please.

His Parting Shot.

HE: "But couldn't you learn to love me, Ida?" She: "I don't think I could, George." He (reaching for his hat): "It is as I feared. You are too old to learn."

Woman's Gentle Sway.

"HAVE a cigar?" "No, thank you. I've given up smoking entirely." "You have, eh? Allow me to congratulate you. When is the wedding to take place?"

Unfair Advantage.

JESS: "I thought that you hated Jack, and yet you have accepted him." Bess: "I did hate him; but he proposed under an umbrella, and said if I refused he would let the rain drip on my new bonnet."

Hadn't Time.

"So you went to the country on Sunday, Mrs. Hogg, I hear?" "Yes, me and the old man thought we'd have a change." "And what did you see when you got there?" "Nothing. It was a cheap trip, and we had to start off home again."

A Polite Dog.

MOTHER: "Did you thank the gentleman who carried you across the crowded street?" Wee Son: "I tried to, but I didn't know what to say—the words wouldn't come somehow; but I think it's all right, 'cause my dog wagged his tail enough for both of us."

Whose was Best.

ENTHUSIASTIC ARTIST: "Do you know I painted a picture of a lion so naturally that it had to be placed behind bars." Enthusiastic Author: "That's nothing. I wrote a novel so full of burning emotion that it had to be printed on asbestos pages for fear of consuming them."

Piling-up the Punishment.

A CONVICT in a German prison had been extremely refractory. One means and another had been tried, but nothing could break his spirit. One morning the governor said to the keeper, "I say, Huber, the scoundrel is behaving worse than ever. Put him on bread and water." "But he is already doing two fast days." "Then give him a cookery book to read."

What Raised the Circulation.

"WHAT'S this I hear?" asked the business manager of the Tooting Tootler, as he entered the publisher's room. "You don't mean to tell me that all of last week's papers are sold?" "Not a copy left," responded the clerk. "And wasn't there an extra edition printed?" "Yes, sir, two of them; but they are all sold out, and the people are asking for more." "What's causing the wonderful sale?" "The society editor inserted a line in last week's paper saying that Miss Smith is the most beautiful young lady in town. He didn't say which Miss Smith, and that's the reason of it."

How They Would Decide.

WEALTHY AMATEUR: "Since you spoke to Jones and myself about this picture, Cadmium, we have arranged that one of us shall have it." Cadmium (brightening): "I am glad of that, very glad; glad on your account, too. Which of you has it?" Wealthy Amateur: "Well, we are going to toss up for it, and the one that loses takes the picture."

A Redeeming Feature.

A.: "My dwelling is bounded on the north by gas works, on the south by some indiarubber works, on the west by a vinegar manufactory, and on the east by a glue-boiling establishment." B.: "A nice neighbourhood, I must say." A.: "Quite so; but it has one advantage. I can always tell which way the wind blows without looking at the weathercock."

Knew What Would Happen.

QUICKPEN (a bookkeeper): "Hello, Thumper, where to?" Thumper (a typewriter): "I'm going to the country for a month's holiday. I've just been discharged by Closefist to make room for a young woman at a smaller salary. I'll have my old place back in about a month." Quickpen: "Think so?" Thumper: "Oh, yes. She'll marry him by that time, and after that she'll make him employ a man."

Payment According to Name Wanted.

"WHAT'S the matter, William?" said the wealthy householder. "Anything gone wrong?" "Not exactly gone wrong, sir, but I want a new understanding." "What about?" "My pay, sir." "Why, you get very good wages for a cook." "Yes, sir; they does very well for a cook, sir. But I overheard you when you were talking to your friends, sir. You called me your chef." "Well, you ought to be complimented." "Yes, sir, I'm complimented; but business is business. I can't be a chef for less than £800. Wages is all right for a cook, but a chef has to have a salary."

The Professional Habit.

HERE is a little tonsorial joke which, whether true or untrue, amusingly illustrates the force of habit. A hairdresser was summoned to a private house the other day simply to shave a pet poodle. The young lady of the house, hearing a sound of a voice in the room in which the operation was being performed, put her ear delicately to the keyhole, and this is what she heard: "Nice day, sir. (Pause.) Razor suit you, sir? (Pause.) Good deal of weather, sir, lately. (Pause.) A little powder, sir? (Pause.) Hair's very thin, sir, on the top; wants a bottle of hair restorer; shampoo, sir? (Growl.) Next!"

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, January 13th, 1902.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

NUMERICAL ENIGMA.

My whole is a couplet of Pope, containing 68 letters, showing his opinion of omens.

Among the nations who have believed in omens were the 11, 19, 23, 28, 42, 9, and 25, 5, 29, 8, 38, 15; the 16, 56, 26, 44, 39, 10, 31, 34, 27, 54, 65, 49, 36, and the 50, 33, 2, 7, 18, 12, 16.

In 30, 51, 11, 6, 61, 2, 23, 67, an important place has always been given to 24, 14, 19, 20, 41.

A 67, 1, 37, 59 is to the sailor an omen of fair weather.

The croak of the 33, 40, 27, 48, 12, and the 4, 45, 46, 3 of an owl were evil omens.

Many found omens in 32, 25, 68, 26, 47, 55.

To dream of gold was a presage of 43, 58, 64, 56, 23, 63, 55.

It was an ill omen to look at the new moon first through a 17, 2, 31, 39, 57, 35, but a sign of good luck to see it first at your 33, 2, 11, 22, 21, 53, 8, 38, 32.

It was ill-luck to put one's 9, 13, 46, 48, 43 on "awry."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"67 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

MRS. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Rischolm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 8st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced I is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weigh was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since Send me a box for my mother."

FROM THE GATES OF DEATH.

THE STORY OF A GREAT QUEST.

Being the sequel to "My Millionaire Patient," which appeared in SHORT STORIES dated November 23rd, 1901.

In Explanation.

Some ten years before the happening of the things herein contained, one Siever Crafte, a monstrously rich American, but a man with regard to whom mysterious rumour had much to say, called upon Dr. Septimus Ewles, then administrator of anæsthetics at St. Andrew's Hospital, London, late one night, at his private residence, after a preliminary visit on the morning of the same day, ostensibly as a patient.

Crafte, who was a man of strong will, by means of hypnotic influence, endeavours to bend the doctor to participation in his, Crafte's, schemes, which endeavour fails, through the timely intervention of Haidée Van Cloo, Ewles' betrothed.

Haidée had become casually acquainted with Crafte on a previous occasion in Paris, and owing to his unwelcome attentions, had contracted a deep feeling of disgust for him.

Crafte gone from the house, Haidée imparts her fears to her lover, which are only too surely verified by the successive, ceaseless persecution of the doctor by his millionaire patient. Day and night, here, there, and everywhere, does the American pursue, and torture the other by means of a diabolical system of whispered suggestion.

Then matters crystallise. Haidee writes to Ewles at the Hospital, making an appointment for him to meet her in Piccadilly. He keeps the tryst, but she fails to come. Next day reveals the fact that she has disappeared, and also, at almost the same hour, Siever Crafte, drops out of sight.

Detective Inspector Ryan, of Scotland Yard, then gives Ewles such information as leads him to believe that Haidee Van Cloo has gone away with Crafte. Whether willingly or by coercion, the doctor cannot say, the fact alone remains that the two vanished almost simultaneously.

Possessed with an overmastering desire for revenge upon the man whom he supposes to have wrought him this wrong, Ewles throws up his post at St. Andrew's, and only confiding in a medical friend, decides to go in quest of his enemy and his love.

The only clue to Crafte's movements is that obtained by Inspector Ryan, who discovers for the doctor that the American and a lady booked at Charing Cross for Frankfort, on the night of the 19th of June.

Frankfort, therefore, is obviously the first point of Septimus Ewles' search.

CHAPTER I.

THE OLD HOUSE IN THE JUDENSTRASSE, FRANKFORT.

IT was the evening of the 17th of January last year; within an hour of midnight, in fact.

Two men sat, one on either side a plain deal table, in an upper room, or roof-chamber, of a high, tumble-down old house, in the Judenstrasse, Frankfort-on-the-Main.

One of the twain was an elderly, slovenly, and not too cleanly man. Unmistakably a German Jew, he was spectacled, and boasted a long, unkempt, white beard, that descended almost to his waist.

He had an evil eye, had this same old Herr Isaachar Gaben, the most rascally money-changer the whole continent over; an eye which, in spite of yourself, forced itself upon you, as something to be unpleasantly reckoned with. But his words were as a mixture of butter and honey, so softly sweet were they.

Englishman was plainly written upon every point and feature of the other man. Well set-up, and with honest blue eyes that preached truth and kindliness every time they met your own, he yet looked to be harassed and worried; physically and mentally "run down" even.

"And so the Herr Doctor is resolved to seek out his American friend," the old Jew was saying (there was no doubt as to his Semitic origin); "well! well! The English are a wonderful people!—a wonderful people!"

"All that is beside the mark. I believe you to have information as to this man, Siever Crafte's present whereabouts."

"I have told you," replied the other, with a shrug that sent his shoulders up to his ear-tops, "I know him—this Herr Crafte, but—it is long since I saw him; two—th—"

"Saw him—yes!" broke in Septimus Ewles, impatiently, "but heard of him—no!—I am convinced that you and he are in close correspondence—you can't deny it!"

Herr Graben's naturally bad temper was only conventionally restrained, just as his oily politeness was but skin-deep.

"Find him!—you!—"—he snarled. "Me!—I know nothing!—I tell you nothing!—You come to me, and say: 'I want the Herr Crafte!—I must find him!' Well—find him!—it is your business—it is none of mine."

Septimus Ewles was about to reply to this tirade, when the room door opened softly, and a girl—or woman rather, for she was fully six or seven-and-twenty—entered, and approached the old Jew.

The old man, who had risen from his seat in the excitement of his last utterance, glanced at her angrily.

"Katrina!" he said, shaking his skinny forefinger at her vehemently. "Go away! I told you I would not be disturbed. Go away!"

It was a sad, a very sad face, that of the girl, a face implying much, and hard sorrow, patiently endured; much soul-depression, fought back in the face of great and terrible odds.

Still, with it all, there was a gleam of the higher intelligence in her eyes; an appearance of keen concentration in her attitude of passive attention to her father's semi-savage reproof.

"I did but seek to bid you to supper," she said, with a half-glance of curiosity at the stranger. "Will it please you to come now?"

"No! I am busy, cannot you see, slow-wit that you are, with the Herr Englishman. Go! I will come presently."

Was it fancy—or did Septimus Ewles really see a warning look in the girl's eyes, as she turned to move towards the room door? Was the finger upon the lip meant as a silent underlining of the warning?

It would seem so.

"Look you!" snarled the old Jew, after his daughter had left the room and closed the door. "Look you! What interest have I in finding this Herr Crafte, even supposing that I know where he is?"

"Then you do know!" quickly returned the other.

"I did not say so—I do not say so. But you have not answered my question."

"Because I have changed my mind."

"Well?"

"I came to you about this matter because it was told me (how, I prefer not to say), that you have, or had relations with the man I seek."

"Shu!—you do not know!—no one knows!" angrily interrupted the old man.

"That is as it may be," quietly went on his companion. "Now I have determined to do without your aid; although you have said quite enough to give me more than a fair clue to Siever Crafte's hiding-place. This, and something that has just occurred to me, has decided me to—well—to go to work my own way."

"I care not!—I care not!" cried the doubly-baffled Israelite, his cupidity unsatisfied; his curiosity with regard to the doctor's plans ungratified also. "You will never find him—this Herr Siever Crafte—never!—without me! Come!—give me—give me five hundred of your pounds—ten thousand reichsmarks, and I will find him for you."

"No!—my mind is made up—I will save my money—and—gain my end."

In sheer impotence of disappointed greed, the wretched old money-huckster leant across the table and snapped his claw-like fingers in the Englishman's face.

"Bah!" he almost screamed, "I will give you twenty thousand!—fifty thousand!—a million marks! if you find him!"

"Thanks!—that is very good of you," said Ewles rising, and taking his hat. "Perhaps I may have to remind you of the offer some day."

But Isaachar Gaben spoke no more. Taking up the lamp he made to light his visitor down the dark, rickety stairway of the crazy old house. At the first floor he stopped, and without word or sign, passed through into a room, the door of which stood open, leaving the doctor to find his way out as best he might.

It was as dark as Erebus. Down the creaky, bare staircase he felt his way—his only guide a faint streak of light, coming from the ill-fitting street door.

He was about to move the handle of the lock, when a soft touch upon his arm told him that he was not alone.

"Mein herr!" (he recognised Katrina's voice whispering in his ear), "I have heard your errand.

"Sh!—My father is right—by yourself you will never find the man you seek. But—(do not speak) start at once—this very hour—for Marseilles—there ship for Pekin by the shortest route. If you reach the Chinese capital before noon of the 2nd of March, you will hear of Siever Crafte in the smoking-room of the English club-house. Good night."

"Stay," whispered Ewles excitedly. "You have told me much, you must tell me more! Is—is there a lady with him?"

"No!—a thousand times no!"

"Do you know where she is?"

"You will know when you reach Pekin. But my father is stirring—sh!"

"Katrina!"

A light came out of the room on the first floor, and would soon have shone down the stairway, revealing the pair by the door.

She deftly, however, shot back the bolt, and gently pushing Ewles into the street, silently closed the door behind him.

At that moment half-past-twelve sounded solemnly from high up in the steeple of St. Bartholémy.

Setting his face in the direction of his hotel, Septimus Ewles looked up joyously into the star-flecked sky.

"Thank God!" he cried looking up, as if to ask sympathy from the lights of Heaven. "I shall find my love, and—my foe!"

CHAPTER II.

On the Trail.

It was in the early morning of February 23rd when Septimus Ewles landed at the Bund, Shanghai.

Everything had a new and strange flavour for him, his previous travelling experience having been limited to an annual Continental trip, and, five years before, to a three months' tour through the States. Chinatown, San Francisco, was the nearest like to anything celestial he had ever seen, although in itself Shanghai is too cosmopolitan, too much Westernised, to be altogether accepted as a genuine example of a typical Chinese city. As he saw it in the morning sun, from the deck of the fussy little steam launch that had gone out to meet the Pacific Mail steamer, Orient Queen, at the Woosung Bar, or "Heavenly Barrier," at the mouth of the Yang-tse-Kiang, lying, lustrously white, as a pearl upon the water, he thought it a sight beautiful beyond conceiving.

He had, before leaving London, been furnished with sundry letters of introduction, addressed to well-known English people abroad, and it is with one of them in his hand, that he makes his way, by wheelbarrow conveyance, to a certain bungalow on the Sickaway road.

It is the house of the junior member of a large mercantile and banking firm, but now occupied temporarily by a harbour official, and Ewles' object is to procure such information as shall enable him to do the Pekin journey in the right way, and with as little delay as possible.

"Glad to know you, doctor!" said Captain Fearies, the deputy-master of the port. "Harrington tells me that this is quite a romantic expedition of yours. I have to tell you that it is, at this particular moment, a most dangerous one."

"Dangerous or not, I must go through with it," replied Ewles, "and as it is essential to its ultimate success that I should be in the capital on or before the 2nd of March, I shall look for your kind help to get me started on the road thither with all speed."

"Certainly, Dr. Ewles; I am at your service, and if you will have your traps brought here from the Custom House, and will make yourself at home with me until to-morrow morning, you shall be quite ready to leave for the North after a six o'clock breakfast."

Ewles, ordinarily a patient man, chafed at even this slight delay. He remembered how that every second of precious time, dropped or wasted, gave so much greater opportunity to his arch enemy to perfect his villainous scheme—if scheme he had—with regard to Haidée Von Cloo—his Haidée.

But at the specified time the next morning, everything was ready for him to leave Shanghai by the Tient-Tsin steamer.

The short passage to the mouth of the Peiho River, was remarkable only for one strange incident.

Among the two dozen or so passengers, was a tall Chinaman, of evident high rank and breeding. He did not mix with his fellow-passengers; perhaps because they were all, without exception, Europeans.

Anyway, he kept aloof, his courteous, dignified air and manner, preventing anything in the shape of unpleasantness and friction.

It was curious, however, that this celestial gentleman, without entering into conversation, or in any way seeking acquaintance, kept in the immediate neighbourhood of Septimus Ewles. Smoking, dining, constitutionalising on deck, the tall Chinaman, like a shadow, was by his side.

So persistent was this, that Ewles began at last to be worried by it, and more than once was on the point of taking steps to put an end to it.

Once, he could have sworn that he heard a noise in his cabin, an hour or so after he had retired. Certainly, as he sprang out of his bunk on to the deck, the door opened and shut suddenly.

By the time he had added something to his pyjamas a search of the corridor was useless—nobody was to be seen about, while the night steward, half-asleep, had neither seen nor heard anything extraordinary.

An indefinable suspicion prompted Ewles to make an examination of his berth.

His most cherished possessions, Haidée's letters, her photo, and a few other oddments, valuable only to a lover, he always carried upon his person; as also his letters of credit and introductions; but there was, of course, much in his baggage which would appeal to the cupidity of the ordinary light-fingered person.

The first thing he saw, upon turning up the swing-amp, was, lying upon the ground at the foot of his big trunk, a piece of narrow silk ribbon—such as would be used by a Chinaman to tie or lace his jacket with. It flashed upon him then that it was of the same colour as the tie-points of the tall celestial's outer garment.

A thorough search through his effects revealed nothing further, and Ewles turned in again, to dream of himself in the character of Sherlock Holmes, hunting down tall Chinamen by means of a violet ribbon clue.

Closely scrutinising, the next morning, the tall celestial, as he passed the deck, his head upon his breast, Ewles saw, to his wonderment, that the violet ribbon tie-points of the other's jacket were intact, none of them gone.

Determined, if possible, to get to the bottom of the mystery, Ewles, as he passed the Chinaman, drew out from his own pocket, as if by accident, the incriminating ribbon.

He was almost sure that the other was cunningly observing him from under his eyelids, but as for sign of this or of interest in the plainly displayed ribbon, there was not the faintest.

Thus matters stood until the mouth of the Peiho River was reached. Here, the tall Chinaman dropped into a large sampan, or semi-covered river boat, which under the deft impelling of a couple of long, broad bladed sweeps, quickly ascended the river towards Taku and Tient-Tsin, and was soon out of sight round a bend of the stream.

"Captain," said Ewles, to the captain of the steamer, "Do you know that fellow?"

"That tall yellow-skin? Well, I don't exactly know him; and yet I do, if you can make that out."

"Rather enigmatic; but perhaps you will kindly explain."

"Well, it's like this. About six months ago this same chap first began to make regular trips between Shanghai and this point. He always leaves the vessel in precisely the same unceremonious fashion, and I hear or see nothing more of him again until, perhaps, the next trip but one, and then this sampan meets us, the fellow springs aboard, and, exhibiting to the purser a perpetual pass from the owners, travels with us to Shanghai. What he does there, or at this other end I'm as ignorant as you are, sir, and now you know as much about him as I do, which isn't much."

"No; as you say, captain, it isn't much. But all the same I thank you for your informatory crumbs."

"Welcome, I'm sure."

"What time are we supposed to arrive at Tient-Tsin? I mean, how long does it usually take for the river boat you are expecting, to reach the Forts?"

"Something under six hours."

"Ah! I must be in Pekin by noon of the 2nd March. There will not be much time to lose."

Landing six hours later, Ewles found a Chinaman waiting for him. He had himself made no provision for the meeting, but was not long left in ignorance of how it was done.

"Missa Fleliss—he tellee me to meetee you."

"Tell you, man! why he's miles away."

"Yes! He one piecy big man—he tellee my bludder, one coaly-man on steamer-bloat—bludder tellee me—me tellee you—savee?"

Grinning from ear to ear, the Chinaman bustled about to get the doctor's few things together, and it was not long before the latter found himself located as a bird of passage at the only habitable hotel in Tient-Tsin. This place was kept by a Celestialised Frenchman, a character, and a strange mixture of east and west.

To him Ewles applied for information as to the best and quickest route to Pekin.

"M'sieu!—why you hurry? Everything good at the Hotel de France. Beside, perhaps M'sieu does not know that the Boxeurs are sounding the tocsin in the neighbourhood of the Ming Tombs. The Temple of Tsing-Tsoo is their rendezvous. M'sieu had better remain at the Hotel de France. Ma foi! Yes!"

"I leave here to-morrow morning before daybreak. Send in the Chinaman who came with me!"

"Now—what's your name?"

"Lung-How. You wantee me?"

"Yes; can you guide me to Peking?"

"Yes; Missa Fleliss, he tellee me to helpee you—savee?"

In spite of the landlord's protest, and endeavour to detain him in Tient-Tsin, Ewles was determined to press forward.

With Lung-How's assistance horses were secured and before the sun was up the pair were on their way.

There is a railway between Tient-Tsin and Pekin, but Ewles, for his own reasons, decided not to travel by it.

Half-way on their journey a strange thing happened.

Ewles and his guide were resting at mid-day in a small inn by the roadside.

No hing to eat or drink (except tea) is ever provided in these places, so that Lung-How was busy seeing after his master's commissariat.

A pattering of feet upon the road attracted Ewles' attention.

Looking out of the window he sees a litter, closed, attended by four armed Chinamen.

Lung-How also hears the commotion, and comes to see.

No sooner does he set eyes on the armed men than he whispers affrightedly to Ewles.

"Boxer!—Boxer!—all same fightee devils!"

The information does not so much alarm Ewles, as make him curious.

Walking out at the door of the wretched hostelry, he strolls towards the litter for a closer inspection.

Suspecting his intention, the truculent-looking attendants close round, crossing their spears and matchlocks by way of forcible prevention.

At this moment, and quite suddenly, one side of the litter is violently shaken, and moved back a little. A small white hand is seen vainly trying to move it further.

"I believe," said Ewles to himself, "that something wrong is going on here; but what can I do? these fellows would raise the neighbourhood if I lifted a finger."

The chief of the band perceiving the slightly opened side of the litter, made as if to close it, hitting the hand which still gripped the shutter a blow with his gun-stock.

A woman's cry, half-smothered, rang out.

"Good Heavens! Haidée!" shouted Ewles, endeavouring to break through the cordon.

Ewles fired at Crafte, who, throwing up his arms, fell backwards.

But before he could reach the litter, a hoarse command was given; the litter was lifted by the four bearers, and, while Ewles was struggling vainly with the Boxers, who had him at a disadvantage in an angle of the yard wall, soon disappeared down a side lane leading off the main road.

CHAPTER III.

THE SECRET OF THE MING TOMBS BY THE GREAT WALL.

THE chief topic of conversation at the English Club in Legation Street, Pekin, at this time was the story of a new Boxer rising.

Said old Major Strangeways, "We are no sooner well through one trouble of this sort, than another is threatened—it's monstrous!"

"Ah! and that isn't all of it," remarked a smart-looking attaché—"You haven't heard, perhaps, that there is Yankee money behind the rascals."

"No!" exploded the Major. "I haven't; but I shou dn't be surprised."

"Oh! it's nothing to do with uncle Sam in his official capacity. It seems that there is an immensely rich Chicago man who, for some purpose of his own, is furnishing the rebels with funds. It is said that he is personally active in the affair, and that he moves about the country in the disguise of a Chinaman."

"God bless me!" said a grey-haired Secretary of Legation, nervously. "Do you think there's anything in it, Charteris?"

"Well, honestly, I do—Eh!" to the club-servant, who had handed him a card and a letter, "excuse me, gent'emen!"

Glancing at the card, and then opening and reading the letter, the young diplomatist bade them show in the stranger.

"Dr. Ewles! I am delighted to know you!. These two gentlemen are Major Strangeways, of His Majesty's 7th Hussars, and Sir Cecil Wray, our Secretary of Legation. Gentlemen, this is Dr. Septimus Ewles of London, who brings me a letter from my old friend Harrington."

After a desultory talk for a quarter of an hour, Charteris was asked to repeat for their visitor's benefit, the current rumour of the anticipated Boxer rising.

"Yes," the narrator concluded, "and to crown it all the man is strongly suspected of kidnapping an English lady who was known to have called at the consulate in Tient-Tsin, but who has since mysteriously disappeared. We are in possession of certain information from a tainted source, it is true, which almost makes this certain."

"Mr. Charteris," said Ewles earnestly (he had been listening with eager ears to the tale). "May I put a question or two to you?"

"A hundred, my dear sir."

"Well, then; in view of the certainty of your information as to the action of this pseudo Chinaman; this—Yankee Boxer—have you decided to take any steps to bring him to book?"

"Yes—we have; we know that the chief Boxer conspirators meet in the precincts of the temple of Ts ng-Tsoo, among the Ming Tombs, thirty miles north o' Pekin."

"Yes; and having that knowledge, what do you propose?"

"A party are starting to-night after sundown, with the object, if possible, of trapping this American dabbler in Chine e politics and British interests."

"Good! Now, will you let me (I have strong, very strong reasons for asking the favour) will you let me accompany the expedition?"

"Assuredly! Remain here for dinner, and come afterwards to the Legation with me. I am going myself."

By this time the Major and the Secretary were gone, and the two who were left talked long and earnestly together over their meal.

At last Charteris said, "Doctor, I honour your pluck and I only hope the result of it all may be as happy as you can desire it to be."

* * * * *

It is a wonderful place that where lies the dust of the old Ming dynasty of China.

For some distance around it, and especially towards its Southern approach, the landscape is desolation itself.

Sheer out of the barren, stone-strewed ground, rise at intervals colossal figures carved in stone of men and animals.

Though wide apart they form a striking avenue to the Temple of Tsing-Tsoo, which stands grim and solitary at the end of it.

Along this road, about an hour after midnight, a party of eight Europeans, accompanied by two Legation interpreters, and Ewles' attendant, rode silently and swiftly.

With almost criminal negligence the conspirators had omitted to provide sentries or scouts of any kind, so that the party approached to quite within the shadow of the Temple walls, without creating any suspicion of their presence.

The Tombs themselves lie at the base of a semi-circle of hills, which has something like a three mile radius.

"Now," said Charteris quietly, "the entrance to the underground vault, where our informant, a traitor, tells us the meeting is even now in progress, is just by the left side of the main flight of steps. Oh! there it is! That black hole!"

They all moved up close to it.

"Six men, including 'Our American Cousin,'" he continued, "are in conclave. I think we can manage them—what say you?"

Universal assent.

"Hark!" hoarsely whispered Ewles suddenly. "What is that?"

"I heard nothing," said Charteris.

"There it is again! It is the same cry I heard by the way!"

"I hear it now! But it comes from above, in the building where the monks are."

"You," said Ewles, tightening his belt, and loosening his revolver in its pocket, "you go on, I am going to search for the owner of that voice."

He was gone before they could expostulate with him, Lung-How paddling quickly after his master.

Charteris then massed his men and dived with them into the dark abyss.

So dark was it that they had each one to feel with their hands the right side of the rocky passage; one of the interpreters acting as guide.

In this fashion they went on for at least a quarter of a mile, when a dim light was visible about two hundred yards ahead.

"Not a whisper," scarcely breathed Charteris.

They could hear voices now in murmuring conversation.

The light was caused by a door at the end of the passage being about six inches ajar.

Charteris crept up to it, and cautiously looked into a sort of rock-hewn room, or cave, round an immense block of black stone in the centre of which were grouped a party of six men.

It was a tall figure, clad in Chinese garments, and standing full in the circle of light made by a hanging lamp of intense power, suspended by metal chains from the roof of the cave, that principally attracted the attention of Charteris. The features, he fancied, appeared to be more western than eastern of type, Yet, what could a European, or civilised white, be doing among these Chinese fiends?

It was a riddle not long in the reading.

With an imperious gesture of his right hand, the man began a rapid, semi-angry speech. He spoke in colloquial Chinese, which Charteris understood, but which, for the benefit of the many is translated as follows:—

"This, mind!" he said, "is my last contribution to your cause, unless you carry out the scheme of total extirpation of the official British and their following. The Tient-Tsin business of last year must not be repeated; it must now be death, and nothing short of death, for every member of the British Legation.

"My money it was—to the tune of more than three million dollars—that was wasted upon a failure, remember! but this million, which is now to do the work then left undone, must not go the same way!—mark that! Every dollar of it must fulfil its mission. Now, Yung-Su, what are your plans?"

Yung-Su, a villainous-looking Chinaman of dwarf-like stature, but with arms so disproportionately long that the hands reached the ground almost, climbed up, lightning quick, on to the stone top, bringing his fiendish face close to the last speaker's.

"Death! Within five days from now every Englishman in China will be a corpse! I swear it! We all swear it! Speak, Li-Tsee! Hung-Wung! Ah-Sheng! Tell the American excellency!—the Gold King!—blood!—blood!—blood! will flow before the next moon shall be born."

"Good!" said the tall Chinaman with the Yankee twang. "I am satisfied."

It is doubtful whether Charteris would have precipitated matters, and forced the citadel so soon, but for an altogether unexpected development.

The last words were scarce out of the leading conspirator's mouth, when, from a hole in the rock, Ewles, bearing in his arms an inanimate female form, burst in upon the assembled six.

Charteris, seeing that the crucial moment had arrived, gave the signal, and, with his men, flung open the door, and called upon the conspirators to surrender.

"Siever Crafte!" cried Ewles, seeing that his companions were in a position to support him. "You have reached the end of your tether! I know your villainy to its lowest depths. You must answer to me now for years of torture and nameless misery."

"Answer!—to you!" cried Crafte, flinging off all disguise, "Do you think I have thrown the die to lose the game? Loose the girl!"

His attention to Ewles had thrown him off his guard; for Charteris, creeping up behind him, threw himself upon him, and dragged him backward to the ground.

Meanwhile the other Europeans had overpowered the five Boxers, who, cowards ever, showed no fight.

Charteris, an old athlete. held on with a grip of steel. The end, however, might have been worse than the beginning.

"Siever Crafte! Will you answer me one question?" said Ewles.

"No!"

With the word, he wrenched himself free of Charteris, and drawing a long Malay kreese from his bosom, sought to plunge it into his enemy's heart.

Ewles, as if intuitively prepared for this, fired at Crafte, who, throwing up his arms, fell, face backwards, across the stone slab.

* * * * *

At the English consul's, at Tient-Tsin, Haidée told her lover how that she, for his sake, had followed Crafte from London. At Shanghai she heard, quite by accident, of his dealings with the Boxers.

It was while travelling the open country between Tient-Tsin and the neighbourhood of the Ming Tombs that Crafte had kidnapped her, taking her by litter to the Temple of Tsing-Tsoo, where his influence with the Buddhist priests there enabled him to get her immured in one of the lamasary cells.

These cells communicated by an underground passage with the cave where the conspirators met.

Crafte evidently hoped to persuade Haidée to his will, and it was only the timely intervention of the Legation people which prevented it.

What advantage he hoped to reap by financing the Boxers, is, or was, best known to himself. His death destroyed the hopes of his friends, for, as it transpired, the promised million had not been actually paid over to the confederacy.

* * * * *

At a quiet little house on the borders of Wimbledon Common, Septimus Ewles and his wife lead an ideal existence.

By common consent they never refer to those events which, though they brought them together, were fraught with peril and misery unspeakable.

Septimus Ewles is working up a nice little practice in and around Putney and Roehampton, but the flesh-pots of Egypt have no reminiscent attraction for him; he lives for his love, for his revenge is satisfied.

Concluding note by Dr. Ewles.

"My friend, Inspector Ryan, has lately discovered that the woman who accompanied Crafte from Charing Cross Station, and who was so strangely like my Haidée, proceeded no further than Calais with her companion. She has herself, only a day or two ago, just before she succumbed to heart-failure, in a ward of St. Andrew's Hospital, confessed to Collings and Ryan that Siever Crafte engaged her from a London theatre to leave England with him in order to create an impression that it was Haidée. Crafte saw Ryan at the station, and took every means to make the situation as public as possible."

Sentenced to Siberia.

"SIBERIA? I have had five-and-twenty years in Siberia."

So said my fellow passenger. We were on board a Petersburg and Hull steamer; we were passing down the gulf of Finland, and the low fortifications of Cronstadt were growing more and more indistinct in the distance. We were sitting on deck he and I, each with the fraternal pipe in his mouth, and were getting through the preliminary stages of acquaintanceship-making. Passengers are few and far between on these liners, and one has to make the most one may of such as the gods think well to send. Plainly this smoking companion of mine did not spring from the educated classes. His was not a refined face; though, so far as the pit-marks, with which it was liberally tattooed, would permit one to see, it was an intelligent, and not an unkindly one. He was unusually big and strongly-built, and though in the downhill of life would still have been an ugly opponent in a tussle. His dress, and personal appearance generally, indicated the well-to-do man. Even to those who know something of Western Russia, "Siberia" has an awful and mysterious sound, and the experiences of one who had spent a quarter of a century in the Czar's great prison-house, must be worth the hearing. I proposed to myself to cultivate my big acquaintance.

Had he, I asked, seen anything of convict life? He was of opinion that a man could not well live where he had lived without seeing something of it. Was that life as dreadful as English novel-writers represented it, and as English people generally supposed it to be? My fellow passenger was no reader of novels, and had been too long from home to know what English people generally thought; but he could tell me a thing or two that had come under his own notice, and I might judge for myself.

Nothing, I assured him, would give me greater pleasure than to listen.

"I am a Lancashire man," said my big friend, "and I rose from the ranks. I began life much as other mill-hands do; but my head was set the right way on my shoulders, and I got to be an overlooker. Five-and-twenty years ago, when a great English firm, whose operations extend over many parts of Russia, started a cotton-mill at Ekaterinburg, I was offered a post as manager. Ekaterinburg is, as I dare say you know, on the Siberian side of the Ural mountains, and in the heart of the Government mining districts. A man thinks twice before he transports himself and his family to such a place, but I had made up my mind to get on, and this was a good chance for one in my position.

"I was not disappointed. I looked well after the mill, and it prospered. We north country operatives are a thrifty folk, and like living in a plain way. I saved money, and as it was the policy of our firm to keep me in my post, and to give me a personal interest in the undertaking, I was allowed to invest my few hundreds of roubles in the mill.

"These common-place particulars about my own affairs can have very little interest for you, sir. I only tell them because otherwise you would scarcely understand what has to follow.

"One evening, late in our short Russian summer, when the long days were fast drawing in, we were in our family sitting-room, I engaged with some of the mill accounts, and my wife with her sewing, when Lottie, our eldest daughter, rushed in, and, without a word, fainted right away on the floor.

"This did not more frighten my wife and myself than it surprised us, for Lottie was a sensible girl, and had never given way to any hysterical fancies before. We knew that it must have taken a good deal to upset her in that way, and as soon as we had contrived to bring her round, we made her tell us what had been the matter.

"It seemed that she had been alone in her room, when, turning suddenly towards the window, she became aware of a face pressed closely against the glass and glaring at her. What the face was like she was unable to describe, but it had appeared too ugly and horrible for a human being. If it could have been called that of a man or woman, she said, she should not have been so frightened.

"I went out and looked round the house. Nothing was to be seen. We knew Lottie to be a sensible girl, but we were inclined to think that her fancy must have played her a trick for once.

"After a time my wife left the room to see about our supper. My wife (she has been dead now this nine years) had as strong nerves as any woman that I ever knew—nothing ever seemed to knock her off her balance. Well, she came back in a minute or two, and beckoned me to the door. She was calm enough, but I could see by her face that something was wrong. She would not say what she had to say before the girl for fear of frightening her again. So she whispered to me outside. 'Lottie must have been right, there is something about. When I opened the door of the kladovoy' (the larder, that is) 'I heard something at the window. Whatever it may have been it took the alarm, and did not let me see it; but it has left its marks on the lattice.'

"I followed her silently to the kladovoy. All was now quiet there. I examined the fortochka—as in Russia we call the little window of such a place. In summer-time its glass casement was removed, and it was now only protected by a lattice of crossed strips of fir-wood. These strips were slightly displaced, as if someone had tried to force them out, and thus to gain entrance. The fortochka was about large enough to have admitted the body of a man.

"Nothing was to be seen by looking out; for though a reasonable amount of twilight still remained, it was only enough to show things with any distinctness in the open, and I had sheltered the back of our house by planting a number of young fir trees. I whispered to my wife that she should go back to Lottie, and that I would stay where I was for a bit, and see whether the robber—if it were a robber—would come again.

"It was scarcely to be called late, yet it was too late for any of our mill people to be about, and they were our only neighbours. Indeed, we had no near neighbours. My house, and one adjoining it (intended for another employé, but at that time unoccupied), stood partly within the high wooden fence which inclosed the mill; that is, their backs opened into the inclosure (the dvor, as we call it), whilst their fronts looked on a public thoroughfare. Thus our back premises were strictly private after the gates to the mill had been closed, and the person—if it was a person—who had got to the windows must either have secreted himself within the dvor, or have gained access to it in some improper manner. Now, however, all was still as could be.

"Down I sat to watch, close by the door of the kladovoy. I chose a dark corner, and one where, in the dusk, it would have been a hard matter to see me, but I had a full view of the lattice. I waited until my patience was beginning to wear out, and then fancied that I heard some slight sound outside under the fortochka. It was so slight that at first I was not sure whether it might not be merely fancy, but after a little pause I heard it again, louder, and more distinctly. I sat still as a mouse, and kept a sharp look out.

"Slowly and gradually something raised itself before the opening. It was a head; but in the uncertain light I could not say whether it was a human head, or that of some brute creature. Whichever it might be, I could see enough of it to know that it was such a wild, haggard, unearthly-looking thing as I had never looked upon before. Any quantity of shaggy hair was hanging about it, and its only features to speak of seemed to be eyes. Eyes it had past all mistake. Never did I see anything like the way in which it glared at our good provisions within. I have seen what a famished wolf looks like, and should hardly think a famished wolf worth comparing with that creature. It was ravenous after what it saw. Up beside the head came two bunches of long claws, which wrenched at the wooden lattice as if to tear it down. But they were too weak. The strips held fast. And then the thing fell to with its teeth to gnaw a way through.

"Whilst the creature was thus engaged, I contrived to slip quietly from my dark corner by the door, and catching up a big stick, went out at the back of the house. I stole round as noiselessly as I could towards the window. There were, as I said, young fir trees on that side of the house, so that with a little care it was not difficult to approach the place unobserved. When I got to within a few yards, I saw that the man—for the creature was a man—was still hard at work, trying to force a way in.

"I dropped my stick and made a rush at him, and had him before he knew anything about it. He did not give up quietly. He struggled hard—desperately, I may say. But, bless you, he'd not the ghost of a chance with me. I am a tolerably strong man still, as men go, and I was younger then; I could have undertaken three such as he, and thought nothing of it. The poor wretch had no sort of condition about him—he was mere skin and bones—no muscle at all. He was nothing but a walking anatomy, with a few rags by way of covering—and only a very few.

"All that he gained by his struggles was a good shaking, for I gave him one that made every tooth in his head chatter, and then I laid him flat on his back.

"I had been long enough in the country to gain some knowledge of Russ. I could use it pretty freely to our mill people; and I must own that for terms in which to blackguard a set of lazy rascals, as most of those fellows are, Billingsgate isn't a patch on it. So I could make my prisoner understand me. 'Now then, my friend,' I said to him, 'you needn't take the trouble to show any more fight. You see it won't pay. So just get up and march quietly off with me to the ouchastock'—the ouchastock being, as you perhaps know, equivalent to the police-station in English.

"But instead of getting up and doing as he was told, like a reasonable being, the creature contrived to wriggle itself upon its knees, and to hold up its hands, while it begged of me in the name of the virgin and all the saints not to hand it over to the politzia. It would rather be killed outright, and was ready to be beaten as much as I pleased.

"'My ragged friend,' I said, 'you are queer chap! Why do you object to the police so strongly?'

"The poor wretch made no direct answer, but only reiterated his intreaties that I would not give him up. I began to have some suspicion of the quality of my guest. 'I am inclined to think,' I said, 'that you are neither more nor less than an escaped convict.'

"Instead of attempting to deny it, he only begged me to pity him, as before.

"Russian law is terribly hard on those who in any way assist in or conceal the escape of a convict. Of that I was aware. But though I am a big fellow to look at, and in some things can hold my own as well as any man, I have always been a poor, soft-hearted fool in others. I was beginning to feel downright sorry for that poor creature—it was not so much his prayers that fetched me, as his looks. 'Well,' I said, 'suppose I don't give you up, but let you go. What then?'

"He would always remember me with gratitude. He would go on his way at once, and do no harm to my property. He was no thief. He had only entered this dvor—this yard, to hide himself, but that the sight of food had overcome him; he was famishing, but he dared not beg. He had walked, how far he could not tell, perhaps a thousand versts, and all the way he had not dared to ask for food, scarcely to speak to a living soul. He was trying to reach his own village, perhaps a thousand versts farther. If I would only set him free he would go on at once.

"That was about the substance of the fellow's answer. His appearance seemed to bear out his statements, and I was inclined to believe him. 'It's sheer nonsense,' I said, 'for you to talk of setting off for a walk of a thousand versts, if I let you go. You might as well talk of flying. You have not the strength to walk ten. You would only fall by the roadside, you miserable scarecrow, and die in a ditch. I should be doing the kinder thing by you if I handed you over to the authorities. If I do let you go, I must give you something to eat first. Come with me.'

"The miserable wretch hardly believed that I really meant to feed him, and would have run away had he dared. I took him into the empty house, of which I had the key, and fetched him as much food as I thought it safe for him to eat.

"So there I was, with an escaped convict on my hands. Had I been more prudent I should have reflected that the fellow was most likely a hardened scoundrel, quite undeserving of pity, and that his gratitude would probably be shown either by robbing me, or, if he should happen to fall into the hands of the police, by getting me into trouble to save his own worthless neck. I ought to have thought of these things; but, as I said before, I am a soft-hearted, old fool, and neglected to do so.

"I kept him in that empty house for several days; in fact, till he had so far recovered his strength as to be fit to go on. Nobody knew about him, not even the members of my own family, for if I was doing a foolish thing, I had sense enough to run as little risk over it as possible. Feodor Stepanovitch, for that my convict told me was his name, enlightened me on some few points of his personal history. His native village was, he said, in the government of Vladimir, and he had left it to get work in the town of Ivanova, where there are factories. Every man tries to make out a good case for himself, so I did not feel myself bound to place implicit reliance on Feodor's statement that he had never committed anything that could properly be called a crime. According to his showing, the sole source of his troubles had been a difference with an ouvadnik—a police agent. I do not exactly remember the particulars, but, of course, there was a woman in the business; blows had passed, and the ouvadnik had, by a false charge, procured Feodor's condemnation to Siberia for life. This, I say, was his story.

"Feodor told me that his place of exile had been somewhere far up the country; and of the severities he had had to endure, and of the tyranny of officials, he spoke bitterly. After making his escape the privations and dangers he had undergone before reaching Ekaterinburg, were such as I should not have believed from his words, had they not been verified by his appearance.

"For a Russian he appeared to me to be a not unintelligent fellow, and I pointed out to him the difficulties he would find in making his way to Ivanova—a distance of not less than twelve hundred versts from Ekaterinburg, as the crow flies, and advised him, as he was used to mill work, to stay and find employment where he was. I was weak enough to offer to help him, and see what could be done in the way of getting a passport for him. But the fellow was bent on going forward. He was resolved, he said, to see his family again, and he was resolved to see Basil Makaroff. This Makaroff was, I found, the ouvadnik to whom Feodor attributed his troubles, and it seemed to me that this particular hankering to see this person meant a craving to have his revenge. I confess that when I heard this much, I felt no desire to detain my friend Feodor longer than was necessary. I was glad to give him something more decent in the way of clothing than he had brought, and a trifle in money to help him on his way, and to be rid of him.

"I never expected to see him again, nor wished to do so; and I was somewhat startled when, a few weeks later, among a gang of convicts which were being marched by a guard of soldiers out of the town on their way eastward, I recognised Stepanovitch. I was standing close by when he passed, and was so much surprised to see him, that I somewhat imprudently, perhaps, spoke to him by name. But, will you believe it?—the ungrateful dog stared me in the face, and marched sullenly by without word or sign of recognition. 'So much,' thought I, 'for gratitude!'

"Some months later, when the next summer was getting well advanced, we had one night an alarm of fire. Many of the newer mills at Ekaterinburg are of stone, but the main building of ours, being comparatively old, was of wood. It was a thing to blaze up like a box of matches. It was not, however, in the main building that the fire had broken out, but in some sheds connected with the main building by a range of outbuildings. This last was stone-built, but as ill-luck would have it, covered with wooden shingles.

"A good many people were soon together, mostly our own hands, and I directed and encouraged them as well as I could to get the fire under. But they are a stolid, heavy set of fellows, those Russians, and the way in which they take care not to over-exert themselves at a fire is enough to drive an Englishman wild. Yet there some few who worked well, and one fellow in particular, I noticed, a ragged fellow, a beggar I took him to be, who really worked splendidly, and in a way that ought to have made many of those whose daily bread depended on the existence of the mill, ashamed of themselves.

"What between the apathy of those lazy scoundrels generally, and want of water, it was soon plain that the sheds which were on fire could not be saved, and that what we had to look to was the mill itself. The danger of the main building was increasing every moment, for the fire was beginning to make its way along the shingled roof of which I spoke.

"I could see what had to be done—those shingles had to be stripped off. I had a ladder reared against the building, and called for volunteers to mount it. The height of that roof from the ground was considerable, and the fire was every moment getting more and more hold upon it. To strip off the shingles would be a hard job, and a hot one, and it is not to be denied, a dangerous one. Not one of those cold-blooded rascals who had eaten our bread for years would come forward. I stood at the foot of the ladder, and told them I was going up myself. I offered twenty roubles—fifty roubles—to any man who would help me. But it was of no use.

"Just when I was about to mount alone, the ragged stranger fellow, whom I had before observed working so vigorously, came running up. He had been too busy in another place to know what was going forward sooner. That was scarcely a time for taking any particular notice of people's looks, yet I had an impression that he was not altogether a stranger to me.

"He looked up to the roof. The delay of those few minutes had given a fearful advantage to the fire. 'There is death up there,' he said, 'Is saving this mill so very important to you.'

"'If it is burnt I am a beggar. Every kopeck I am worth is in it. A hundred roubles if you will help me to save it!'

"'We can talk of the reward afterwards,' he said, as he sprang past me, and up the ladder like a cat.

"I was following, too eagerly, perhaps, to be careful, and I am a heavy man. A round broke, and down I came, with a knee so much twisted that I could scarcely stand. It was no longer in my power to climb to the roof.

"But from where I propped myself up against a wall, I could see that ragged fellow, who was up and doing enough for three or four ordinary men. You should have seen how he sent the shingles rattling down. Seen from below he seemed at times to be working with fire all round him, but he went on without minding it. I never saw an Englishman—let alone a Russian—go to it with a better will. I heard the people round me say that that he worked more like a fiend than a mortal man—and so he did. He handled the burning wood as though his fingers had been iron instead of flesh and blood, and scarcely seemed to shrink from the flames that blazed up round his face. He never appeared to rest or stay for breath till he had succeeded in cutting off the communication between the fire and the mill.

"I made the men below set the ladder as handily as they could for him to get down, and he did his best to reach it. But he must have been quite used up, besides being pretty much blinded and suffocated with the smoke. Anyway, he lost his footing and down he went through the rafters, and crashed among the burning rubbish below. It was an ugly fall.

"We got him out as well as we could, and such a scorched, smoke-blackened, smashed-up copy of God's image I should never wish to see again. But he was still alive, and to the proposal to carry him straight to the hospital I said; 'No; take him into my house.' So they took him in.

"After we had got the fire quite under, and made all safe about the mill, I limped to the side of the bed where they had laid the poor fellow. He had come round a bit by that time. He tried to open his eyes, but it seemed to me that the fire and smoke had not left him much power of seeing with them. He spoke, however, more distinctly than might have been expected, and his first question was whether the mill was safe.

"I told him that owing to his pluck it was. I was surprised to find that he recognised my voice, and still more when he heard my name. 'You do not know me,' he said, and, indeed, it was not likely that anyone should know such a crushed and shapeless mass of cinder as he was—'You do not know me—Feodor Setpanovitch. They caught me, and took me back. I knew you when you spoke to me in the street, but I dared not answer lest they should suspect you of having befriended me. I have escaped from them again, and am going home to Ivanova. I must see my wife, and that villain Makaroff.'

"He lay a little, and then added, 'I am glad I was here to help you to-night. I am glad they did not take me again before I got here. I do not think the politzia will take me again.'

"And they did not, for he was dead within an hour of that time.

"That, sir, is the end of my story of a Siberiak. Do you happen to have a light handy? for, somehow, I have let my pipe out. And, bless me, my pipe-bowl is quite wet. I believe I'm crying. What an old ass I am!"

Vanden Bussche's Ride.

MANY fat people assert that they have small appetites, but I am sure that my good friend, Mons. Vanden Bussche, has an enormous one, is extremely fond of eating and possesses an excellent digestion. As a boy he a acquired the nickname of the "gargantua," and he always appreciated an invitation to dine out.

Several years ago, Monsieur Vanden Bussche's wife fell heir, through the demise of the Baron Snoy, her father, to considerable property in the neighbourhood of Antwerp. This made it necessary for Vanden Bussche to leave the English city where he was then living, and betake himself to the land of his birth. A certain acquaintance of his, named Whitelaw, a tall, gaunt Scotchman, having business in the same part of the world, they determined to travel together. In the course of the trip they found themselves one dark, rainy day, in sleepy, time-stained, mud-coloured, out-of-date, Mechlin, in an ancient inn with sanded floors, candles, feather beds, and stolid Flemish servants, who looked so stupid, that Whitelaw declared that he didn't feel sure whether he ought to address them in front or back.

At the moment of which I write, Vanden Bussche was alone in his room, on the second floor of the hostelry. He held in his hand an open letter, and a broad grin illumined his jolly countenance as he read. Before he had quite finished, Whitelaw came in. Vanden Bussche instantly tossed aside the letter, and falling on the neck of the astonished Scotsman, whirled him round, shouting in his ear:

"Good! Excellent! Superb news, my friend!"

"Oh, get off my neck, man, and tell me what ails you in plain English," answered Whitelaw, shaking himself loose.

"Well, zen, my dear sair, I haf a lettaire from my friend Zeger inviting us both to dine with heem to-night."

"Bless your soul, man, is that all?"

"All! But I forgif you—you come from Scotland, where they bring you up on oatmeal and finnan—what you call dem?—hatties. Wait, my dear sair, till you eat a dinnair Belgique!" And he kissed the tips of his fat fingers and raised his eyes ecstatically to the ceiling.

"We'd best be preparing, then. At what time does you friend dine?"

"At sex."

"Dress suits?"

"Certainement."

"They'll have to be pressed. I'll call the garsong."

He rang the bell, and then both men dived into their trunks and brought forth "swallow-tails" and trousers.

"Parbleu!" exclaimed Vanden Bussche promptly, "ze eau de Cologne has itself spilt over everysing in my carpet bag."

"Let's see," said Whitelaw, stepping over. "Good gracious, man, what will you do? You can't go smelling like a perfumery shop."

"No," answered Vanden Bussche, dolefully, but even as he said it his face brightened. "Oh, zat makes nosing. I send heem to ze tailor and he ze smell will take out like zis!" and he snapped his fat fingers gaily and hurried to the door to admit the boy who had just knocked, gave him the necessary instructions about the garments, and told him to order a carriage for them at 5.30.

It took what seemed to Vanden Bussche an interminable time to make those dress suits presentable, although he had beguiled the interval by composing a toast. Speech-making was a well-known weakness of his. He had rendered his present production with great unction several times for the benefit of Whitelaw, and was beginning for the fourth time, when that abused individual begged him to desist, whereupon he took to pacing the floor excitedly, muttering to himself.

"Zat is always my luck, when zaire is a fine dinnaire somesing mus' happen to my clothes. Confound it! Why haf Zepherine gif me zat bottle of Cologne? I'll not go, zat's all zere is about it!" Then in a pathetically dismal tone, "I'll stay here and eat ze table d'hote."

"Upon my word, I'll dine elsewhere if you contemplate any such trick as that, Vanden Bussche." This from Whitelaw.

Taking no notion of the interruption, Vanden Bussche continued impatiently: "Zese tailors, zey do it on purpose, so zat they can charge a big price! A whole hour to take ze Cologne out of ze clothes! It is one outrage!"

Scarcely were these words uttered than a loud rapping announced the arrival of the garments, which in a jiffy were donned, and the two travellers hurried down to the carriage.

"Climb upon your seat, man; we are in a hurry," commanded Vanden Bussche, speaking to the driver.

Whitelaw entered the carriage, while Vanden Bussche gave the man the address, and promised extra fare if he got them to their destination by six o'clock; then he sprang into the vehicle, and slammed the door after him. Horrors! Crash! Crack! Bang! As the weighty Vanden Bussche stepped in, the bottom of the coach fell out, precipitating himself and Whitelaw on to the cobble-stones.

"Arretez! Arretez!" howled the Belgian, recovering his feet as quickly as possible.

"Help! Stop the horses!" bawled Whitelaw. But the horses did not stop, and no help came. On the contrary, they seemed to go faster than ever. And passers-by, had there been any, could have seen a pair of short, fat legs, and a pair of long thin one going at double-quick time under the coach.

"Ooooh!" groaned Whitelaw. "My legs! I knock hem against those confounded axles with every move."

"Take shorter steps," suggested Vanden Busschee "That is nosing to what haf happen to me. I has forgot—my—speech!" he panted.

"Confound your speech!" muttered his companion in misery. "You don't expect to eat that dinner, do you?"

"Oh! if we keep running like zis we will get zare," answered Vanden Bussche amiably.

"Which I don't propose to do. Hello, there! Cocher! Cocher! Cocher!" shouted the Scotchman, and with each exclamation he banged more forcibly on the front of the carriage. Still onward they went, faster and faster than ever, and anon they could hear the driver cracking his whip noisily, and urging his galloping steeds to still greater exertions.

"A pretty looking sight we'll be when we do get there," the Scotchman managed to gasp.

"Oh, Zeger will pardon us; he is very amiable," consoled Vanden Bussche breathlessly.

"How—far—does—the—wretched—man—live—anyway?"

"Oh! about zree miles, I zink."

Whitelaw groaned.

Vanden Bussche made an effort to feel in the pocket of his coat tail, and nearly fell

"Hold on, man!" cried his friend, grabbing him "Don't mind your handkerchief now. Blow your nose—anywhere."

"It's not my handkerchief; it's my speech," was the reply.

"For the love of Heaven, Van, don't mention that speech again! I'll kill you if you do, on my honour!"

"But I'm afraid I haf forgotten to remember eet," grumbled Vanden Bussche.

Hardly had he uttered these words than the carriage stopped with a jerk, and the two sprinters within suddenly and forcibly sat down in the mud.

"We are zere!" exclaimed Vanden Bussche.

"The dickens we are!" growled Whitelaw, as he angrily scrambled to his feet and burst open the door of the coach, bent upon wiping up the earth with the offending cabby.

"Oh, let heem alone; we will be late to ze dinner," entreated Vanden Bussche, dragging Whitelaw away. Then, so the man, "Begone, or I'll hand you over to the police!"

The two friends turned and saw before them the white front of a pretty country house. Whitelaw noticed that not a single light was visible, and Vanden Bussche looked puzzled. Nevertheless they both approached the door, and the Belgian rang the bell. After some minutes it was opened by a man with a lighted candle in his hand. Vanden Bussche asked for Monsieur Zeger.

"Monsieur Zeger," answered the man has a town house. He gives a dinner this evening to a gentleman from England."

"I am he," remarked Vanden Bussche. "I was not aware that Monsieur Zeger had a town house."

"He had not until recently," answered the man. "I am going there now with some wine, and can take Messieurs if they desire it."

Vanden Bussche accepted at once, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his friend. On arriving, the valet soon made them presentable, and though late for the first course, they enjoyed the remainder of the feast. Vanden Bussche, instead of his speech, gave an amusing account of their mad race inside the floorless carriage.

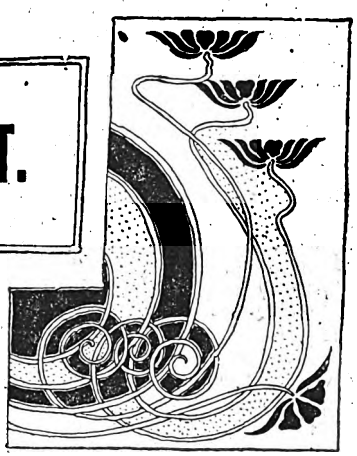
HIS DEATH-WARRANT.



A Story of a Newspaper Reporter

"It was in the north some years ago," remarked the city editor. "We had a man on the paper who was simply a crank on homicides, and he was more than a mere reporter, for he had detective talent of the highest order. He didn't care much for the common crimes—burglaries, larcenies, and such—but give him a good, mysterious murder and he was splendid. Not only did he have the history of all the famous murderers at his fingers' ends, but he delighted in ferreting out the most mysterious crimes that came within our province. In every case except the one I am telling about—and there were a good many crimes in that town—he traced out the murderer before the detectives even dreamt of his identity.

"I have since thought the secret of his success was that he put himself mentally in the place of the murderer and reasoned it out from motives rather than from the clues of the ordinary detective.

"'There is seldom much method in murder,' he once said to me when in a rarely communicative mood. "'Most men would commit it in about the same way under the same circumstances. It is only when a murderer goes about it systematically, as do the Thugs of India, that a murder becomes truly mysterious.'

"I once asked him why he did not become a regular detective.

"'I was born and bred a journalist,' he said, 'and the habit is too strong to break.'

"That was literally true in his case. Otherwise I might not have to tell this story.

"One morning the body of a fine looking man was found in an alley adjoining the electric light works in the very heart of the town. The afternoon papers had a chance at it, but didn't make much out of it, so I at once assigned it to Jones, as we will call him. Although he did not show up at the usual hour, I had no doubt he was already at work on it, as it was as mysterious a case as even he could desire.

"The victim was identified as a traveller who had just arrived, and so far as was known he had no friends or acquaintances in the town. It was not a case of robbery, for all his money and valuables were left on his body. There was a slight contusion on the back of the head and a small, needle-like hole through the man's heart. It was especially strange that such a crime could have been committed in a public thoroughfare while there was absolutely no clue to the murderer or his motive.

"But these difficulties were only such as would ordinarily put Jones on his mettle, so I did not doubt that he would have a good account of the affair. I was therefore somewhat surprised when he came sneaking in about six o'clock in the evening to see what his assignment was. He looked worn and haggard, but denied that he was ill, so I gave him the murder job. He went out without a word.

"I did not see him again that evening. About midnight I began to wonder why I had not heard from him, but only speculated on the possibility of something having happened to him, for the idea that he could possibly fail never occurred to me. Finally, after an hour had gone by, I telephoned to the police station. Word came back that there were no new developments in the case, and that Jones had not been there. Sending two men out to hunt him up, I set to work myself to make a story of the murder from the afternoon papers. Just then Jones came in. His step was unsteady and his face flushed. He had evidently been drinking heavily, something I never knew him to do before, but he was not drunk; rather he seemed at high nervous tension, although outwardly as calm as ever.

"I decided to let this breach of discipline pass, and merely asked him for his murder story. He replied that he hadn't written it.

"'Well, get to work on it at once,' I said rather sharply.

"Then he really surprised me by saying that he had nothing to write beyond the bare facts already known. The police had developed nothing new, and he supposed that I had worked up the story from the evening papers.

"'And has it come to pass that you wait for the police to develop a murder case for you?' I exclaimed angrily. 'As for the reports in the evening papers, you can "fake" a better story than they had.'

"He sat down in apparent despair at his desk. Then I relented and cajoled him a little, begging him not to spoil his great record by failing in such a case.

"'There's a starter for you,' said I, throwing him the article I had commenced. 'Now go ahead and fill that out with a column description of the scene.'

"'I haven't even visited it,' he replied. Nevertheless he picked up the pages and read them, as if impelled by some hateful fascination. Then he took up his pen to make a few minor corrections. Then, as if totally oblivious of my presence, he began to write.

"As sheet after sheet fell from under his fingers I snatched them up, read them hurriedly, and shot them up to the composing-room. I read rapidly, taking but small account of the matter so long as it ran smoothly, while I had too much confidence in him to question the accuracy of his statements. I only realised that he was writing a great account—the greatest he had ever written. He seemed inspired with the very innermost thoughts of the murder, and under his touch every trivial incident came out with distinctness and coherence that made the cause and method of the crime perfectly plain.

"First he described the scene with accuracy and detail that would have been impossible for one who had not studied it closely. The selection of the spot was explained by the fact that the bright electric light streaming through the windows of the engine-house made it impossible for the passer-by to see into the shadows. Thus, while impenetrable darkness screened the assassin, the rattle and roar of the machinery near by drowned all sounds of the struggle and of the falling body.

"The blow on the head, he demonstrated, must have been from a stick, while the wound through the heart could only have been made by one of those long, fine-bladed stilettos of Italian make. Furthermore, the fact that this peculiar weapon was driven home with a firm hand after the victim had been stunned by a blow on the head, indicated premeditated and deliberate murder, while the theory of robbery was disproved by the fact that the man's valuables had been untouched. The only reliable theory, therefore, was that the motive of the murderer was revenge.

"A more masterly analysis of a case I never read, but here he branched off into what I at first supposed to be purely imaginary speculations as to the wrong which had led the murderer to seek the life of the unknown man. These seemed purposely vague at first, but gathered in strength and certainty until I concluded that he must have some good foundation for them. Starting with hypothesis, he soon began to state them as facts. He described how the dead man, a once trusted friend, had entered the home of another, how by subtle wiles and deceit he had stolen the love of his wife; then followed an elopement and the breaking up of that once happy home.

"He told with the bitterness of truth how the scoundrel had deserted the erring woman and left her to perish alone; how the idea of revenge had filled the mind of the wronged husband; how, himself unseen, he had followed every movement of the intended victim for months and carefully plotted his destruction; how he had decoyed the doomed man to the town, and to the very spot where the murder was committed, and how he had destroyed the only clues—a couple of letters in the pockets of the dead man—and finally made his own escape, the secret safe in his own heart alone.

"As I read this remarkable tale through the conviction forced itself upon me that this was the absolute truth. If the writer himself had committed the deed, he could not have described it more graphically. Suddenly the thought flashed over me—Could he describe such a crime thus without having in fact committed it?'

"We were alone in the room. I glanced at Jones apprehensively. He was writing rapidly, fiercely. His eyes were fixed, but he seemed to be looking through and beyond the paper across which his pen flew at something fascinating, terrible. When he finished, it was with a start, as if waking from a trance. I glanced at the last page, where was final confirmation of my fears.

"'Good Heavens, Jones, is this true?' I managed to say.

"'Every word of it, as I live,' he replied firmly, if faintly.

"'Then you have written the warrant for your own arrest,' I said.

"His head dropped on his desk, but he said not a word.

"'Jones,' said I, finally shaking him by the shoulder to arouse him to an understanding of my meaning, 'enough to hang you is in type. In an hour the papers will be on the streets. In another hour the police will be after you. Go; make the most of your start.'

"It was as I predicted," said the city editor after a pause. "Before daylight a detective called on me to ascertain the source of that story. I simply pointed to Jones' name on the book, and they went after him."

"Did they catch him?" asked the other eagerly.

"They found him in his room with a stiletto through his heart." S. L. S.

By RAFAEL SABATINI.

SUMMARY.

Andrea de Mancini, a nephew of Cardinal Mazarin, is found one day by the latter in the Palais Royal, Paris, in a state of intoxication. Gaston de Luynes, the narrator of this story, and fencing-master to de Mancini, is blamed by the Cardinal for allowing his nephew to get into such a condition, and is removed from his position of fencing-master.

Eugène de Canaples insults de Mancini and a duel is arranged, but the Cardinal hears of it and tells de Luynes that it must not take place. De Luynes realises that if he does not prevent it the Cardinal has power to do him great harm, and accordingly raises a quarrel with de Canaples which ends in a fight, de Canaples being severely wounded. The onlookers are enraged with de Luynes because he indiscreetly lets fall the fact that he raised this quarrel so as to prevent a duel between de Mancini and de Canaples, and he has to flee for his life. To escape his pursuers he springs on the step of a passing carriage, and the ladies inside let him shelter there for a time, but when he says that he has wounded de Canaples they order him to alight.

De Luynes then accompanies de Mancini to the home of Eugène de Canaples, whose sister, Yvonne, Cardinal Mazarin wishes de Mancini to marry. The Chevalier de Canaples receives de Luynes and de Mancini very cordially at his château. Yvonne, however, is not at all gracious to de Luynes, because she knows of the duel which he fought with her brother, as she and her sister Geneviève were the two ladies who befriended him. De Mancini falls in love with Geneviève.

De Luynes does not stay at the Château de Canaples, but at an inn in Blois, the Lys de France. One morning he is visited there by the Marquis de St. Auban, who himself wants to marry Yvonne—for her money. After insulting each other a duel is arranged for the following morning. St. Auban tells de Luynes that Cardinal Mazarin has issued a warrant for his arrest.

CHAPTER X.

The Conscience of Malpertuis.

And so back to my room I went, my task accomplished; and so pleased was I with what had passed that, as I drew on my boots, preparing to set out to Canaples, I laughed softly to myself.

St. Auban I would dispose of in the morning; as for the other members of the cabal, I deemed neither Vilmorin nor Malpertuis sufficiently formidable to inspire uneasiness. St. Auban gone, they, too, would vanish. There remained then Eugène de Canaples. Him, however, methought, no great evil was to be feared from. In Paris he might be as loud-voiced as he pleased, but in his father's château, from what I had learnt, 'twas unlikely he would so much as show himself. Moreover, he was wounded, and before he had sufficiently recovered to offer interference, it was more than probable that Andrea would have married one or the other of Mesdemoiselles de Canaples; I had a shrewd suspicion that it would be the wrong one, and there again I feared trouble.

As I stood up, booted and ready to descend, there came a gentle tap at my door, and in answer to my "enter," there stood before me a very dainty and foppish figure. I stared hard at the effeminate face and the long fair locks of my visitor, thinking that I was to become the dupe of my eyes.

"M. de Vilmorin!" I murmured in astonishment, as he came forward, having closed the door. "You here?"

In answer he bowed, and greeted me with cold ceremoniousness.

"I have been in Blois since yesterday, Monsieur."

"In truth I might have guessed it, Vicomte. Your visit flatters me, for of course I take it you are come to pay me your respects," I said ironically. "A glass of wine, Vicomte?"

"A thousand thanks, Monsieur, no," he answered coldly, in his mincing tones. "It is concerning your affair with M. le Marquis de St. Auban that I am come." And drawing forth a dainty kerchief which filled the room with the scent of ambergris, he tapped his lips with it affectedly.

"Do you come as friend or—in some other capacity?"

"I come as mediator."

"Mediator!" I echoed, and my brow grew dark. "Sdeath. Has St. Auban's courage lasted just so long as the sting of my whip?"

He raised his eyebrows after a supercilious fashion that made me burn to strike the chair from under him.

"You misapprehend me; M. de St. Auban has no desire to avert the duel. On the contrary, he will not rest until the affront you have put upon him be washed out——"

"It will be, I'll answer for it."

"Your answer, sir, is characteristic of a braggart. He who promises most does not always fulfil most."

I stared at him in amazement.

"Shall I promise you something, Vicomte? Good gracious, if you seek to pick a quarrel with me——"

"Heaven forbid!" he ejaculated, turning colour. And his suddenly awakened apprehensions swept aside the affectation that hitherto had marked his speech and manner.

"Then, Monsieur, be brief, and state the sum of this mediation."

"It is this, Monsieur. In the heat of the moment, M. le Marquis gave you, in the hearing of half-a-score of people, an assignation for to-morrow morning. News of the affair will spread rapidly through Blois, and it is likely there will be no lack of spectators on the green to witness the encounter. Therefore, as my friend thinks this will be as unpalatable to you as it is to him, he has sent me to suggest a fresh meeting-place."

"Pooh, sir," I answered lightly, "I care not for myself who comes. I am accustomed to a crowd. Still, since M. de St. Auban finds it discomposing, let us arrange otherwise."

"There is yet another point. M. de St. Auban spoke to you, I believe, of an officer who is coming hither, charged with your arrest. It is probable that he may reach Blois before morning, so that the Marquis thinks that to make certain you might consent to meet him to-night."

"St. Auban is indeed in earnest, then! Convey to him my expressions of admiration at this suddenly awakened courage. Be good enough, Vicomte, to name the meeting-place."

"Do you know the chapel of St. Sulpice des Reaux?"

"What, beyond the Loire?"

"Precisely, Monsieur. About a league from Chambord, by the river side."

"I can find the place."

"Will you meet us there at nine o'clock to-night?"

I looked askance at him.

"But why cross the river? This side affords many likely spots."

"Very true, Monsieur. But the Marquis has business at Chambord this evening, after which there will be no reason—indeed, it will inconvenience him exceedingly—to return to Blois."

"What!" I cried, more and more astonished. "St. Auban is leaving Blois?"

"This evening, sir."

"But, Vicomte, why make an assignation in such a place, and at night, when at any hour of the day I can meet the Marquis on this side, without suffering the inconvenience of crossing the river?"

"There will be a bright moon, well up by nine o'clock. Moreover, remember that you cannot, as you say, meet St. Auban on this side at any time he may appoint, since to-night or to-morrow the officer who is in search of you will arrive."

I pondered for a moment. Then, "M. le Vicomte," I said, "in this matter of ground 'tis I who have the first voice."

"How so?"

"Because the Marquis is the affronted one."

"Therefore he has a right to choose."

"A right, yes. But that is not enough. The necessity to fight is on his side. His honour is hurt, not mine. I have whipped him; I am content. Now let him come to me."

"Assuredly you will not be so ungenerous."

"I do not care about journeying to Reaux to afford him satisfaction."

"Does Monsieur fear anything?"

"Vicomte, you go too far!" I cried, my pride gaining the mastery. "Since it is asked of me, I will go."

"M. le Marquis will be grateful to you."

"A fig for his gratitude," I answered, whereupon the Vicomte shrugged his narrow shoulders, and his errand done, took his leave of me.

When he was gone I called Michelot to tell him of the journey I must go that night, so that he might hold himself in readiness.

"Why, if Monsieur will pardon me," quoth he, "do you go to meet the Marquis de St. Auban at St. Sulpice des Reaux by night?"

"Precisely what I asked Vilmorin. The Marquis desires it, and—what will you? Since I am going to kill the man, I can scarce do less than kill him on a spot of his own choosing."

Michelot screwed up his face, and scratched at his grey beard with his huge hand.

"Does no suspicion of foul play cross your mind, Monsieur?" he inquired timidly.

"Shame on you, Michelot!" I returned, with some heat. "Do you not yet understand the ways of gentlemen. Think you that M. de St. Auban would stoop to such a deed as that? He would be shamed for ever. Pooh! I would as soon suspect my Lord Cardinal of stealing the chalices from Notre Dame. Go, see to my horse. I am riding to Canaples."

As I rode out towards the Château I fell to thinking, and my thoughts turning to Vilmorin, I marvelled at the part he was playing in this little comedy of a cabal against Andrea de Mancini. His tastes and instincts were of the boudoir, the antechamber, and the table. He wore a sword because it was so ordained by fashion, and because the hilt was convenient for the display of a jewel or two. Certainly 'twas not for utility that it hung beside him, and no man had ever seen it drawn. Nature had made him the most pitiful coward begotten. Why, then, should he involve himself in an affair which promised bloodshed, and which must be attended by many a risk for him? There was in all this some mystery that I could not fathom.

From the course into which they had slipped, my thoughts were diverted, when I was within half-a-mile of the Château, by the sight of a horseman stationed, motionless, among the trees that bordered the road. It occurred to me that men take not such a position without purpose—usually an evil one. I slackened speed somewhat and rode on, watching him sharply. As I came up, he walked his horse forward to meet me, and I beheld a man in the uniform of the gardes du corps, in whom presently I recognised the little sparrow Malpertuis, with whom I had exchanged witticisms at Choisy. He was the one man wanting to complete the trinity that had come upon us at the inn of the Connêtable.

It flashed across my mind that he might be the officer charged with my arrest, and that he had arrived sooner than had been expected. If so, it was likely to go ill with him, for I was not minded to be taken until St. Auban's soul sped downwards.

He hailed me as I advanced, and, indeed, rode forward to meet me.

"You are come at last, M. de Luynes," was his greeting; "I have waited for you this hour past."

"How knew you I should ride this way?"

"I learnt that you would visit Canaples before noon. Be good enough to quit the road and pass under those trees with me. I have something to say to you, but it were not well that we should be seen together."

"For the sake of your character or mine, M. Malappris?"

"Malpertuis!" he snapped.

"Malpertuis," I corrected. "You were saying that we should not be seen together."

"St. Auban might hear of it."

"Ah! And therefore?"

"You shall learn." We were now under the trees, which, albeit leafless, yet screened us partly from the road. He drew rein, and I followed his example.

"M. de Luynes," he began, "I am or was a member of the cabal formed against Mazarin's aims in the matter of the marriage of Mademoiselle de Canaples to his nephew. I joined hands with St. Auban, lured by his protestations that it is not meet that such an heiress as Yvonne de Canaples should be forced to marry a foreigner of no birth and less distinction whilst France holds so many noble suitors to her hand. This motive, by which I know that even Eugène de Canaples was actuated, was, St. Auban gave me to understand, his only one for embarking upon this business, as it was also Vilmorin's. Now, M. de Luynes, I have to-day discovered that I have been duped by St. Auban and his dupe, Vilmorin. St. Auban lied to me; another motive brings him into the affair. He seeks himself, by any means that may present themselves, to marry Yvonne—and her estates, whilst the girl, I am told, loathes him beyond expression. Vilmorin, again, is actuated by no less a purpose. And so, what think you these two knaves—this master knave and his dupe—have determined? To carry off Mademoiselle by force."

"Heaven forbid!" I burst out, and would have added more, but his gesture silenced me, and he continued—

"Vilmorin believes that St. Auban is helping him in this, whereas St. Auban is but fooling him with ambiguous speeches until they have the lady safe. Then might will assert itself, and St. Auban need but show his fangs to drive the sneaking coward away from the prize he fondly dreams is to be his."

"When do these gentlemen propose to carry out their plan? Have they determined that?" I inquired breathlessly.

"Aye, they have. They hope to accomplish it this very day. Mademoiselle de Canaples has received a letter wherein she is asked to meet her anonymous correspondent in the coppice yonder, at the Angelus, this evening, if she would learn news of great importance to her, touching a conspiracy against her father."

"Faugh!" I sneered. "'Tis too poor a bait to lure her with."

"Say you so? Believe me, that unless she be dissuaded she will comply with the invitation, so cunningly was the letter couched. A closed carriage will be waiting at this very spot. Into this St. Auban, Vilmorin, and their braves will thrust the girl, then away through Blois, and beyond it for a mile or so, in the direction of Meung, thereby misleading any chance pursuers. There they will quit the coach, and take a boat that is to be in waiting for them, and which will bear them back with the stream to Chambord. Thereafter, Heaven pity the poor lady, if they get thus far without mishap!"

"Now I understand!" I cried, slapping my thigh. And to myself I thought of the assignation at St. Sulpice des Reaux; and the reason for this, as also St. Auban's resolution to so suddenly quit Blois, grew of a sudden clear to me. Also did I recall the riddle touching Vilmorin's conduct, which, a few moments ago, I had puzzled over, and of which, methought, that I now held the solution.

"What do you understand?" asked Malpertuis.

"Something that was told me this morning," I made answer; then spoke of gratitude, wherein he cut me short.

"I ask no thanks!" he said curtly. "You owe me none. What I have done is not for love of you or Mancini; for I love neither of you. It is done because I am in honour bound to do it. I told St. Auban that I would have no part in this outrage. But that is not enough; I owe it to my honour to attempt the frustration of so dastardly a plan. You, M. de Luynes, appear to be the most likely person to encompass this, in the interests of your friend, Mancini; I leave the matter therefore in your hands. Good-day."

And with this abrupt leave-taking, the little fellow doffed his hat to me, and wheeling his horse, he set spurs in its flanks, and was gone before a word of mine could have stayed him.

My thoughts were diverted by the sight of a horseman stationed, motionless, among the trees that bordered the road.

CHAPTER XI.

OF A WOMAN'S OBSTINACY.

"M. DE LUYNES is a wizard," quoth Andrea, laughing, in answer to something that had been said.

It was afternoon, we had dined, and the bright sunshine and springlike mildness of the weather had lured us out upon the terrace. Yvonne and Geneviève occupied the stone seat. Andrea had perched himself upon the granite balustrade, and facing them he sat, swinging his shapely legs to and fro, as he chatted merrily, whilst on either side of him stood the Chevalier de Canaples and I.

"If M. de Luynes be as great a wizard in other things as with the sword, then in truth, he is a fearful magician," said Canaples.

I bowed, yet not so low but that I detected a sneer on Yvonne's lips.

"So, pretty lady," said I to myself, "we shall see if presently your lip will curl when I show you something of my wizard's art."

And presently my chance came. M. de Canaples found reason to leave us, and no sooner was he gone than Geneviève remembered that she had that day discovered a budding leaf upon one of the rose-trees in the garden below. Andrea naturally caused an argument by asserting that she was the victim of her fancy, as it was by far too early in the year. By that means, these two found the plea they sought for quitting us, since neither could rest until the other was convinced.

So down they went into that rose-garden, which, methought, was like to prove their fool's paradise, and Yvonne and I were left alone. Then she also arose, but, as she was on the point of quitting me, "Mademoiselle," I ventured, "will you honour me by remaining for a moment? There is something that I would say to you."

With raised eyebrows, she gave me a glance mingled with that superciliousness which she was for ever bestowing upon me, and which, from the monotony of it alone, grew irksome.

"What can you have to say to me, M. de Luynes?"

"Will you not be seated? I shall not long detain you, nevertheless——"

"If I stand, perchance you will be more brief. I am waiting, Monsieur."

I shrugged my shoulders rudely. Why, indeed, be courteous where so little courtesy was met with?

"A little while ago, Mademoiselle, when M. de Mancini dubbed me a wizard, you were good enough to sneer. Now a sneer, Mademoiselle, implies unbelief, and I would convince you that you were wrong to disbelieve."

"If you have no other motive for detaining me, suffer me to depart," she interrupted, with some warmth. "Whether you be a wizard or not, is of no moment to me."

"And yet I dare swear that you will be of a different mind within five minutes. A wizard is one who discloses things unknown to his fellow men. I am about to convince you that I can do this, and by convincing you I am about to serve you."

"I seek neither conviction nor service at your hands," she answered.

"Your courtesy dumfounds me, Mademoiselle."

"No less than your insolence dumfounds me," she retorted, with crimson cheeks. "Do you forget, sir, that I know you for what you are—a gamester, a libertine, a duellist, the murderer of my brother?"

"That your brother lives, Mademoiselle, is, methinks, sufficient proof that I have not murdered him."

"You willed his death if you did not encompass it; so 'tis all one. Do you not understand that it is because my father receives you here, thanks to M. de Mancini, your friend—a friendship easily understood from the advantages you must derive from it—that I consent to endure your presence and the insult of your glance? Is it not enough that I should do this, and have you not wit enough to discern it, without adding to my shame by your insolent call upon my courtesy?"

Her words cut me as no words that I ever heard, and, more than her words, her tone of loathing and disgust unspeakable. For half that speech I should have killed a man—indeed I had killed men for less than half. And yet for all the passion that raged in my soul, I preserved upon my countenance a smiling mask. That smile exhausted her patience and increased her loathing, for, with a contemptuous exclamation she turned away.

"Tarry but a moment, Mademoiselle," I cried, with a sudden note of command. "Or, if you will go, go then, but take with you my assurance that before nightfall you will weep bitterly for it."

My words arrested her. The mystery of them awakened her curiosity.

"You speak in riddles, Monsieur."

"Like a true wizard, Mademoiselle. You received a letter this morning in a handwriting unknown, and bearing no signature."

She wheeled round and faced me again with a little gasp of astonishment.

"How know you that? Ah! I understand. You wrote it."

"What shrewdness, Mademoiselle!" I laughed ironically. "Come, think again. What need have I to bid you meet me in the coppice yonder? May I not speak freely with you here?"

"You know the purport of that letter?"

"I do, Mademoiselle, and I know more. I know that this hinted conspiracy against your father is a trumped-up lie to lure you to the coppice."

"And for what purpose, pray?"

"An evil one—your abduction. Shall I tell you who penned that note, and who awaits you? The Marquis César de St. Auban!"

She shuddered as I pronounced the name, then, looking me straight between the eyes, "How came you to know these things?" she inquired.

"What does it signify since I know them?"

"This, Monsieur—that unless I learn how, I can attach no credit to your preposterous story."

"Not credit it?" I cried. "Let me assure you that I have spoken the truth. Let me swear it. Go to the coppice at the appointed time, and things will fall out as I have predicted."

"Again, Monsieur, how do you know this?" she persisted, as women will.

"I may not tell you."

We stood close together, and her clear grey eyes met mine, her lip curling in disdain.

"You may not tell me? You need not. I can guess it." And she tossed her shapely head and laughed. "Seek some likelier story, Monsieur. Had you not spoken of it, 'tis likely I should have left the letter unheeded. But your disinterested warning has determined me to go to the rendezvous. Shall I tell you what I have guessed? That this conspiracy against my father, the details of which you would not have me learn, is some evil of your own devising. Ah! You change colour," she cried, pointing to my face. Then, with a laugh of disdain, she left me before I had sufficiently recovered from my amazement to bid her stay.

"Heavens!" I cried, as I watched the tall, lissom figure vanish through the portals of the Château. "Did ever God create so crass and obstinate a thing as woman?"

It occurred to me to tell Andrea, and bid him warn her. But then she would guess that I had prompted him. Naught remained but to lay the matter before the Chevalier de Canaples. Already I had informed him of my unpleasantness with St. Auban, and of the duel that was to be fought that night and he, in his turn, had given me the details of his stormy interview with the Marquis, which had culminated in St. Auban's dismissal from Canaples. I had not hitherto deemed it necessary to alarm him with the news imparted me by Malpertuis, imagining that did I inform Mademoiselle, that would suffice.

Now, however, as I have said, no other course was left me but to tell him of it. Accordingly, I went within, and inquired of Guilbert, whom I met in the hall, where I might find the Chevalier. He answered me that M. de Canaples was not in the Château. It was believed that he had gone with M. Louis, the intendant of the estates, to visit the vineyards at Monteroix.

The news made my gorge rise with impatience. Already it was close upon five o'clock, and in another hour the sun would set and the Angelus would toll the knell of Mademoiselle's preposterous suspicions, unless in the meantime I had speech with Canaples, and led him to employ a father's authority to keep his daughter indoors.

Fuming at the delay, I called for my horse, and set out at a brisk trot for Monteroix. But my ride was fruitless; the vineyard peasants had not seen the Chevalier for over a week.

Now 'twixt Monteroix and the Château there lies a good league, and to make matters worse, as I galloped furiously back to Canaples, an evil chance led me to mistake the way, and pursue a track that brought me out to the very banks of the river, with a strong belt of trees screening the Château from sight, and defying me to repair my error by going straight ahead.

I was forced to retrace my steps, and before I had regained the point where I had gone astray, a precious quarter of an hour was wasted, and the sun already hung, a dull red globe, on the brink of the horizon.

Clenching my teeth, I tore at my horse's flanks, and with a bloody heel I drove the maddened brute along at a pace that might have cost us both dearly. I dashed, at last, into the quadrangle, and throwing the reins to a gaping groom, I sprang up the steps.

"Is the Chevalier returned?" I gasped breathlessly.

"Not yet, Monsieur," answered Guilbert, with a tranquillty that made me desire to strangle him.

"Is Mademoiselle in the Château?" was my next question, mechanically asked.

"I saw her on the terrace some moments ago. She has not since come within."

Like one possessed I flew across the intervening room and out on to the terrace. Geneviève and Andrea were walking there, deep in conversation. At another time I might have reviled their lack of prudence. At the moment I did not so much as remark it.

"Where is Mademoiselle de Canaples?" I burst out.

They gazed at me as much astounded by my question and the abruptness of it as by my apparent agitation.

"Has anything happened?" inquired Geneviève, her blue eyes wide open.

"Yes—no; naught has happened. Tell me where she is. I must speak to her."

"She was here a while ago," said Andrea, "but she left us, to stroll along the river bank."

"How long is it since she left you?"

"A quarter of an hour perhaps!"

"Something has happened!" cried Geneviève, and added more maybe, but waited not to hear.

Muttering curses as I ran—for 'tis my way to curse where pious souls might pray—I sped back to the quadrangle and my horse.

"Follow me!" I shouted to the groom, "you and as many of your fellows as you can find. Follow me at once—at once, mark you—to the coppice by the river." And without waiting for his answer, I sent my horse thundering down the avenue. The sun was gone, leaving naught but a roseate streak to tell of its passage, and at that moment a distant bell tinkled forth the Angelus.

With whip, spur and imprecations I plied my steed, a prey to such excitement as I had never known until that moment—not even in the carnage of battle.

I had no plan. My mind was a chaos of thought, without a single clear idea to light it, and I never so much as bethought me that single-handed I was about to attempt to wrest Yvonne from the hands of perchance half-a-dozen men. To save time I did not far pursue the road, but, clearing a hedge, I galloped as hard as I could across the meadow towards the coppice by the water side. As I rode I saw no sign of any moving thing. No sound disturbed the evening's stillness save the dull thump of my horse's hoofs upon the turf, and a great fear arose in my heart that I might come too late.

At last I reached the belt of trees, and my fears grew into certainty. The place was deserted.

She wheeled round and faced me with a little gasp of astonishment.

Then a fresh hope sprang up. Perchance, thinking of my warning, she had seen the emptiness of her suspicions towards me, and had pursued that walk of hers in another direction.

But when I had penetrated to the little open space within that cluster of naked trees, I had proof overwhelming that the worst had befallen. Not only on the moist ground was stamped the impress of struggling feet, but on a branch I found a strip of torn green velvet, and remembering the dress she had worn that day, I understood to the full the significance of that rag, and understanding it, I groaned aloud.

Short Stories That . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 13th. Postcards only, please.

Nothing to Grasp.

"I CAN'T give you a job," said Mr. Dimity to an applicant for employment. "I'd like to employ you, but you grasp the situation, don't you?" "Well, sir," was the reply, "under the circumstances I hardly see how I can."

Charging for Time.

CHEMIST'S ASSISTANT: "Good gracious! I have kept that woman waiting three-quarters of an hour. I forgot all about her prescription." Chemist: "You will have to charge her a good tall price in order to make her think you had a lot of trouble in mixing it up."

He had Sold the Apricots.

"DON'T you eat tart?" he asked the young man who sat next to him in the restaurant. "Oh yes," "But you don't take any." "He said apricot tart." "But what's the matter with apricot tart?" "Why, I'm the grocery clerk who sold him the tinned apricots, and gave him twenty per cent. off because we had had the tins in stock three years."

His Dearest Treasure.

"YOUNG man," said the fond father, "in giving you my daughter I have intrusted you with the dearest treasure of my life." The young man was duly impressed. Then he looked at his watch. "Really," he remarked, "I had no idea it was so late. The trams have stopped. Could I borrow your bicycle to get back home?" "Young man, I would not trust anybody on earth with that bicycle."

Ample Proof.

"YOU'RE pretty small," said the man who was engaging some men to go on an exploring expedition with him. "I shouldn't think you had enough endurance to stand——" "Endurance!" exclaimed the little man. "Why, sir, I've got a record for that." "How so?" "I put in a whole afternoon at a football match in the rain with a girl six feet tall, and held the umbrella over her head. If that doesn't show endurance I should like to know——" "That's enough. You'll do."

A Pity to Part Them.

AN elderly lady went to an English country market one day to buy a Christmas goose. At a stall where she called, two live geese were exposed for sale, both in custody of a cherry-cheeked country lass. The little maid would not sell one goose without the other. Remembering that a friend had expressed a wish for a Christmas bird, the customer was easily prevailed on to take both. But as she was concluding the bargain it occurred to her to ask the maid why she had refused to sell the geese separately "If you please, ma'am," was the naïve answer. "mother said as how the geese had lived together for twenty years, and it would be cruel to part them.'

She Hadn't Told.

"JENNIE," said little Mabel to her big sister at breakfast, "did you tell papa?" "Tell papa what?" asked Jennie. "Why you told Mr. Bustler last night if he did it again you'd tell papa—and he did it again. I saw him!" And then papa looked at Jennie over his glasses.

Lowering the Record.

MOTHER (to her elderly unmarried daughter): "Why Julia, what do you mean by using the Family Bible in that way? You are scratching out figures in the family record, and inserting others." Julia: "It is a record of my birth, isn't it?" "Yes, it is." "Well, I'm lowering the record."

One was Enough.

"HOLD on!" said the doorkeeper at the theatre, as the swain pushed past him, "you can't both go in on that; this ticket is for only one seat." "That's all right, mister, one cheer's been big enough to hold both of us many a time, ain't it, Liza?" And in a cloud of Liza's best blushes they were gone through.

A Test of True Gentility.

"WHAT'S the new lodger like, Mary Ann?" "He's no gentleman, whatever he's like!" "No gentleman! What's he been and done?" "Why, he see me a-carryin' up the coals, an' 'e says: 'I'm afraid that scuttle's too heavy for you,' 'e says; 'pray let me carry it!' 'e says. An' 'e ups and carries it 'isself, just like a footman!"

Rather Suspicious.

MABEL: "Such a joke on Mr. Gayboy. We were out on the balcony between the dances, and he got the sleeve of his dress coat all over red paint from one of the posts that were just painted." Maud: "And did you go near the post?" Mabel: "No. Why?" Maud: "Because you have red paint all over the side of your dress."

Keeping Up Appearances.

IT was one of Smith's little weaknesses to appear to be in a better position than was really the case. One day he took his eldest son for a walk, and permitted him to play with some other boys while he read the paper. On the way home Smith inquired: "What were you talking about to those boys?" "Oh!" replied the boy, "I was telling them that you were our footman. I did it to keep up appearances, you know."

He Had Come for the Rest of It.

DOORKEEPER OF THEATRE: "You cannot come in on this ticket. It is dated 1896." McWhahagan: "Oi'd like to know whei Oi can't come in with it. The thayaytre sould it to me to come in." "They couldn't possibly sell you a ticket dated 1896. That's five years old." "Av coorse it is. Look here; this here programme sez: 'Foive years elapse between acts wan an two,' so Oi've come to see the second act; but Oi'll be hanged if Oi remember what the first was about."

A SWISS LOVE STORY.

In a pretty chalet that nestled high upon the shaggy breast of Mount Obgadin lived the widow Neur and her daughter Marie.

When fierce storms came rushing down the mountain side, she knew the trees would bend their tall heads together and twine their strong arms around her home, until, robbed of his victim, the baffled storm rushed on.

When morning broke the same friends stood erect and stately, drawing aside their leaves and branches, that the sunbeams might not linger in their soft embraces, but hasten down to awaken their favourite, Marie.

Very lovely was the little Swiss maid, with violet eyes that now danced and sparkled and then grew soft and tender as a little child's. Two rose-red lips shut in her pearly teeth, and when she smiled a dimple danced for a moment on her peachy cheek. Her hair hung in caressing curls around her low white forehead, and fell in ripples of sunshine far below her slender waist. And her voice! Ah! that was Marie's greatest charm. Soft and clear, not a discordant note marred its sweet, pure harmony. Sometimes as she sang at her evening devotions the herdsmen far below in the valley, catching faint notes of her song, looked up and crossed themselves, half-believing they heard an echo of an angel choir.

But very few knew of Marie's beauty. For when she went with her mother on one of her rare visits to the hamlet below, she brushed her wavy hair straight and smooth from her forehead, and braided it in long stiff plaits which fell down her back.

Her eyelids, with their curtains of long, silky lashes, drooped over her dancing eyes until one looked in vain for a glimpse of their beauty. Her red lips shut firmly over her pearly teeth, while the dimple hid itself resolutely away from sight. And her sweet voice, frightened at its own sound so far from home, grew faint and husky, until, in this shrinking, sober damsel, walking so timidly beside the widow Neur, you would have found it hard to recognise the beautiful Marie of the mountain.

So it happened that only her mother and one other person knew how good and sweet and fair Marie was.

The other was a stranger who came from a far-away country, and spent his summers in a little house on the mountain's very top.

The simple villagers called him "the wizard," and told strange tales of how he spent whole nights gazing at the heavens through a long tube; that he could foretell to an hour when the sun would cover itself with darkness; but strangest of all, he had a little wire stretched for miles over hills and valleys to the great city! This wire talked to him in a queer language which no one could understand.

"Tick, tick, tickety, tick," it said, and it told him things that happened miles and miles away.

Marie did not know how wise the wizard was when he came to her home one morning and asked for a drink of water.

He followed her to the spring when she went for it, and stopped by the way to break open a curious stone. He showed Marie how queerly marked it was inside, and then told her a story about it. The usually timid maiden was so interested she forgot to be frightened, and thus a strong friendship between the two was begun.

After this, the wizard often came to the widow Neur's chalet for rest and refreshment on his long rambles, and Marie unconsciously revealed her charms to him, one by one, until long before the first summer was ended the stranger knew that no girl in all the canton could be compared with Marie.

On the other side of the mountain from the widow Neur's lived another widow. She, too, had but one child, a son, who was the pride and delight of her life. This was the brave young hunter and guide, Gustavus Friel.

Everyone knew and liked Gustavus. He was straight, tall and handsome with flashing brown eyes, and a laugh as frank as a child's. He was the favourite of the canton, and there was not a girl within its bounds who would not have been proud to plight her troth with him.

Gustavus, however, cared little for the Obgadin maidens. He would far rather chase the chamois up the mountain-side or guide travellers through its dangerous passes than spend his time with the finest of the maids of the hamlet.

His mother often said: "My son, when wilt thou bring me home a daughter and thyself a wife?"

And Gustavus, smiling and pressing a kiss on her forehead, would answer:

"When I find a maid as good as thee, mother; but I want no idle, shrill-voiced wife to disturb our quiet home."

But one day his mother said more sadly and seriously than ever before:

"Gustavus, I am growing old and feeble. I can no longer make and mend thy clothes and keep our home. Thou must have a wife. Promise me at the fête next week thou wilt choose one from among the maidens there."

Gustavus reluctantly gave the desired promise, but it weighed heavily upon him. He could think of nothing else, and the more he pondered the heavier his heart grew.

At last he seized his gun and went out on the mountain, but the perplexing question followed him, until in despair he threw himself on the ground groaning: "Oh, that some wise man would make this choice for me!"

A moment after he looked up and saw, as if in answer to his wish, the wizard approaching him.

"Why," he exclaimed to himself, "did I not think of him before? Surely he, if anyone, can help me." Then, with a throbbing heart, Gustavus sprang up to meet him.

The wizard greeted Gustavus warmly, for he felt a strong friendship for the young guide who had taken him safely through many a dangerous mountain excursion.

And now his sympathetic question: "Why, what's troubling you, my boy?" opened the way for Gustavus to pour out all his perplexity, ending the recital with the question:

"Canst thou not help me choose a good wife who would make my life happy? For now I have given my mother my promise to find a wife at the fête next week."

The wizard smiled sympathetically, and then thought in silence a little while before he answered:

"If a pure true heart is united to a true, pure heart both lives must be happy."

"Alas!" answered Gustavus, "but I know not which maiden among them all has the purest, truest heart."

"There will be one such heart at the fête," answered the wizard, "but you may fail to recognise it. However, if you will come to me to-morrow I will give you a charm that will show you this heart."

Here was comfort, indeed, and with a light heart Gustavus thanked his friend and bounded forward.

Left alone, the wizard continued down the mountain-side, until he came in sight of the widow Neur's chalêt, where he found Marie sitting by the spring. Instead of her usual sunshiny smile, tiny tear-drops stood in her eyes, and there was a grieved look about her rosy lips that made him wish to comfort her.

"What is the matter, little one?" he asked gently.

"Oh, sir," she said, "I want to see the great fête next week, but I have no pretty ornaments to wear, and then——" The long curtains drooped over her shining eyes and the sweet voice sank almost to a whisper. "The good mother says none of the young men will care to dance with me."

"But why?" asked the wizard, in surprise.

"Because I cannot talk and laugh with them as other maidens do. My heart beats fast if they do but glance toward me, and I know not what to say, and so"—here a tear slipped from under the long lashes—"my mother says I had better not go."

"Courage, little one," the wizard answered. "Tell your mother," he added, "that I am going to lend you a silver belt to wear, and that my knowledge tells me that the bravest, handsomest youth in all the land will dance with you quite joyfully."

The happy Marie thanked the wizard as Gustavus had done, and ran off to tell the wonderful news to her mother.

Early next morning Gustavus went for his charm. He found the wizard waiting for him, and, taking him into his strange room, the wise man said, smiling, as he had the day before, half-quizzically, half-sympathetically:

"Here's the charm, my good fellow. You see it is a magic ring. Put it on before you go to the fête, and be sure you dance with every maiden there. When you place your arm about the waist of the one whose heart is true and good a strange feeling will run through you and your hand will cling to her. But be sure that you dance with all!"

Gustavus, greatly wondering, thanked the wizard, and slipped on the ring.

It was a curious circlet of iron, with a flat extension, which the wizard bade him wear pointing toward his palm.

When the fête day came Gustavus was there among the other young men, eager to try his charm.

All the maidens of Obgadin canton were there also, and on the outskirts of one of the gay crowds little Marie hovered timidly beside her mother.

"Why didst thou come, Marie?" asked one of the girls.

"Didst thou think any youth would want to dance with a mouse to-day?" asked another.

Then, seeing the quick tears trembling on Marie's lashes, she added more kindly:

"Ah, well, thou canst at least see our good times."

"What a lovely belt thou hast, Marie!" cried another maiden. "Where didst thou get it?"

"The wizard gave it her," the widow Neur answered shortly, for she did not relish the girl's tone, and she drew her daughter away.

"Come, Marie, let us sit here under the trees and watch the dance."

Marie nestled close to her mother's side, and, as the hours fled and no youth asked her to dance, her head dropped lower and lower, and she wondered if the wise man had made a mistake.

In the meantime Gustavus danced with one after another of the maids, but though he watched with intense eagerness, not once did he feel the strange thrill for which he waited.

"I have danced with them all," he said at last to himself, "except that shy one over there; surely she is not the girl! But as I promised to dance with all, I will try her, too."

He asked her name of one of the girls, and then going to her, said simply:

"Marie, wilt thou dance with me?"

Astonishment and delight made Marie for a moment forget her shyness. The wizard's words were come true!

Rising quickly, she said, smiling upon him:

"Art thou come?"

"She is not so plain, after all," thought Gustavus, as he answered:

"Wast thou looking for me, Marie?"

Marie hung her head without answering, and Gustavus wondering a little at her words, led her to the dance.

As he placed his arm around her his hand touched her shining belt.

Instantly a strange thrill ran through them both, and Gustavus' arm seemed to cling to Marie's waist.

"Marie, didst thou feel that?" he cried earnestly.

And Marie smilingly answered:

"Yes."

So they began dancing, and as they danced it seemed to those watching them that a wonderful transformation came over Marie.

Her hair, shaken loose from its long, stiff braids, hung like a glittering golden veil all around her, her beautiful eyes shone like stars, and the dimpled cheeks and pearly teeth formed a fit hiding-place for the laughing voice that now and then rang sweet and clear from her rosy lips. Not one of the village maidens was half so fair as she!

"Surely," said the amazed villagers, "there never was such a handsome couple."

"But is not Marie under a charm," cried others, "she has suddenly grown so lovely?"

But the widow Neur smiled to herself and said:

"Love's witchery, if it is true and pure, will transform all of us and bring out all that is loveliest and best within us."

As for Gustavus, he thought rightly that he had never seen so good and beautiful a creature, and he blessed the wizard for the charm which had led his heart to her.

Long before the summer ended, Gustavus took home Marie to be his own and his mother's greatest joy and happiness.

When M. le Wizard returned to Paris that winter, he read a scientific paper before the savants of the Academy.

In it he detailed many of his wonderful discoveries and his work during the summer. But he did not speak of the most interesting of all—how, by the aid of a little magnet concealed in a steel belt, and a rude ring, he had brought together two loving hearts, and by so doing had caught some of the happiness of paradise and imprisoned it in a chalêt on old Obgadin Mountain.

NAME-HUNTING COMPETITION: RAILWAY STATIONS.

3rd Prize: A Columbia Graphophone with 12 Records.

One Sovereign will be given to every Competitor, no matter how many errors may be made, who is one of those whose attempts form the greatest number sent in from any one place mentioned in the correct solutions to this Competition.

For example, if more competitors send in from Newhaven than from any other place, each of these competitors will receive £1, no matter how wrong they may be.

Each separate competitor will count as one—not each set of coupons. Therefore, induce your friends to enter for the competition. If you get a few friends to do so, and they in turn each induce a few friends, the number will soon mount up, and each will get a golden sovereign, no matter how many.

Don't wait until you are half-way through the competition before you ask your friends. Tell them about it at once.

 The Billiard Table is made by J. R. Mally and Co., 15 Goswell Road, E.C., and will go into a furnished room 13ft. square. It has a slate bed, and will stand on any dining-table. The cues, balls, marking-board and spirit level are included.*

Below will be found thirty-six sets of words, each set describing the name of a railway station in the United Kingdom, the name of which will be found in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

Write down in the spaces provided the names of all those places you can discover. If you can't find all, put down as many as you can.

Note These Facts. . .

1. Names must be written in ink.
2. Only one name is allowed against each set of words.
3. When you have filled up your list cut it out and get the next number of Pearson's Weekly, in which another coupon appears.
4. You may send in as many sets of lists as you like, but each set will be accepted independently, and must be pinned together.
5. In the event of the prize being divided, only one share will go to each successful competitor, no matter how many duplicate attempts he may send in.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the reader from whom we receive the greatest number of correct solutions. The second prize will be given to the sender of the next most nearly correct solutions, and so on. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor, whose decision is final.

Miss Sanders' Mysterious Death.

NORBURY HALL is the name of a fashionable boarding school for girls, situated about a mile and three quarters from a pretty little Devon village. There were about three score of girls at the Hall, and not a man about the building. Though it is true there were three men teachers who lived perhaps a quarter of a mile away, and there were four gardeners who lived in their cottages about the same distance in the opposite direction.

It was almost ten o'clock, and profound silence had reigned throughout the Hall for some time. Lights had been extinguished at nine-thirty as was the rule. At nine the evening's studies ceased, and the next half-hour was allowed for the girls to retire. At ten they were supposed to be peacefully wrapped in their beauty sleep.

Suddenly a fearful shriek rent the air.

Now a mouse might have caused a girl to shriek mildly, or if some over studious girl, having kept her candle alight while poring over her lessons, had suddenly had a cold key dropped down her neck by a room mate with a tendency for practical jokes, she might also have given a scream of fright. But it would not have been in either case like the wild shriek that did come from somewhere in the building, and every mother's daughter there knew it.

Girls believe there is safety in numbers in such cases, and it is surprising how quickly they emerged from their rooms, in all stages of undress, and met in the great hallway, where they passed whispered words of inquiry as they huddled together.

The appearance of the headmistress and two of her assistants put a quietus on the girls.

"What is it?" she asked, trying to be more stern than usual, to keep up her courage.

No one could give a satisfactory reply for no one knew. Some conjectured that the cry came from the upper floor, others ventured that it came from the lower, where were the chapel and recitation rooms, now dark and deserted; others insisted that it sounded without, in the grounds.

The headmistress, Miss Crapple, maintained her reputation for firmness of character and quick decision; she satisfied herself that the cry had not come from the upper storey where her apartments, and those of the other teachers and some of the girls were situated, and she headed the procession of a dozen or more candles downstairs to the corridor below, where the other girls had now assembled.

Miss Crapple ran her sharp eye over the feminine army which surrounded her.

"Where is Miss Deering?" she asked loudly. The girls looked at each other in consternation, and drew back from a certain door, which it was then noticed remained closed, though all the others had been left ajar as the girls came out,

"Where's Bessie Sanders? She isn't here either!" chorussed several girls with bated breath.

Bessie Sanders and Alice Deering were close friends and room-mates. The girls of Norbury Hall lived well. Some of their apartments were superbly furnished. They were all of good families, and were not watched as in some schools. Good conduct was a point of honour in which it was believed they never failed.

Miss Crapple stepped up to the door of this room with a firm tread, though her heart was beating fit to burst.

She knocked.

No response was made.

She tried the door handle. The door was locked!

She stooped to the key-hole, the room within was lighted. She asked one of her assistants to fetch her bunch of master-keys. A score of girls moved off with her as a body guard. When they returned, Miss Crapple inserted one, and after some difficulty, succeeded in forcing out the other key, and opening the door.

Miss Crapple entered.

The girls crowded about the door, but none would venture in, until those at the rear, not more bold, but pushing and craning to try and see, forced a dozen into the room.

Thus in the room they followed Miss Crapple, and they made the discovery at the same time as the head-mistress, and with wild screams of terror fled back to the hall.

In the centre of the room was a table, upon which was a lighted lamp and several books. Lying upon the floor on the opposite side was the body of a girl. It was Bessie Sanders.

Miss Crapple turned white, and a shiver ran through her frame, but she kept her courage. The girl was dead. There could be no doubt about that. The white face and the rigid features told that. The handle of a knife protruding from the girl's bosom showed how the deed had been done.

The headmistress leant over the girl, and called to some of those standing at the door to come to her assistance. Several ventured in.

"Help me to lift this—Miss Sanders on to the sofa," said Miss Crapple.

One of the girls who had assisted in lifting Miss Sanders' body on to the sofa, suddenly cried in a hysterical voice—

"Look!"

She pointed to the dead girl's bosom. "The knife—that did it—is Miss Deering's! And Miss Deering is not here!"

Then she fainted. Another chill of horror convulsed all the girls, and while this one was being brought to, another became hysterical, and several others burst into tears, making the scene one of pathos and confusion.

When the girl had been brought out of her faint, Miss Crapple said, "We must have assistance. Ring the chapel bell, it will arouse the men."

A dozen girls went out to do this bidding. The chapel bell could be rung by pulling a rope which hung in the lower main hallway. Soon the clash and clangour of the bell sounded out in the still night as it had never done before, all who heard those sounds would know that there was something wrong at the Hall.

While this was being done, Miss Crapple, and some of the more courageous girls were making a search of the rooms. Two of the girls, holding fast to each other's hands, paused before one of the windows, and drew the curtains back. The window was open!

Outside the window, was a small stone balcony, over which a growth of ivy trailed. The girls peered out. The light from within the room shone upon the dress of a girl, lying still upon the balcony.

"Miss Crapple, here is Miss Deering!" one of the girls cried, which brought all who were present to the window. One of the girls fetched the student's lamp from the table, and its rays streamed out in the darkness, and disclosed the fact that Miss Deering lay huddled upon the balcony in an insensible condition. Perhaps she was dead too.

Miss Crapple, with wonderful strength, got out of the window and lifted the girl, then, with the aid of those within, she was carried in and laid upon the bed.

It was then seen that she lived, though she carried a terrible wound on her head. If she could be brought to, perhaps she would be able to disclose the secret of the terrible doings of the night, thought Miss Crapple.

One of the girls exclaimed excitedly:

"Oh, dear, if we only could get a doctor. I'm sure she'll never live till morning."

* * * * *

Though it seemed hours to the girls of the school before help arrived, it was in fact less than half-an-hour from the time the bell first clanged, when the venerable headmaster of the school, Mr. Converse, with his two assistant professors, were in the main hall asking the cause of alarm.

At such times a man is a very useful article, and the presence of these at once restored quiet and confidence in all present. The men were led first to the room of death, and then the headmaster, with Miss Crapple, went into the room where Miss Deering lay. At this moment three of the gardeners arrived, and two were sent for a doctor at once.

Mr. Converse did what he could for the injured girl, and then began to discuss with the head mistress the awful tragedy, and its possible cause. But it was all conjecture, and not the slightest clue could be found from anything that had ever been said by, or had happened to, either the dead girl or her insensible room mate.

"Scotland Yard must be apprised of this," said Mr. Converse, "but before they come in to muddle up this, I am going to call in my young friend Adrian Skillet, who has startled London and the world with his wonderful ability as a detective."

Accordingly, when the two gardeners returned with the doctor, they were again sent off. This time to the nearest railway station, with instructions to have a message sent to Mr. Skillet over the company's private wire.

The mists had hardly risen from the fields the next morning, when a young man strode up to Norbury Hall, and used both bell and knocker at the main entrance.

It was Mr. Skillet; he had caught the midnight train out of London, and had walked the distance from the station to the school. In a case of this kind time was valuable, and it would be losing time to look about for some means of conveyance.

The headmaster seemed to know who his early visitor was, and he did not keep him waiting many minutes.

"Ah, you are early," he said, greeting the great detective cordially, "I am glad to see you again, though I could wish the need of your presence were less tragic. It is a terrible affair, terrible."

Mr. Skillet led the way upstairs, and straight to the door of the room where the tragedy occurred.

"But how did you know this?" exclaimed Mr. Converse. "Have you seen any of the gardeners?"

"I have met no one," replied Mr. Skillet. "I decided where it had taken place as I crossed the garden. I hope the room has not been disturbed?" he added, as they entered.

"I think not, though of course many of the young ladies were here last night, and they were in a great state of excitement."

"You know each and every one who has been in the room?" the detective asked, without manifesting any undue interest in this particular point.

"Miss Crapple will be able to inform you exactly."

The detective nodded.

Briefly Mr. Converse acquainted the detective with all that had happened.

"Will you be so good as to leave me alone for a time?" asked Mr. Skillet.

"Certainly! You will not disturb this room," pointing to a door that led out of the room in which the tragedy had occurred. "Miss Deering and her attendant are there."

The detective reassured Mr. Converse on this point, and was left alone. For almost an hour he remained therein, and no one knew what he did. The ringing of the first bell caused him to refer to his watch, and he saw it was seven-thirty.

He went out and found Mr. Converse in the office on the floor below.

"The young ladies will be coming down to breakfast presently, I daresay," he said, "Could you bring before me here all who were in the room last night before they sit down to breakfast?"

Mr. Converse promised that it should be done, and went out himself to look up Miss Crapple, and ten minutes later a troop of fifteen young ladies, all looking very sad and frightened and pale, were ushered in before the detective.

Mr. Skillet called each one aside, and held an animated conversation, in which he put quick questions very much to the purpose, and now and then frightened some more than others, as he jotted down in a note-book some of the answers they gave.

When this trying work was over he asked to see Miss Deering, and while the girls trooped into the breakfast-room, he was led upstairs again to the bedside of the girl who perhaps knew more of what had happened than any other living person.

The girl was fortunately awake, and the attendant was trying to persuade her to take some nourishment.

She turned her face to the wall when the two men with Miss Crapple entered the room.

Adrian Skillet moved to the bedside of the girl. Leaning over her he said gently, "Miss Deering, will you tell me all you know of this affair?"

The girl muttered some words, but they were inaudible.

"Do not attempt to deceive me," said the detective, "I know all that has taken place. I know that you understand me, and would reply if you could. I know the motive that prompts you to attempt this deception, you desire to shield the murderer of your friend."

The girl buried her face in the pillow, as though she wished to shut out the words.

"Although everything points to you as being guilty, I know that you are innocent," said Adrian. "You were not in the room when the deed was done, though you came in immediately afterwards.

"You left the room secretly, that is, in a way that nobody but Miss Sanders knew of. There is a rope ladder by which you have been in the habit of passing from your room into the garden. I have this now in my possession. It is evident that you went out into the garden for the purpose of allowing some one to enter the room.

"At any rate that is my belief. A man was in the room, and of this I have absolute proof. I know that he is very tall, by certain marks which his moist hands have left upon the wall.

"I know also that he is light complexioned, and I think I shall be able to recognise him when I meet him, which will be before very long. I am going over to Coreham to-day."

Adrian had named this town only at a venture. It was the nearest town of a goodly size. It was about three miles from the school. But he knew at once that his random shot had gone home, and that the man he wanted was to be found there, for Miss Deering gave a stifled little scream at the mention of the name, and buried her face deeper in the pillow.

"I do not think I will say more," he said, turning to Miss Crapple, and Mr. Converse, who stood near. "It may be serious if I alarm her too much while in this delicate condition."

Converse looked in amazed wonder at his friend the detective. "How did you know all this so soon?"

"By a single hair," replied the detective.

"A hair!"

"Yes. It is a very slender clue, to be sure, but it is the only clue I could find, for the imprint of the fingers upon the wall is by no means conclusive evidence that a man was in the room.

"This hair was the reward of my patient search. It is from a man's head. Look!"

He took a single hair very carefully out of a little book and a powerful magnifying-glass out of another pocket.

"You see how the end is cut? It is a mark that is made by scissors. Its length, too, would indicate that the man wore his hair of medium length. Of all the shades of hair to be found in this school there is not one to match this in colour. If you will look through the glass you will see it has a peculiar kink in it. When I have found the man with hair like that, I have got the one who was in this room last night.

"This young lady would shield him, it seems. Perhaps because she loves him, though I don't know about that yet, because it is evident the man called to visit her friend and not to see her.

"But with this clue I will bring the murderer to the gallows!"

The detective raised his voice so that it could be distinctly heard by the girl in the bed. They were like an electric shock, for she sat up in bed and called out wildly. "You are wrong. No man struck that blow!"

The three turned to Miss Deering.

"Let me tell you now. Listen: It is true a man visited Bessie in that room last night. He has done so often—"

"What!" cried Miss Crapple, in amazed horror, "you dared to permit such infamy!"

"There was no wrong. I know the man, and his honour is above reproach. Even without my confidence in Bessie, I should have no fear.

"Her father denied him the right to call upon her at home because he was poor.

"They loved each other, and I consented to help them in their clandestine meetings. He used to come in by the ladder, often. I was never present, I could not bear it—for—for—I loved him.

"Sometimes I would remain in this room, and sometimes I would go into the garden before he came, and remained there if the night was fine until he went away.

"That was what I did last night, from eight till some time after nine.

"Then I returned, and while concealing the ladder, Bessie screamed. Her cry froze the blood in my veins, but when I got my senses, I parted the curtains and looked into the room.

"Bessie lay still upon the floor. I thought at first she must have fainted, but as I looked I saw something else, the door of the room was softly closing. Then I saw the dagger in Bessie's breast, and I knew she had been murdered, and I knew too, that it must have been done by a jealous woman—one who had loved the man, and having surprised the secret meetings, had killed her rival."

The girl fell back exhausted.

The professor's eyes searched the detective's face, but no mortal can read the secrets of that mind.

"Let us leave her for the present," said the detective. "I should like to see the young lady who fainted last night, and so quickly recovered."

Miss Crapple sent for the young lady.

"Miss Deering has furnished a valuable clue," Adrian Skillet suggested. "You can tell me, perhaps, Miss Crapple, who the young man is who was refused permission to see Miss Sanders. Her father would, no doubt, have informed you, so that no meetings might take place near the school."

"That is something I cannot understand," replied Miss Crapple. "I am sure nothing of the kind has ever happened. Mr. Sanders himself was here on a visit less than a month ago, and if there had been any cause for greater vigilance over his daughter, I am sure he would have confided in me."

The young lady who had been sent for came, and Adrian Skillet cross-examined her about many things for about fifteen minutes, and then dismissed her.

"Let us go and see Miss Deering again," he said, "I want to have this question about the young man cleared up. We will ask a few direct questions."

They went toward her room. In the hallway they met the nurse just returning. She said the girl had been brought to, and seemed all right now, and that she—the nurse—had gone down to the kitchen to prepare something Miss Deering had specially requested.

When they arrived at the bedroom the bed was empty—the girl had disappeared!

Consternation was in the faces of all save the detective. She was gone, it was clear, but she was not going to get away from him in a few minutes like that.

"Do not be alarmed," he said reassuringly. "I will find her."

How he did it need not be recapitulated here. The remarkable skill with which he could follow an apparently invisible trail was the very foundation of all his greatness. He went out to the hall way to the lower floor, and out into the garden with something of the instinct with which the hound follows the trail. Across the the ground towards a small wood, which he penetrated, and found, as he had expected, that the wall surrounding the college grounds skirted this wood. Upon the top of this wall sat the object of his search. She had dressed herself very hastily, yet there was little in her appearance to excite remark.

The road was well travelled, and many people passed while the detective watched her. She concealed herself adroitly, by means of an overhanging branch of a tree as each pedestrian neared where she sat.

Presently a boy chanced along. This was apparently what she had been waiting for. She called him, and when he approached, held towards him a note and some coins, while she explained what she wished him to do. At this moment the detective approached, and so startled was the girl at his appearance that he possessed himself of the note before she was aware of it. It was addressed to Mr. Edward Trevelyan, of Coreham. This was strong evidence that the man he now wished to find lived in that town. He blew a whistle, which was the signal agreed upon, and two of the college assistants came up in a few minutes, into whose charge he gave Miss Deering.

Then he started on his way to Coreham. As he walked he opened the note and mused upon it. It ran:

"DEAR MR. TREVELYAN,—You are in terrible danger.

A Prisoner for Seventeen Years.

A BIRKENHEAD woman—Mrs. E. McNulty—of 410 Price Street, was practically kept a prisoner within her own house for seventeen years in consequence of a most distressing skin disease. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness completely cured her, and the following is the wonderful story she told to a Courier reporter:

"I had enjoyed as good health as anyone could desire until about seventeen years ago, when after attending upon a neighbour's little girl who was down with scarlet fever I contracted the disease myself. In a matter of seven weeks I recovered, but remained for several months in so weak a state that I could scarcely walk across the floor. I was racked with fearful pains in the head; so bad were they at times that I could hardly see. After nine months' suffering I saw a doctor, but he did not effect any good. I then lost my appetite, and anything I ate seemed to make my head worse.

"Then a new development appeared. A fearful rash broke out all over my face. I took every kind of medicine to clear my blood but they only had the effect of making me worse. My face was so bad that I was ashamed to venture out of my house. I was kept a prisoner within doors.

"After trying more medicines and visiting several doctors, I went to the Skin Hospital in Liverpool. There I was examined by many doctors, and underwent a painful operation; but when they told me at length that I should have to have my nose scraped, I was frightened, and I never went again.

"After a number of years of this terrible suffering, I commenced to have a succession of week-end bilious attacks with remarkable regularity. I can safely say that, for upwards of two years, I never knew what it was to be without a bilious attack on Sunday, which prostrated me for the whole day.

"One day (it was a Wednesday) on coming downstairs, I found a little book under the door, telling of the wonderful cures which had been effected by Charles Forde's Bile Beans. I procured a box, and took one of the beans before I went to bed that night. The next morning my head did not feel so heavy, so I continued taking the Beans, and began to feel better and stronger every day. One Sunday when it came to be my usual time to be prostrated with biliousness, I got the dinner ready and sat down and ate a hearty meal, without the least sign of any illness!

"My husband said, 'Whatever is the matter with you to-day? Are you not going to be ill?' Then I told him how I had taken the Bile Beans, and as soon as he saw that they had had such a wonderful effect on me, he sent out for another box. By degrees the rash and spots began to disappear from my face, until I had as clear a complexion as anyone could desire.

"I feel now as though I don't know my own strength, and am as well and hearty as I was when I was a girl of fourteen. Well, that," pointing to a huge basket full of clothes which she had just washed, "is evidence that I am strong enough. For the last four months I have had from seven to ten dozen clothes, and sometimes more, every week, and I have washed them all myself. What is more, I have felt nothing worse at the end of the day than a natural tired feeling, which a night's sound sleep has removed. There is nothing in which I have greater faith than Bile Beans, and I am sure, now that you have heard my story, you will readily understand that."

I have told a story, which may shield you for a time. But if you are guilty—which at this moment I refuse to believe, though every fact tells me so—I pray you hide yourself at the ends of the earth. There must be some excuse. Let me believe that. I have looked upon you as all that a true knight should be, but whether you are what I thought you or a blood-stained murderer, I should still wish to save you. Believe then that there is one that pities you, who forgives, and would do so though the knife were aimed at her own heart. But fly, fly at once, for you are even now being tracked.—F.D."

"Well that is as daft a letter as I ever read," muttered the detective. "And yet the girl has suffered enough to make her so. The facts about this crime are clear enough at any rate.

"This proves that her story about the closing doorway was a falsehood, invented to shield the man. That's a good point settled, for it bothered me."

The detective had no difficulty in finding the home of Trevelyan. He lived with his parents. His mother opened the door. No, he was not at home. She called to some one within.

"He said he was going to get shaved," some one said.

The whereabouts of the barber's shop were asked and pointed out, and the detective easily found it. As he entered the place, he noticed a tall young man, just entering.

He had little doubt it was the man he sought. The moustache was identical.

The detective entered by the side door, and was lucky in finding the barber in the rear of his shop. Through a screen the man in the front part of the shop could be plainly seen. He had taken a seat, and was awaiting the appearance of the man of shears and brush. The detective in a few words explained to the barber the necessity for assuming the position of an assistant for a time, and such was the barber's astonishment, that the detective had divested the barber of his garment and put it on himself before that worthy realised it. He must have been hypnotised.

The detective walked out into the shop. The man was lying back with closed eyes.

"Hurry up," he said.

"Yes, sir," replied the pseudo barber, getting his soap and brush ready.

The man closed his eyes again. There were dark rings under them.

"Judging from the face, he's a bad 'un," said the detective, but he proceeded with the shaving as though it had been his business.

"I heard a good story the other day," he said, lathering his man, "it was about a curious crime."

"Crime!" gasped the man. "What sort of a crime?"

"Murder," replied the detective, trying the razor on his thumb-nail. "The most curious part about it was that the evidence that convicted the man was furnished by a barber. It seems that the murderer had left behind him a single hair from his moustache.

"This was found by a detective, and enabled him to trace his man. It was just such a hair as this"—and the detective held in one hand the hair he had found. "When the man went to be shaved, the barber drew a hair out of the man's moustache, so!"

He plucked out a hair with a quick movement, and held the two beneath the powerful magnifying glass he carried.

"The barber examined the hairs beneath a glass, as I have done," continued the detective, "then he turned to the man, and said, 'There can be no doubt, it is absolutely certain, you are the murderer of Bessie Sanders!'"

The young man leapt from the chair with a hoarse cry. There was no need for confession. His face proclaimed his guilt.

It was a terrible ordeal. Who could have his guilt thus thrust upon him and be calm?

The detective put down his razor.

With a quick plunge the man seized it, and tried to bring it across his throat. But the detective was too quick and too strong. "And now Mr. Edward Trevelyan," he said.

"Yes," replied a pleasant voice at his elbow, "what can I do for you?"

Here was a surprise that was too much for the detective. He turned, and confronted another young man, who in many respects was a counterpart of the other, especially so as to the moustache.

The real barber, astonished at what he had seen and heard, now came out into his shop.

"Who is this?" asked the detective.

"Percy Manton. Everybody about here knows him."

"Well, Percy Manton. I arrest you for the murder of Bessie Sanders."

"No you don't. Nobody arrests me. I did it, and Heaven knows I'm glad to get it off my mind, and this is how I do it."

There was another razor lying near, and this time he seized it and carried it to his throat, with such force as to nearly sever his head.

The explanation was simple enough, and the detective had easily deduced it. Percy Manton, a reckless and dissipated fellow, had been in love with Bessie, and she with him. Indeed they had been married secretly, as the registrar's record showed. That was a year ago. In the meantime, Bessie Sanders' father had failed and was practically a beggar, though his daughter did not know of it, and he did not intend that she should until he had tried to recover. Percy Manton had learnt this, and as he had meantime made considerable love to another young lady, whose wealth was great and certain, he wished to get rid of the old love and take on with the new. So much for the motive for the murder.

Bessie had kept her love affair secret from her chum, for Miss Deering knew Percy Manton as a worthless character, and would not have permitted his entrance to the room.

So Bessie, to effect this, had said that it was Edward Trevelyan she wished to have call, and Miss Deering, loving him as she did, and believing him to be good and true, permitted it. The way the selfish plot worked out is easily seen, Percy Manton knew that Miss Deering thought him to be Trevelyan when he called, and he knew that his crime would be laid upon the other man unless by good luck it passed for suicide.

Miss Deering, loving Trevelyan herself passionately, had, nevertheless like a noble and loving woman, kept silence, and kept most discreetly out of the way when the visit occurred.

But her reward came. The terrible tragedy revealed the deception under which she had laboured. The fact was that Trevelyan really loved her. But, when ever they had chanced to see each other, she believing him the lover of her friend, had treated him most coldly, and that he kept his distance. All this is changed now for the faithful little schoolgirl won the love she craved, and she has long been the happiest of happy girls.

LOOK IN THE MIRROR!

ARE YOU ASHAMED OF YOUR FACE?

EVERYBODY admires women and girls with clear, healthy, spotless complexions. They are attracted by pink cheeks and soft, velvety, delicate skin. Nothing destroys happiness and beauty like FRECKLES, PIMPLES, BLACKHEADS, YELLOW or MUDDY SKIN, MOTH, WRINKLES, RED NOSE or FACE, TAN, ERUPTIONS, DISCOLOURATIONS or BLEMISHES of any nature. They make both men and women unsightly, and make them look old. All these afflictions are quickly and easily cured by the famous DR. ROSE'S FACE PERLES. This is the most wonderful beautifier that was ever made. It is positively harmless to all, and contains not a single atom of LEAD, BISMUTH, or ARSENIC, or any poisonous ingredients whatever. These famous Perles completely and permanently remove every eruption, blotch, discolouration, and blemish on BOTH LADIES AND GENTLEMEN. They make the old look young. They beautify FACE, NECK, SHOULDERS AND ARMS. They impart the delicate tints of girlhood and youth to the complexion.

A woman cannot possibly look plain or unattractive if she uses the famous DR. ROSE'S FACE PERLES. She will be as fair as a lily, and wrinkles will not appear until she is far advanced in life. This may seem impossible to you, but it is the plain truth. The Perles are not a cosmetic, remember, but a food for the skin. They make ladies of 40 look to be less than 30. If from any cause you have reason to be ashamed of your face, you should commence taking these famous Perles without delay. They are bound to effect an improvement in your appearance. Thousands of men and women, with unhealthy, blotchy or muddy skins, are grateful for having taken DR. ROSE'S FACE PERLES

WHY NOT TRY THEM?—If you would like to test DR. ROSE'S FACE PERLES send three stamps for dainty booklet, "Beauty is Power," and FREE TRIAL BOX, or 2/6 postal order for a large-size box. All boxes sent in plain packages, post free. Address: The Rose Remedy Co. Dept , St Albans, England.

A New Feature.

In Confidence.

Conducted by Madge Morris.

I HAVE been invited by the Editor of Short Stories to conduct this new feature. He considers that I am qualified to offer advice on matters of the heart, because I have given the subject very careful study since I was quite a young child.

To those readers of Short Stories who do not see Pearson's Weekly my name will be unfamiliar; therefore, before going further, I think it will be as well for me to introduce myself—or, rather, to allow myself to be introduced to you by the Editor of Pearson's Weekly. To do this, all that is necessary is for me to reproduce here a paragraph which appeared in a recent number of that paper:

I AM going to tell you in confidence quite a little romance which affects a charming young lady whose work you will soon have an opportunity of enjoying. About a fortnight ago I received a letter, asking that the writer might have a personal interview with me. Two days later a charming young lady was ushered into my room. Her name (and I have her full permission for giving it) is Madge Morris. She very rapidly and clearly laid her case before me. She was engaged to a hard-working young clerk whose position was a modest one and whose finances would not permit of his marrying for many years unless he got some substantial increase in his salary. As this seemed so far off, Miss Madge determined to make money on her own account. She has a good education, but has never learnt a trade or profession. Her parents, who, though not well-off, are proud, will not let her work in a shop or factory. They do not object to her marriage with the young man, whom they like. When Miss Morris got so far in her narrative she smilingly handed me a manuscript, and said that she had determined, by writing articles and stories, to save enough money to enable her to get married! As she had never written in her life before, I had my doubts about the value of the stuff. After reading it, however, I saw at once she had some strikingly brilliant ideas, and knew how to put them down. The result of her visit was an order for half-a-dozen articles on a subject she had chosen—"Lessons in Love-Making"—with the promise of an order for more if the first series were appreciated by our readers. This, then, is the origin of the new series which begins in our next issue. I hope you will like it. And remember, as you read it, that its publication is the result of a bright young girl's earnest determination to make money enough to marry the man she loves.

After this paragraph appeared, the series of articles entitled "Lessons in Love-Making" was published, and at the present moment I am contributing another series entitled "Love Problems," which are appearing on the "Home Notes" page of Pearson's Weekly.

I hope that you won't think me egotistical for telling you all these things. The truth of the matter is that, as I am not at present known to very many of you, I feel it incumbent upon me to let you see that I am qualified to conduct this new feature.

The lines on which they will be run are as follows:

Any young girl or young man whose love affairs are not running smoothly—and, of course, when it is true love it will not run smoothly—is invited to consult with me. I don't want to pose as a sort of lady Solomon, who will mete out justice in a domineering sort of fashion. I want to be just who I am, and to offer advice to those who are willing to, at all events, consider it, even if they don't accept it.

There are many points which a young girl or young man in love does not care to discuss with parents or friends, and yet would be willing to write to someone whom they have never seen before and in whom they have a certain amount of confidence. This position I am willing to occupy.

I shall treat every communication in strict confidence—in fact, I don't want even your name and address, a nom de plume will do quite as well. All I ask is that any love problem you may set before me to unravel shall be a genuine one; I don't want to waste my own time or the time of my readers in discussing points in a case which is simply concocted in idle moments by some idle young person.

And now, if you feel that I have justified your confidence in me, don't fail to let me know when you are in trouble, and I will do my best to give you a helping hand.

This feature will not be confined to love affairs only—that is, to those between single young men and young women—but tangles that occur in domestic life and even points of etiquette will be dealt with. I am not qualified to tell you how to build a house, or borrow money, or buy a horse, but I am qualified to answer any problem you may care to set into which affairs of the heart enter largely.

All communications should be addressed to me personally.

MADGE MORRIS.

The Brain Gymnasium.

IN these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, January 20th, 1902.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

RHEUMATISM CURED

BY A REMEDY THAT HAS ENABLED MANY TO ABANDON CRUTCH AND CANE.

Trial Package FREE

On the theory that "seeing is believing," John A. Smith, of Milwaukee, U.S.A., wants everyone to try his remedy for the cure of rheumatism at his expense. For that reason he proposes to distribute 50,000 free sample packages among all persons sending him their address. Mr. Smith has suffered all the agony and torture from Rheumatism, tried all the remedies known, and yet utterly failed to find relief.

At times he was so helpless that he had to take to morphine, and after considerable doctoring he gave up in despair. He began studying into the causes of rheumatism; after much experimenting he finally hit upon a combination of drugs which completely cured him. The result was so beneficial to his entire system that he called his new-found remedy "Gloria Tonic." Those of his friends and relatives and neighbours suffering from rheumatism were next cured, and Mr. Smith concluded to offer his remedy to the world. But he found the task a difficult one, as nearly everybody had tried a hundred or more remedies, and they couldn't be made to believe that there was such a thing as a cure for rheumatism. But an old gentleman from Sequin wrote him saying if Mr. Smith would send him a sample he would try it, but as he had suffered forty-one years and wasted a fortune with doctors and advertised remedies, he wouldn't buy anything more until he knew it was worth something. The sample was sent; he purchased more, and the result was astonishing. He was completely cured. This gave Mr. Smith a new idea, and ever since that time he has been sending out free sample packages to all who apply. The result is that he is now the happy possessor of thousands of testimonials from people throughout the world who have been both greatly benefited and entirely cured by "Gloria Tonic." Prominent physicians had to admit that "Gloria Tonic" is a positive success, among them Dr. Quintero, of the University of Venezuela, to whom it was recommended by the United States Consul. In thousands of other instances the result has been the same. It cured many cases which defied Hospitals, Drugs, Electricity, and Medical Skill.

JOHN A. SMITH.

"Gloria Tonic" cured Mrs. H. Bester, of Welton, near Daventry, who has suffered for years. Mr. L. Pinkey, 3 Well Lane, Bridlington, a martyr to Rheumatism for 27 years, has been entirely cured through its use. Mr. J. Holden, of 28 Angles Road, Streatham, S.W., is an enthusiast over "Gloria Tonic." A neighbour of Mr. Holden, Mr. J. Crampton, 24 Angles Road, Streatham, S.W., says: "I can recommend 'Gloria Tonic' to all who suffer with Rheumatism, as I am thankful to say that your remedy has cured me entirely."

The following people have also been entirely cured through the use of "Gloria Tonic" attested to by testimonials which they have sent me: Mrs. J. Brewer, 59 St. Ann's Rd., Barking, E.; Mr. T. Marsh, 190 Bury New Rd., Whitefield, Lancs.; Mr. J. Metcalf, Hill Gill Farm, Mallerstang, Kirkby Stephen; Mrs. West, The Club, Surbiton: Mr. G. Chennells, 11 Waterend, near Hemel Hempstead; Mrs. G. Hiron, 39 Stanley St., Queen's Rd., S.W.; Mr. E. Guest, Bissell St., Quinton, near Birmingham; Mrs. Sanderson, 22 West Park Rd., Newport, Mon.; Mr. L. Leyshon, 2 Gwindy Terrace, Pentrechwyth; Mrs. W. Smith, Appiehouse, Tronston, Sandwick, Stromness; Mr. J. Helmsley, Hadlow Down, near Uckfield; Mr. P. Haslem, 32 Tanners Terrace, Mr. G. Mackay, Embo Dornoch, Sutherlandshire; Mr. Ramsbottom; J. Little, South Marston, Stretton St. Margaret's, Swindon.

Can I offer you better proofs of the merits of my remedy? These are only a few of hundreds of testimonials of recent date which I now hold.

On receipt of a postal card or a letter from you, mentioning this paper, you will receive by return of post, FREE, a trial package of "Gloria Tonic" a booklet on Rheumatism, and other literature of great interest to sufferers. Address—

(Dept. 1007), JOHN A. SMITH, 6 and 7 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

CHAPTER I.

THE ORIGINAL OF A PORTRAIT.

"WHEN you have finished that, Miss Hamilton, you might step down into the shop for an hour—they are short-handed this afternoon. I have spoken to Madame about sparing you."

"Yes, Mr. Randegger," was the quiet response, and the girl at the nearer extremity of the battered wooden table went on with the deft movements that were completing a magnificent bouquet of orchids, from which hung delicate green streamers of smilax.

The face bent over the splendid blossoms had been raised momentarily; it was grave, even a trifle proud, the eyes, however, added a certain sweetness, and the features were both fine and regular. There were prettier countenances round the flower-laden work-bench in the bare apartment, but none more striking and characteristic.

A row of square, uncurtained windows flooded the low-ceiled place with autumn sunshine and framed vivacious views of the smartest shopping quarter in the metropolis. The sashes were open, but the atmosphere, nevertheless, was oppressed by a medley of perfumes—the scents of roses, lilies, carnations, violets, and the curious, unfamiliar odours of rarer growths.

The clever West-end tradesman was studying the mass of glorious blooms on which his employee was engaged; a band of white heather, built up as he watched, incircled them like a belt of unsullied snow. He twirled a neat Imperial with a lean finger and thumb, then shot out an arm and manipulated several of the orchids.

"So!" he said, and made a significant "foreign" gesture; "but it is very good, you keep life in the flowers—life and air. Peste!" he broke off, "the shop—I am forgetting the shop!"

A couple of strides—oddly suggestive of a dancing-master's fantastic motions—carried Mr. Randegger, a stout, volatile Italian, towards the door. On the threshold he halted and glanced back.

"You will be down soon, Miss Hamilton?" was his reminder; "yet—yet do not hasten regardlessly; I, myself promised Lord Quantock that the bouquets should be perfection—perfection!" Another eloquent flourish, and the speaker had disappeared.

"What folly," said a vigorous, middle-aged woman, whose black silk blouse, sharp self-possession, and seat at the top of the table marked her for the mistress of the small staff; "it is I who need help, not the shop. The Quantock bouquets will be late, that is all. Eunice, child, have you much more to do?"

"No, Madame Brissac," answered Eunice Hamilton, getting up to show the state of her task. The chief florist nodded appreciation.

"Excellent!" she commented; "you are a feather in Mr. Randegger's cap, little one, for he took you into the room against my advice. I believed you too inexperienced to come in as an improver, and too old to enter as an apprentice. I should have remembered that you American girls are different from the English."

She glanced shrewdly at the subject of this compliment. "You are wearing a new ornament," observed the Frenchwoman, "the charm at your throat. I thought I saw a handsome face—has some gallant monsieur been offering you his portrait as a love-token?"

Eunice blushed, put the finished bouquet on a stand and lifted the article to which Madame Brissac's inquiry had related. It was a gold disc—the size of a crown piece—modelled to resemble a diminutive shield. An amethyst formed the boss, and the edge was set with a circle of minute diamonds. A miniature occupied the reverse of the ornament—depicting a youthful, masculine visage, gay and resolute. The vividly blue pupils were frank and generous, but the full, clean-shaven jaw and upper lip revealed an unusual degree of determination. The result was that mingling of strength and candour so attractive to a feminine critic.

"It must have been my mother's," said Eunice Hamilton; "I found it yesterday evening in a bag of buttons—I expect it was mislaid by accident, perhaps years ago. There is a date on the picture—eighteen eighty-three or five; I don't know who it is, though."

The chief florist surveyed the miniature.

"Why is the face not strange to me," she queried absently; "whom can it recall? It is English, and I have few English friends. Ah, yes, it is like the young gentleman who came with Lord Quantock to decide upon the bouquets. I heard his name mentioned—Mr.—Mr. Carr."

"Oh, no, Madame," cried Eunice; "the portrait is much—much handsomer."

"How should you tell, child?" retorted her superior; "you did not see him—Mr. Randegger sent up for me."

Eunice coloured.

"Mr. Carr was often in the shop," she explained; "while I was downstairs—I—I used to serve him."

Madame Brissac smiled.

"Eunice," she declared, "you are an innocent of the most amusing. So Mr. Carr is coquet—a flirt, is he? Well, he is about to ranger himself—to marry. Miss Nita Warwick, the future Madame Carr, is to be of the bridesmaids at Lord Quantock's wedding—Mr. Carr, Mr. Austin Carr, will be the bridegroom's friend—his best man, as you say. I read it all in your paper The Gossip. What a droll title is that for a journal!"

Eunice turned the jewelled shield to hide—as it rested on her bosom—the picture of the unknown whose claim to exceptional beauty she had been so quick to champion.

"Shall I go down now, Madame?" she asked.

The Frenchwoman devoted herself afresh to her occupation—she had been indicating, by rapid pencil-strokes, a design for an enormous harp, of chrysanthemums and tuberoses.

"Yes," was the answer; "and if you ever serve Mr Carr again compare him with your miniature—there is a resemblance certainly."

Evading further discussion, Eunice hurried out of the workroom and descended to the great fruit and flower emporium controlled by Antonio Randegger, and famous in two hemispheres as "Randy's."

The Italian nodded to her as she entered, and for the succeeding half-hour she was engrossed by the demands of a dozen customers—whose requirements varied between a ten-guinea floral emblem—for presentation to a burlesque actress—and a shilling camellia for an amateur tenor's dress-coat.

She had only just concluded the latter transaction when a remark—uttered at her elbow—startled her.

"It is," said a harsh, but bantering voice, subdued to the cautious tones that seldom pass beyond the ears for which they are intended; "it is Miss Gravity, and no other. Where on earth have you been?"

Eunice looked up. By her stood a person still apparently in his earlier twenties. An immaculate silk hat and fashionable coat bore witness to his social position, his complexion was high, his teeth—uncovered by beard or moustache—even and perfect, his demeanour boyish. But this mouth betrayed the vulgar selfishness of the Society idler, and his eyes gleamed with a slow, insolent humour.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Carr," rejoined Eunice swiftly "what do you wish—" She hesitated, checked by a shrug of the brown-coated shoulders.

"Rubbish!" snapped Austin Carr; "I was getting back to the club from a late luncheon but caught sight of you through the glass and popped in. As I'm here you might give me a button-hole—carnations, for choice."

The girl prepared a cluster of the indicated blossoms and fitted them to the purchaser's lappel.

Austin Carr grinned unpleasantly.

"Quite a treat, this," he assured her; "and how have you concealed yourself? I had almost abandoned the idea of stumbling upon you once more."

"I'm in the work-room," rejoined Eunice, pinning the carnations dexterously. "Mr. Randegger wanted me down to-day because he was short-handed, but I make up, as a rule."

"Oh," said Mr. Carr, "with flowers, not grease-paint. If it's promotion I suppose I ought to congratulate you, but, by Jove, you don't deserve it. Not every man in my class would ask a girl in yours to marry him, and prove he was serious by offering her a ring worth fi—fifty pounds. I'll admit you declined the confounded thing, but I was a fool to swallow the snub—a dashed fool."

"Please," she begged, "don't. I—I didn't care for you, I don't think you cared for me—it was a mere fancy. Be sensible, Mr. Carr, you are going to marry Miss Warwick. I do hope you will be happy."

Austin Carr drew out a handful of silver and paid for his button-hole. "Yes," he conceded, with a hiccough, "Nita's accepted me; she's a daisy, is Nita, and she doesn't bore a fellow. But it was you I—loved, Eunice. Why did you say 'No'? The governor's a soft-hearted sort and he'd have forgiven me."

Mr. Carr stopped abruptly, staring past Eunice Hamilton. His querulous expression disappeared, he straightened himself and, waiving the formality of a farewell, moved off.

Eunice glanced in the same direction. A dainty figure had stepped from a cab at the pavement-edge to the shop-door. It was that of a woman, wearing a costly furred ulster and seal toque.

"Hullo, Austin!" she ejaculated; "what luck! You can buy me some roses—some Vilanelles. Paulette has disappointed me of a frock I was to sport at your governor's little feed this evening, and I must manage with an ancient turquoise abomination. So I need a few pink roses for the corsage, and the Vilanelles are the most recent miracle, besides being deliciously expensive."

She strode towards Eunice.

"Send me six or seven loose Vilanelle roses immediately," she said; "Miss Nita Warwick, Quantock House, Belgrave Square."

Eunice bowed and noted Miss Warwick's brief command. The Vilanelles were a pink rose of exquisite shape, blanched at the tips of the petals, and deepening to a splash of tawny crimson at their base. Austin Carr discharged the bill—it left him a florin out of a brace of gold coins.

"So nice of you!" declared Nita Warwick; "you shall be allowed to give me a cup of tea before I rush home to dress—a dinner to-night and a wedding to-morrow. I was born for excitement! Have you seen that bit in The Gossip? You'll have to settle with Sir Roland about us, Austin, or there'll be a shocking amount of talk."

The final sentence was delivered as they strolled out of the shop, but it reached Eunice, notwithstanding. Not that she noted its significance particularly. She had had recourse to the jewelled disc at her throat and was examining the miniature.

"It is not—it cannot be Mr. Carr," she murmured; "the date is too far back. And yet it is like him, rather."

Her reflections over the pictured countenance were interrupted by the crisp accents of her employer. Antonio Randegger had crossed unperceived, a note in his fingers.

"Miss Hamilton," he began, "some flowers were ordered for a dinner-party. They are gone, but there was a mistake in the office, and no one is booked to arrange them. All our decorators are out; you will have to fill the gap."

"Yes, sir," assented Eunice nervously; "I will do my best. When must I go?"

"At once," said the Italian; "I have told them to whistle a hansom—the flowers are at the house. The address is Grosvenor Gardens, Sir Roland Fanshawe's. He is a bachelor—Mrs. Dundas, his sister, is directing the dinner. Run and get ready, and do not quiver so much—bah, I trust you, let that be sufficient."

Eunice obeyed. As she mounted the gloomy flights which led to the workroom, she was wondering why the address given her a moment before should sound familiar.

The solution of the mystery flashed upon her. Sir Roland! it was the name mentioned by Miss Nita Warwick. Could the Sir Roland Fanshawe to whose residence she was bound, be identical with Miss Warwick's Sir Roland—the "governor," who must be informed of Mr. Carr's betrothal to Nita Warwick?

It seemed improbable. Mr. Randegger had intimated that Sir Roland Fanshawe was unmarried; if the other Sir Roland was Austin Carr's father, he must be Sir Roland Carr. Eunice left the problem unsolved, went down to the cab summoned for her, and drove off beneath the fall of the autumn dusk.

Sir Roland Fanshawe's mansion in Grosvenor Gardens was similar to its neighbours—large, sombre, stone-fronted. She dismissed the hansom and rang.

"I'm from Mr. Randegger, the florist," she explained to the servant, who acknowledged her peal; "I am to do the table decorations."

"Yes, miss," responded the man, and he piloted her

Involuntarily he sprang back, regarding her as if she had been a ghost.

through a luxurious hall into a lofty chamber, panelled with oak, and boasting a carved oak fireplace. An expanse of gleaming damask shone under the electric light, an ideal field for her operations.

Eunice passed in, unfastening her gloves. She brushed against an unseen obstacle—it was a massive vase, planted haphazard on the thick pile hearth-rug.

The footman rolled it to a corner.

"Sir Roland is changing the position of some pottery, miss," Eunice was notified; "he is a collector of rare china; we have pots in the house, miss (aye, and ugly brutes, too), worth thousands of pounds."

"Indeed!" observed Eunice, wisely declining further conversation on the point; "will you please fetch me the hampers that were brought this afternoon, and let Mrs. Dundas know that I have arrived?"

"Certainly, miss," said the servant, and vanished, with silent speed. Eunice, having removed her gloves, doffed her hat and jacket, and began to consider the task she had accepted. So absorbed did she grow that she did not perceive the entrance of a well-knit figure of middle height wearing a smoking-jacket, who carried in his arms a superb Sevres bowl.

A board creaked beneath his tread. Eunice spun about and the bearer of the bowl saw her. Involuntarily he sprang back, regarding her as if she had been a ghost. The priceless china escaped from his grasp, to be shivered at his feet.

Eunice gazed also, incredulous and astounded. For the face of the newcomer was the face of the miniature on her bosom.

CHAPTER II.

AN OLD LOVE'S POWER.

"MY dear Roland, what was the crash? Good Heavens, the Mazarin bowl! How did it happen?"

A smooth-skinned, dark-haired woman, graceful, stylish, and not without a degree of personal charm to balance the loss of her first youth, advanced into the dining-room where, a moment earlier, Eunice Hamilton had made such a singular discovery.

A stalwart figure, moving as if in a dream, stepped towards the questioner.

"Coralie," she was asked softly; "am I bereft of my senses, or is there someone else present—someone besides ourselves?"

The other glanced across the apartment and started. Eunice shivered to perceive how strangely she was being regarded.

"I'm afraid I surprised this—this gentleman," she stammered; "and—and caused an accident. I'm from Randegger's to do the table decorations; the footman showed me in here. Can I see Mrs. Dundas, please?"

"I am Mrs. Dundas," said the younger of the two intruders; "and you are the image of a—a lady my brother, Sir Roland Fanshawe, and I knew long since.

Pray excuse our agitation—the mishap to the bowl was, I am sure, not the least little bit your fault. Sir Roland must have been unnerved by your resemblance to our friend."

Roland Fanshawe caught at his sister's arm.

"Coralie," he murmured; "look, she is wearing the shield miniature I gave to——" He paused abruptly, his face white and his lips tremulous.

Mrs. Dundas drew nearer to the possessor of the ornament which had attracted her brother's attention.

"Will you tell me your name, my dear?" she inquired—Eunice noticed that she signed to Sir Roland as though to check his excitement. "And how you obtained the picture you have at your throat?"

"I am Eunice Hamilton," rejoined Eunice; "the miniature was my mother's; but, oh," she interrupted herself, "if only the vase had not been smashed; it was so beautiful, and must have been worth a great deal."

She stooped to the pieces—a simple, pathetic attitude.

Sir Roland gazed down at her.

"You—you say it was your mother's," he faltered; "is—is she dead?"

"Yes," answered Eunice sadly, halting in her attempt to fit the splendid fragments together; "she died at New Orleans a year ago."

"Pardon my apparent inquisitiveness, Miss Hamilton," said Roland Fanshawe—and his voice had grown hoarse and broken—"but that shield and portrait were a gift to a—a lady—a Miss Eunice Carruthers, who married a certain Wilfred Hamilton. Both were friends of mine—I take you to be their child."

"Father was Wilfred Hamilton," replied Eunice, "and I am called Eunice, after my mother—her maiden name was Carruthers."

"Mr. Hamilton," queried Sir Roland more collectedly, "is, I trust, living?"

Eunice shook her head.

"He died before I was sixteen," she explained; "mother never got over his death. She did not wish me to remain in the States, and when I was left alone—I have no brothers or sisters—I came to London, to some acquaintances of hers. They were not rich people, and they got me into Randegger's. I have never heard of you, Sir Roland, but yesterday I found this ornament among a lot of odds and ends. I recognised you from it as soon as I saw you, and oh, I am sorry about the bowl."

Roland Fanshawe raised her courteously.

"A fig for the bowl," he said. "I would have sacrificed a dozen such to bring about this meeting."

A light footfall sounded on the carpet—the servant had returned with a couple of neat hampers, lettered "Randegger." The shattered vase lay in his path; he stopped, astounded.

"Well," answered Sir Roland sharply; "can't you understand that there has been an accident? Have the mess brushed up. Why are you carrying those baskets about?"

"They are for me," put in Eunice; "the flowers I am to arrange."

"Nonsense!" cried Roland Fanshawe; "let one of the maids do it. Your parents, Miss Hamilton," he added, "were more to me than you can imagine—their daughter is an honoured guest beneath my roof."

Eunice Hamilton blushed.

"Mr. Randegger employs me," she objected; "and I must do my duty. Then I have not been trusted before with table decorations—I wanted to prove that I could manage them."

Sir Roland smiled; his grave features relaxed, and, despite the silver on his temples, looked as gay as his portrait in the shield at Eunice's throat.

"Your will is law," he responded. "Simmons, set down those hampers and clear away that broken china. Coralie, I owe Miss Hamilton an explanation for treating her as if she were a ghost. While she works (since she must be permitted to satisfy her conscience) I will tell her the true reason for the smashed bowl. Unless, of course, I shall interfere with her operations."

"N—not at all," said Eunice shyly; she had been studying the original of the miniature and felt herself (she knew not why) fascinated by his quiet earnestness and the distinction stamped upon his worn countenance. Also, she was curious as to the cause of his previous excitement.

Roland Fanshawe bowed his thanks and took up a position on the hearthrug, where he might watch the proceedings of the girl in whom he had betrayed such a peculiar interest.

Mrs. Dundas glanced from her brother to Eunice—a swift, penetrating scrutiny that lingered on each for a second.

"I hope to have a chat with Miss Hamilton myself," she observed, "when your explanation is completed, Roland. At present I must go and see about the wine for dinner."

She nodded kindly to Eunice and glided from the room. Eunice began to sort the contents of the hampers. Sir Roland, abandoning his station by the fire-place, had crossed the floor and leant upon a corner of the sideboard.

"Miss Hamilton," he said, "as a young man of twenty I knew and loved your mother, a girl of nineteen, yet even at that age beautiful, with a rare and striking beauty. The miniature you wear I had painted for her at a time whose memories I have not ceased to cherish; she accepted it, and with it the offer of my heart."

Eunice's brown orbs met those of Roland Fanshawe and dropped again.

"Your father," went on Sir Roland, "was my friend—a magnificent fellow, passionate, eloquent, brilliant; your mother made his acquaintance and learnt, in a flash, that she had never loved me. I guessed the secret, released her, and shot elephants in Africa till after they were married. A tempting appointment persuaded your father to sail for America—nor have I heard of him since. I believed him and his wife happy and prosperous, or I should have sought to aid them."

He contemplated the deft fingers of Eunice Hamilton; they were weaving into a delicate pattern on the expanse of rich damask thin strands of green creeper and the nipped-off stars of huge marguerite daisies, yellow as sunshine.

"I am now thirty-nine and a bachelor," pursued Roland Fanshawe, "so you will admit that I was hard hit, Miss Hamilton. You must be what your mother was at the period to which I have referred—a trifle over nineteen; you are her veritable counterpart. Judge of my emotions on beholding you so unexpectedly. You will fathom them the better if—as is no doubt the case—you care for some fortunate member of my sex, to whom you may or may not have plighted your troth."

Eunice devoted herself to the floral design on the damask.

"I fear I have neither of the qualifications," she said demurely.

Sir Roland lifted his brows.

"No!" he exclaimed; "has the masculine world lost its vision, or are you too exacting?"

"I'm going to send for a policeman and have everyone searched," said Mrs. Dundas.

"I can't say," answered Eunice, commencing to build round the mirror base of a towering epergne a bank of Neapolitan violets; "don't you think," she inquired, looking up suddenly, "that I ought to give you your picture back—mother must have forgotten?"

Roland Fanshawe regarded the ornament as it swung by a modest oxidised chain on Eunice's bosom.

"Why should you?" he queried; "it is favoured in being where it is. Pray suffer it to remain."

A soft scarlet warmed Eunice's cheeks, but she continued her task in silence. Down the middle of the table there had sprung up a device of green and yellow, varied by the darker centres of the great daisies. Eunice brought the epergne she had been decorating from the side-board to place it in position.

Sir Roland caught at it and they adjusted it together—their hands touching; Eunice felt that the palm in contact with hers quivered mysteriously.

"I can't realise you to be a stranger, Miss Hamilton," declared her companion; "you are the embodiment of a remembered face and form which I have kept hidden in my heart for what seems to be a lifetime. Your mother and I were boy and girl playmates—I used to call her Eunice, she to call me Roland—I was her brother, her confidant, her ally, till I wanted to be more."

He hesitated, to proceed reflectively.

"This house," he said, "is full of memories that have haunted it a long while. The night I discovered she loved your father—and—freed her to marry him, she had been dining here. I had taken her in—her gown was white and she had white flowers in her hair."

Roland Fanshawe checked himself. Eunice was gazing at him pitifully. Hitherto she had not seen a man under the influence of keen emotion. Sir Roland's sensitive, handsome features kindled a novel pang in her breast.

"You will stay and dine with me this evening?" he pleaded; "Miss Hamilton, I cannot allow you to refuse. I shall believe you a dream, a wraith, a phantom."

Eunice coloured.

"I—I am not fit," she demurred; "my—my dress!"

"What can that matter?" retorted Roland Fanshawe. "Only a few intimates of my sister's and mine are coming; we will say you have just arrived from the country, and that your trunks have gone astray. By Jove, have you hurt yourself?"

The little florist's grasp upon a stout stalk which she was breaking slipped, and her wrist grazed a projection of the silver mouldings on the tall epergne. It produced a shallow cut and the blood stained the skin about the wound.

Sir Roland tore a strip from his handkerchief and bandaged the injury with extravagant tenderness.

"Well, my dear Roland," desired a cheerful voice, "is Miss Hamilton sufficiently enlightened?"

Eunice started back. Mrs. Dundas had entered the room.

Her brother turned to her.

"Quite," he said; "but your pet epergne is responsible for Miss Hamilton receiving a nasty scratch. I have had to play the part of doctor. Coralie," he proceeded, interrupting Mrs. Dundas' expressions of sympathy, "persuade Miss Hamilton to remain and dine. I have suggested a convenient fib to account for her morning gown."

Mrs. Dundas shrugged her shoulders.

"Oh, you men!" she cried; "they have no real sense, have they, my dear? You must stop, there can be no question of that, but I can lend you a sweet frock I bought in Paris—before Society went into black. I've not worn it, and you're about my figure. I'll send my maid in a cab for it; if it requires altering she's a wonderful needlewoman. You mustn't say 'No'; it is a charming thing and entirely original, so it won't be out of fashion."

"Coralie, you're a genius," exclaimed her brother. "Miss Hamilton, you will stay?"

"Of course she will," responded Mrs. Dundas; "Roland you go and dress, the servants want to finish the table. I shall take charge of Miss Hamilton."

Roland Fanshawe moved towards the door; there was a strange light in his blue eyes as he looked back at the slender form under the glow of the electric lamps.

"If—if I were not forty!" he murmured to himself.

CHAPTER III.

A WOMAN'S WILE.

"AUSTIN, come here, I want to introduce you to a new friend of mine—Miss Hamilton, this young gentleman is my nephew and secretary, the son of a dear dead sister and the one responsibility with which the Fates have been pleased to charge me."

Roland Fanshawe had risen from a circular lounge in the middle of a luxurious drawing-room. The sombre black and immaculate white of his evening-dress set off a frame still active and symmetrical. By him was seated a little figure in creamy draperies of mousseline de laine, edged with lustrous gold fringe.

Mrs. Dundas' unworn gown from Paris had proved a veritable creation. It had changed Eunice Hamilton, the demure employee of Antonio Randegger, into a dainty being, all brown locks, bright eyes, and beautiful outlines. The scratch on her wrist was covered by a broad bracelet of pearls and rubies; from her delicate head to her slippered foot Eunice was a thing of tremulous loveliness.

Austin Carr responded languidly to the summons of his uncle; his glance travelled to the face of the woman beside Sir Roland and he recoiled. Eunice started up, flushing scarlet.

"You—you know each other?" asked Roland Fanshawe, struck by their demeanour.

"Y—yes," said Eunice nervously; "Mr. Carr has met me in—in business—he was at the shop to-day."

"Then it is you, Miss Hamilton?" gasped Austin Carr; "excuse my surprise. My dear uncle," he added, "won't you explain; was Miss Hamilton masquerading?"

"Practically," assented Sir Roland; "she is the child of Wilfred Hamilton, and—and a lady who was once very dear to me. She visited us—Miss Hamilton, that is—in the course of her professional duties, and we determined she should play at Cinderella, your aunt taking to the role of fairy godmother. Miss Hamilton, I must make you acquainted with a person in whom Austin has a peculiar interest—to wit, Miss Nita Warwick. That is she in the blue silk, speaking to Mrs. Dundas," and he led Eunice off across the splendid apartment.

Austin abandoned himself to reflection. He was disturbed by the rustle of flowing silks, and Nita Warwick sank down at his elbow.

"Well," she observed; "have you seen the Ugly Duckling that has turned into a swan?"

"The deuce!" he growled. "Yes, I can't fathom it."

Nita Warwick fluttered her feather fan. "She was sent from Randegger's to decorate the tables," Austin was told, "and Sir Roland, shifting his eternal pottery, noticed her, dropped three hundred pounds' worth of Sevres, voted it a bagatelle, and persuaded her to remain for dinner. Mrs. Dundas dressed her, and Sir Roland is fast losing his heart to Eunice the Second; you must have heard about that stupid romance of his."

Miss Warwick leant significantly towards her lover.

"Austin," she asked, "what do you propose to maintain me upon if your uncle acts the fool? I'm not inclined to face genteel starvation for the privilege of calling myself Mrs. Carr. We were sure Sir Roland was past the susceptible age, and that he would die a bachelor, after allowing you a comfortable income all his life. But this—this Miss Hamilton may ruin our chances."

"Perhaps the girl isn't genuine," said Austin Carr; "a show-up would nip the whole affair in the bud. We can only hope for the best. As for the governor, he'll stand no interference from me."

"Oh, his find's genuine enough," retorted Nita Warwick; "she has his portrait in a sort of locket—her mother's, the trinket was—Sir Roland gave it her twenty years ago. Don't you comprehend? He'll think it's destiny, and Miss Hamilton will fall a willing victim to your uncle's melancholy grace; look at them now, he worshipping her, she admiring him. Mrs. Dundas won't help us, she's infatuated, too—Eunice the First was a school-friend of hers. Miss Hamilton is wearing a superb ruby bracelet your aunt has lent her."

"Serve the meddlesome old cat right if she pinched it!" snarled Austin, slangily.

Nita Warwick looked at him.

"Austin," she whispered, "that's the very idea; they've never dreamt of inquiring into her character. If there were the least shadow cast on it, Sir Roland would be cured, and you would still be his heir. We may be over-anxious, but I fancy not. However, a stitch in time saves nine."

Her lover stared at her, alarmed.

"Nita!" he exclaimed; "you don't stick at trifles. But—but could it be done?"

Nita got up and shook her skirts into order.

"S—s—sh," she murmured; "don't you see how near Mrs. Dundas is. They are going in to dinner—I will think the matter over. You take me in, don't you?"

Her betrothed offered her his arm and they slipped into the impromptu procession that was passing through the door which opened on to the stairs. Sir Roland, evading any superior claims, was at the side of Eunice Hamilton.

During the stately meal he devoted himself to her as much as he might, and Austin Carr's brow grew darker and darker. There was a boyish light in his uncle's countenance, a gaiety in his bearing, a ring in his voice, that Austin had never marked before.

When the ladies rose, Nita Warwick stooped to her betrothed's ear.

"Leave all to me," she bade him, "I have a plan."

And, permitting him no time to make a rejoinder, she followed the sweeping lace train of Mrs. Dundas. That personage had, unobserved, been watching her curiously. As Miss Warwick passed the retreating Eunice, she spoke to her, and they went out together. Roland Fanshawe gazed after the little figure in the creamy draperies and sighed.

When he entered the drawing-room, he glanced about it inquiringly. The gleam of yellow and white from a distant alcove showed him the whereabouts of Eunice Hamilton. He strolled towards the curtained niche, exchanging a word or two with his feminine guests. Scarcely had he reached it than the hangings parted and Nita Warwick stepped forth—her fan half-folded in her palms.

"Ah, Sir Roland," she said, with veiled malice, "are you in search of Miss Hamilton? She is here, resting, we have been discussing—table decorations."

A ripple of curious merriment broke from her as she passed him. She had arrested, by a meaning glance, the attention of Austin Carr. The latter altered his course and moved towards her.

Roland Fanshawe frowned.

"What a world of snobs!" he muttered; "a woman who could not earn an honest sou to save her life, sneers at one who supports herself by an honourable avocation. Bah! and Austin, they tell me, is enamoured of Miss Nita. Well, each to his taste!" And Sir Roland stepped into the recess.

Nita Warwick gained her lover's side—the smile lingering about her mouth.

"I have something for you," she said, "under my fan. I cannot hide it myself."

"Nita," he whispered; "you—you haven't done it?"

"Oh, I got the thing easily enough," laughed Nita; "it was too large for her. I touched the spring as her wrist lay on the seat by me. I was praising Sir Roland, and she had only thoughts for that. Here, rid me of the nuisance."

Austin Carr trifled with the ends of the ostrich feathers which formed her fan, and she pushed into his fingers Mrs. Dundas' ruby bracelet. He covered it dexterously and slid it into his vest pocket.

There was a step close to them—it was a servant tendering the inevitable coffee-cups. Nita took one, Austin Carr waved the footman away, and they retreated to a lounge not far from the curtained alcove in which Nita Warwick brought off such a momentous coup.

At that instant the rattle of hangings flung by startled them. Roland Fanshawe had tossed back the curtains of the niche behind them, so that the rays from the principal chandelier might illuminate it. Within the recess Eunice was apparently searching.

"Missed!" said Austin, under his breath. "Now to see how he views the situation."

Sir Roland had motioned to his sister. She disengaged herself from a group of his guests and crossed the room.

"Coralie," murmured Roland Fanshawe; "Miss Hamilton is in despair—she has lost a certain bracelet of yours. But it cannot be more than mislaid, for she is confident she had it when she entered this alcove with Miss Warwick a few moments ago. It was rather wide for her wrist, and has doubtless dropped off unnoticed."

Mrs. Dundas made a contemptuous gesture.

"And you believe that," she cried; "a bracelet worth eighty guineas. Absurd! I should send for a policeman and frighten it out of her; after all what do we know of the girl?"

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed her brother; "you are mad, speak low—she will hear you. You are wrong. I would answer for the child with my life."

It was too late. Eunice had heard; she issued from the recess pallid and horrified. Mrs. Dundas signed imperatively to Austin—her threat had reached his ears—he sprang up and hastened to her.

"Mrs. Dundas," faltered Eunice, "you—you don't imagine I lost it on purpose—stole it?"

"No—no!" declared Roland Fanshawe; "she is excited, unnerved, she does not mean to hurt you."

"I don't care who I hurt," said Mrs. Dundas, with curious heat; "I'm going to send for a policeman and have everyone searched."

She put out a plump white hand and dropped it on her nephew's; he had lifted it involuntarily towards the pocket where he had concealed the vanished article. Mrs. Dundas gripped his arm.

"I feared so," she remarked; "Roland, you may deal with this miserable boy. He has my bracelet in his possession. I saw Nita Warwick give it to him—she is wearing diamonds only, and the glitter of the rubies puzzled me. This then, Austin, is what you were plotting—this is the stitch in time that was to save nine; this is the shadow that was to be cast on Miss Hamilton's character."

Roland Fanshawe had turned white and his jaw set. He held out an open palm mutely. Austin, his eyes lowered, drew out the bracelet, gave it up, and slunk away. Mrs. Dundas caught at the jewel, stepped to the bell, pressed the electric button, and moved to Nita Warwick, who had been a covert spectator of this little drama.

"Miss Warwick," she said, displaying the ornament, "I have taken the liberty of ordering your carriage; fortunately, I believe, you came alone, so I am spared consideration for some innocent guest of my brother's."

Nita stared at the golden circlet a second, rose, bowed stiffly, and, without a word, glided towards the door; Austin followed her, but she shot a disdainful glance at him.

"Bungler!" she hissed, and, shutting her fan with a click, passed out and was gone. Mrs. Dundas, with gentle fingers, was clasping the ruby bracelet upon the wrist of Eunice Hamilton.

"But I don't understand," murmured Eunice.

Sir Roland, with a grateful touch upon his sister's hand, answered the objection.

"It is not necessary that you should," he answered banteringly. He gained the side of his nephew and added, in a guarded tone.

"Yours was not the mind to conceive or the audacity to execute such a villainous trick. The reason for it I will not ask—it would be an insult to myself and others. I will speak to you later. Come, Miss Hamilton, we will resume our conversation." And he led her back into the alcove.

Nita Warwick's selfish vision had seen into the future clearly enough. Sir Roland did grow to believe that "it was destiny," that the second Eunice was meant to console him for the loss of the first. And Eunice found, when she was asked, that she shared the conviction.

Austin Carr disappeared from his club and the West End. The last news of him reported him to be ranching in California. He may or may not have been informed that at the wedding of Eunice Hamilton and Roland Fanshawe, one of the prettiest gifts was a ruby pendant. It was composed of the stones out of the famous bracelet, reset.

NEAR the close of a September day, as the sun in its dying splendour was tinting with rosy hues the dingy sails of a solitary fishing schooner, there floated from the weather-beaten rocks the words of a song. The singer had apparently forgotten that he was there at this picturesque trysting-place to meet the "dearest girl in the world," and, as though inspired by the panorama of gorgeous colourings of sky and ocean had begun singing:

Three fishers went sailing out into the west,
Out into the west when the sun went down——

The song abruptly ended as over the rocks climbed a girlish figure, who a moment later was clasped in the arms of the singer, Duncan Gray, but instead of the usual roguish smile a pale, frightened face looked up at him.

"Dora, you are ill!" he exclaimed in alarm.

"No," came the answer from the trembling lips, "it was my dream. All day I could not forget it. Such a dreadful dream."

"Why, dear, I did not think you would allow yourself to be so disturbed by a dream. But tell me about it."

"Oh, I thought I sat here on this very ledge, but alone, and the waves were pounding and beating against the rocks. Such dark, angry waves, and then——" she shivered with the memory, "then I saw you appear among those tossing foam-crested waves, and your face was as white as death. I cried out to you, but you did not hear me. I reached down, thinking to save you when a wave should sweep up nearer, when a mighty wave rolled up, whose spray left me drenched and blinded for a moment, and after it had receded I looked for you in vain and then found myself awake and shuddering with fear, the fear that it might be presentiment. Oh, can it mean that some danger awaits you?"

"You foolish little girl," he interrupted, attempting to allay her almost hysterical sobbing, "don't let your mind dwell upon such thoughts."

"But promise me you will be most careful and avoid all danger, for my sake."

"You may rest assured," he smilingly replied, "that suicide is at present the farthest from my intentions."

"Do not jest, but tell me you will in every way possible preserve yourself from danger. It was so real that you were lost to me! You will promise, won't you, please?" she pleaded.

"What is it I am to promise?" queried Duncan.

"That you will avoid any action that could result in disaster to you."

"Why, then, I promise; promise to do whatever lies within my power to divert any calamity that would for one moment grieve my little Dora."

"Oh, thank you!" she cried, clinging to him as though she were not quite sure that his promise had saved him from some inevitable peril.

* * * *

On a cold, grey morning, four months later, the wind began at an early hour to moan dismally along the rocky shore; by noon it had increased to a gale, accompanied by snow, and long before twilight a storm in all its fury was besieging the little fishing hamlet.

Three wives sat up in the lighthouse tower,
And they trimmed the lamps as the sun went down;
They looked at the squall and they looked at the shower,
And the night rack came rolling up ragged and brown;
But men must work and women must weep,
Though storms be sudden and waters deep,
And the harbour bar be moaning——

Sang Dora as she finished her last domestic duties of the day.

"How glad I am that my Duncan is not one of the poor sailor boys to-night," she added to herself, as, before seating herself with her mother she ran and peered from the little window against which the snow was steadily beating.

Yes, there was Duncan, almost at the door—but who was with him? Dora hastened to admit them to the light; but only Duncan entered, calling to his companion, who was fast disappearing in the darkness, "Will be with you directly." Then to the astonished Dora he hastily explained: "A vessel on the point is signalling for help, and Joe is picking up men to go to her relief. Sorry I can't stay with you."

A terrible thought crosses her mind—her dream of not long ago—and quickly clasping her hands upon his arm she said, with face pale in its intensity: "You must not go."

"Not go!" was his astonished reply. "I should have supposed you would urge me to go to the relief of those who are in such distress."

"Duncan," she responded, in tones whose calmness was belied by the terror depicted in her face, "you must not go, for I know now it was of this that I dreamt."

"Dora, can you think of those suffering souls out there and permit such superstitions to bar me from rendering them assistance?"

"How can I let you go?" came from the quivering lips, "when I know you are going to your death?"

Firmly he unclasped the clinging fingers from his arm and with a hearty "Good-bye, Dora," his hand was upon the latch.

With a cry she attempted to spring between the door and him whose life she was striving to reclaim before it was too late. His strong arm caught her, held her for one moment, and then gently brushed her away. Suddenly a glad light—a light of hope—shone in her eyes.

"Your promise," she exclaimed, "your promise to me that you would not imperil your life—you surely remember, and that promise you will keep."

"My promise," he answered; "I do remember, but that promise I must break."

Like a statue carved in marble stood Dora, and in a voice of befitting coldness came the words: "Then Duncan Gray, I love you no more! I hate you!"

"Dora," he gasped as his face grew pale, "surely you are not conscious of what you say."

In the same cold, even tones came the response: "I retract not a word."

The door opened, letting in a great cloud of snow, which the shrieking wind was driving along in its fury, immediately closed, and Duncan passed on through the storm, half-dazed and hardly realising what had occurred.

The men who had been summoned were surprised at his delay, but there was no time to explain. Had there been a suspicion, however, in any mind, of his unwillingness to attend them on their perilous mission, such thought was instantly dispelled when it was noticed with what energy and daring he threw himself into the work of launching the life-saving boat, and the almost superhuman strength with which he handled the oars.

One boat load was brought to shore in safety, and it was necessary to return for those who still remained aboard the now fast-sinking ship. They had almost succeeded in launching her for the second trip, when a tremendous wave swept in, hurling boat and brave life-savers back on the beach to try all over again. In spite of the thunders of the storm old Joe swore to himself that he heard a groan from one of his companions with whom he was working so desperately.

"Well, I don't much blame yer for cavin' in," said he; "it's a terrible rough night."

"Bother the night," replied Duncan; "I sprained my wrist when that last big wave smashed us up so."

"Ho, men!" shouted Joe, "Might's well let up—Duncan's broke his arm. Have to let those other fellows out there go to Davy Jones' locker."

"Hold on," cried Duncan, "I have one arm left. Now then, shove her off. And though maddened with pain, he was again with them, fighting their way to those half-frozen, despairing victims of the wreck. They had secured the last man and were again making their way to shore when one oar suddenly stopped its brave work, and Duncan, unconscious from pain, fell, and from hoarse throats came the cry, "Man overboard!"

For a second only did despair possess those heroic hearts, then rescued turned rescuers. Those who were not too benumbed by their long exposure on the doomed vessel gave a hand, and after a severe battle with the waves Duncan's inanimate form was recovered, and the shore was gained where the exhausted ones were soon cared for.

Through the blinding storm a little muffled figure crept up to Joe and inquired in a voice which was half a moan: "Duncan—where is he?"

"'Spec' they carried him home," came the thoughtless response, as in wonderment he flashed his lantern into the face of the inquirer. For an instant he saw the white face with eyes dilated in the agony of comprehension of the dreadful truth, then, without a cry, without a sound, she fell at his feet in the drifted snow.

All that night lights burnt in one cottage home, where loving hands worked unceasingly to restore to consciousness him who had so nearly lost his own life in saving the lives of others, and when that long, dark night had vanished and with it the storm, leaving portions of a wreck scattered out on the shining sands, in the morning gleam as the tide went down, the tired eyes slowly opened and a look of recognition came into them, dispelling the terrible anxiety of those who had through the creeping hours watched for signs of returning life, and filling with hope the heart of the weary-eyed, forlorn little Dora, who dropped by the bedside with a cry of joy.

A troubled expression passed over his features, and with an effort he murmured: "My promise—I broke my promise—can you forgive me?"

"Oh, Duncan," she sobbed, "it is I that am to be forgiven."

A Terrible Ride.

"HERE, Fitz, I wish you would serve this writ on Old Man Brown," said the Sheriff, just as he was starting for home at the close of business one day. "He may kick at first, but don't mind that. Just hold on, and he'll soon cool down. Go six miles east and eight south. Small, unpainted house, and big, red barn. You can't miss it. With your locomotive you ought to be back easily before dark."

The writ in question was notice of a judgment recently obtained from the county court against "Old Man Brown." Fitz took the paper with some little pride as representing his first independent mission, and with no suspicion of the possibilities involved in it. He had been in the bush but a short time, and a few days before this had been appointed deputy pro tem. to the Sheriff, who was his older brother. The "locomotive" was a motor-bicycle which he had brought with him from the West, and was the idol of his heart.

Now, "Old Man Brown" was a character. He owned a fine farm in a clearing, well stocked and well kept up. He had implicit confidence in the efficacy of lightning rods, and it was this belief that led more or less directly to the adventure we are now to tell.

Some months before a travelling peddler had convinced the old farmer that his barn required better protection, and had sold him some rods. By a familiar device the contract was so printed that by proper trimming a promissory note was left. This had been negotiated, and when time of payment came was held by an innocent purchaser who had no difficulty in securing upon it.

Brown was furious. He swore he never would pay the note, and, what was more, would kill any one who tried to serve notice of the judgment. This was the alarming situation into which Fitz was about to thrust himself unknowingly.

Fitz got to Brown's. He found him with his men busy threshing. He served the writ. The next moment he found himself flat on his back under the "old man," who was doing his best to throttle him. The "hands" gathered around to enjoy the sight, until one of the men evolved a brilliant idea, and exclaimed: "I tell you what, fellows! Let's tie him to his steam engine and start him home flying. We'll not hurt him, and if he should meet any accident between here and town it's not our fault."

The proposition was adopted with a hurrah. Before he fairly realised their intention the young man was bound firmly in the saddle, with an extra turn or two of rope about the upper tube of the diamond frame by way of additional security. His hands were placed on the handle bars and securely fastened there with cords about the wrists. Then each foot was tied firmly to one side of the "fork," and his bonds were complete. Thus trussed he was wheeled out to the road, escorted by an enthusiastic mob which included all the people of the place.

All being ready, the engine was started slowly, while two men, one on each side, supported the rider—first walking, then running, and finally letting him go with a tremendous shove. At the same instant the valve which controlled the supply of petrol was opened wide, and the machine set out at a lively pace on its journey. The impulse of the final shove had taken Fitz out into the surrounding open country, away from the travelled road. There were slight inequalities in the hard soil, and numerous tree stumps helped to make bicycle riding anything but easy, especially at high speed.

In a very few minutes Fitz had received such a shaking up as he had not imagined possible on such a conveyance. His teeth chattered and his head began to ache, as well as his back. To make matters worse it was growing dark. Unless he could be stopped in some way there was no prospect that the petrol would become exhausted and the machine stop of its own accord in much less than two hours.

After the first few minutes he had lost entirely the sense of direction, and could not be sure even of where the road lay. All he could do was to keep his balance, steer clear of serious obstructions, and trust to fortune to bring him out of the scrape. He had little hope of help from any one he might meet or overtake, for with the best intentions in the world one would find it hard to help a man flying across wild, open country, at fifteen miles an hour.

At last he came to a road, and turned into it at the imminent risk of capsizing. Like many roads through the bush, this had been made only by use—that is, no roadway had been built, but its course over the surface of the bush had been fixed by common consent and a common direction. By the repeated passing of waggons, always drawn by two horses, the wheel-tracks had been worn into deep ruts, leaving between them a ridge a foot and a half or two feet wide and of the same height as the level of the ground outside. A common bicycle would have fared badly in one of these ruts, because its pedals would have been constantly striking one side or the other, and would have been bent or broken. Fitz, however, had had pedals and cranks removed from his motor machine, and had he been free to manage it as usual he would have had little or no trouble in guiding it in the rut. Now, however, cramped by his position and unnerved by the shaking up he had received, and bothered furthermore by the darkness which prevented his seeing the road clearly, he had little control over his wheel.

As a consequence it "wobbled," striking now one side and then the other of the narrow rut with a horrible, grinding, tearing sound. Suddenly the ground seemed to give way beneath him, and, with a sensation like that felt in a rapidly descending lift, Fitz found himself plunging downward into some dark abyss. Then came a rush and a splash, and the machine was tearing uphill instead of down. Nothing had happened, after all, except the road just there forded one of the deep narrow creeks which abound in the bush. One more element, however, had been added to the rider's discomfort, for though the water was not deep, he had been thoroughly drenched by the splashing as he dashed through, and in the cold night air he soon became chilled to the bone.

Occasionally a solitary farmhouse was passed, and a little later he dashed into and through a small village. Then he skirted a barbed wire fence that tore his clothes and skinned his right side. Then came a very uneven piece of ground, anew testing his ability to maintain his equilibrium. But now, from cold, weariness, and nervous strain, Fitz was hardly conscious. Almost automatically he kept his balance, but as to direction, he could only let the machine have its own way. Often he imagined the speed slackening, but as often found that this was due to an up-grade, and that when the summit was reached a new burst of speed followed.

Very fortunately, no more fences or creeks had been met, but now a dangerous spot was near, and the bicycle in its mad career was fast approaching it. These so-called creeks are small streams that wind their way across the bush, into which they cut deep channels. One had been passed already, and at a point where the road dipped down into it, and made the passage comparatively easy. Now another was just in front, and the bicycle was approaching it where the bank was sheer. Fitz saw the danger when it was too late, and, attempting to turn aside on the very brink of the dark chasm, he only succeeded in plunging into it diagonally instead of at right angles. There was a dizzy sensation of falling, a violent shock, a blinding flash, and the hot breath of flame, —and then unconsciousness.

When he came to himself again, it was growing light. It seemed to him that every joint was aching and every nerve tingling with a separate pain of its own. He was half-lying, half-sitting in the water, which almost wholly covered his body. The violence of the fall had wrenched one hand free from its bonds, but at the same time had sprained the wrist, which now was badly swollen and discoloured.

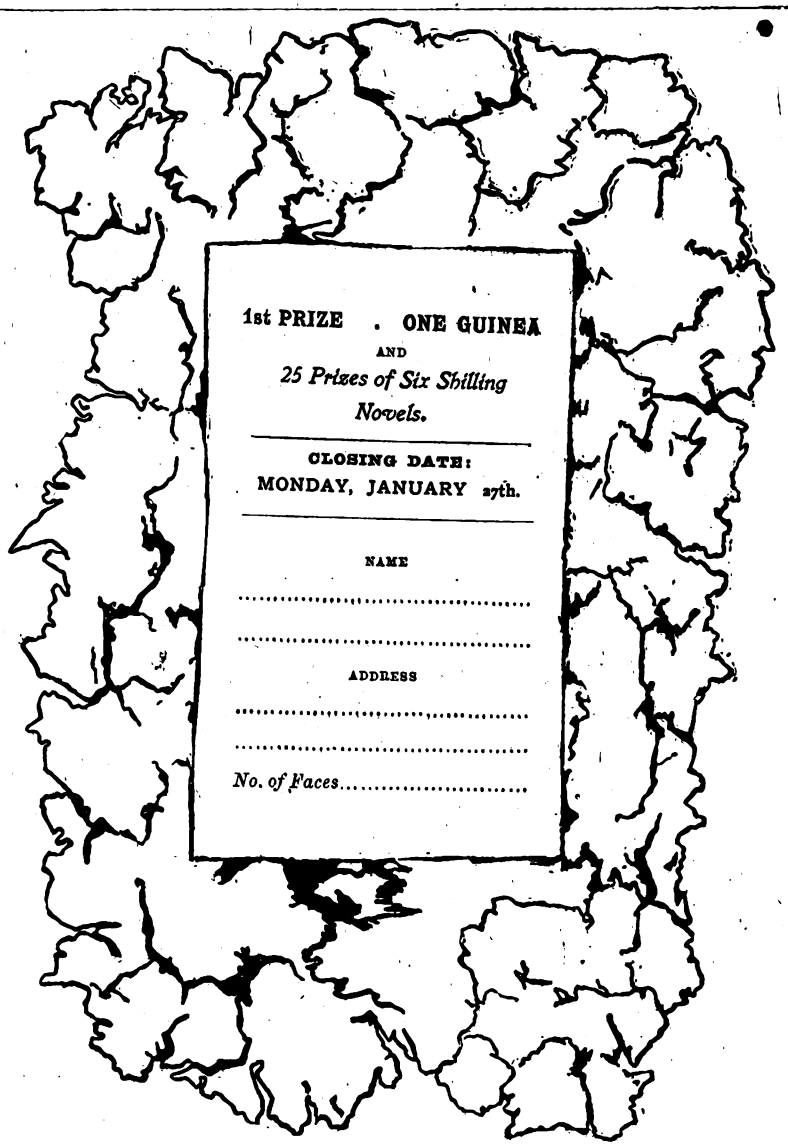
With infinite difficulty and much suffering, he succeeded in drawing his knife from his pocket, and with it cutting the cords that bound his feet, and held him in the saddle. Even then it was some time before he could rise and stand, or even straighten out his aching limbs.

Then he surveyed himself, and a piteous spectacle he saw! Clothing was torn, scorched, and saturated with muddy water; hair and moustache were singed: flesh torn by the barbed wire, and burnt and blistered by the explosion; and every joint chilled and numb from the long immersion in the water. After a time he found a place where he could climb to the top of the high bank, and fortunately saw a hut not far away. Thither he struggled, and there spent many days in recovering from the injuries and nervous shock.

"Old Man Brown" finally had to pay the judgment and so Fitz's first official errand was not in vain.

SAM STYLE.

Facemaking Puzzle.



The design above contains a number of faces from which the eyes have been omitted. What you have to do is to put dots for eyes in the right positions, so as to make the greatest possible number of faces.

The eyes must be marked in ink, and the total number of faces made must be put in the space provided for that purpose.

The first prize will be awarded to the competitor who makes the greatest number of faces. In the event of a tie the prize will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor. Cut out the design round the line inclosing it, and post to the Face-making Editor, SHORT STORIES, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., to arrive by first post on Monday, January 27th.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

A Pacific Romance.

By all the laws of the true romance she should have felt upon opening her eyes a premonition that this was to be a day of destiny. But she merely felt that the engines had stopped, that the ship was at anchor, and that, therefore, it was moistly, insufferably warm. The curtains across the state-room windows did not so much as move. She came down from her berth and pulled them aside. The coast of Guatemala was before her—and the port of San José.

There had been rain in the night, a tropical shower. The clouds were lifting away. They were massed in white and gold behind the two volcano peaks that had sent forth the one fire, the other water, in their time. And the peaks themselves were side by side, two cones of glowing pink.

They were miles inland, many miles, and the thick, luxuriant tropical green was between, reaching to the curve of the sand. There were some white houses by the beach—white, with red tiles. They made the port of San José. But the ship was anchored well out in deep water, and there were no craft in sight, save a rowboat or two drawn up on the sand, and one that was starting out from the pier across the faint blue water that showed back the clouds of white and gold. The wake and the oars glistened in the new sunlight.

The girl leant her bare arm on the sill and stood looking out. She had seen many beautiful things in her life, but never any so lovely as the coast and volcano peaks of San José de Guatemala at the break of day.

The rowboat came near, and she saw that the quarantine officials sat in the stern. But by the time she was dressed and came on deck they had long since gone. There was no one at all in sight either aft or amidships, but when she was forward of the bridge she saw someone standing near the bow. He was a new passenger. He turned and looked at her.

There was a breeze—the faintest South Sea morning breeze—that rippled her thin white gown and moved the loose tendrils of her hair. He raised his straw hat civilly and turned back to his consideration of the shore. Presently the purser joined him, and he stood talking, his hands jammed into his coat pockets, and his tan-shod feet wide apart on the deck. Then he went into the saloon.

That was all Miss Strathmore saw of nim, but she described him to her mother accurately, nevertheless.

"He's the only foreigner I ever saw who looked as though he could do things—and not talk about it afterwards. His skin is very white and his hair is black. His nose is big and his jaw shuts hard. And, moreover—though his eyes are brown, they are neither sparkling nor soft"—she objected to both—"they are level and hard. That he may speak English is my fondest wish."

He did. He was put beside her at breakfast, and the captain presented him. His name was Merida.

"You saw me this morning," he said, "when I was looking back upon 'my house, my home, my heritage, my lands.'"

"And 'the laughing dames in whom you did delight?'" she followed it up.

He gave her a quick look. "Perhaps," he said, and abruptly turned to talk to the man at the other side, a little Chilian whom Miss Strathmore did not like. They talked Spanish together, and she could not understand. So she ate her breakfast and wondered why the Guatemalan should have objected to having his quotation finished out. Had she hit some nail too neatly on the head? He had risked that. But he knew his Byron, apparently, and his English had not so much as an accent. If there was to be any further conversation, it lay with him to begin it. He did so presently, but he kept to generalities, and refused to be drawn out about himself.

The captain was more communicative on the subject later on. He belonged to the general seadog type.

"Better make up to young Merida, Miss Elizabeth," he advised, coming to a stop in front of her deck chair; "he owns about everything in sight over there," his arm swept the view of dense green from the beach curve to the mountains far away. "Half Guatemala belongs to his brother and him. The brother is married—to a Spanish princess, too—but he's not, and you'll do the best two weeks' work you ever did in your life if you catch him between here and 'Frisco Bay."

The captain liked the topic, evidently. He drew up a stool and sat down to pursue it further, going from the jocose to the serious.

He could recommend Matcho Merida. He wasn't like the rest of these Black and Tans.

"He's made this trip with me six times now, and I've watched him close. He doesn't go in for the things that most of his breed do—cards and women and wine." (Miss Strathmore thought of her quotation.) "We get the chance to see things on these ships, you may be sure, but I've never seen Merida do a silly thing yet. It may be because he's been to school in England, and runs the New-York end of affairs, but whatever the reason is, it's so. And educated!" he added, awe-inspiredly, "why, that fellow speaks four languages as well as he does his own—and got something to say in all of them. You take heed of what I say, Miss Elizabeth. I knew your father when I was a boy, and the best I could wish for his daughter would be to marry young Merida." He stood up and started off. "Here he comes now. Get him to tell you how he and the other young bloods held the Governor's palace against a revolutionist mob for a day and a night. Make up to him."

Which—the advice and the strategy—had the natural effect of rendering Miss Strathmore more than barely civil to Merida when he stopped to speak to her. He had changed the suit in which he had come on board, and was in white flannels now.

"He's not handsome," she decided, remembering the regular features of other Spanish blooded men she had known, "but he's quite the smartest individual I ever saw."

He pulled up a wicker chair beside her, and they began to talk. It was ten o'clock then. They were still talking when the luncheon gong sounded at one. They went down together, and talked through the meal.

If Miss Strathmore had been stupid she would have stayed on deck the rest of the afternoon. As it was she went to the cabin for a nap, and then devoted herself—the least in the world, obviously—to her mother, until dinner-time. But there was the evening after that. They spent it together in the bow and talked—of the phosphorescence of the water and things.

It was not until after a good many nights that they got to anything much more personal. Then it came all at once. Merida stood wedged into the extreme point of the bow, and Miss Strathmore sat half-over-hanging the black ocean when the prow cut into gold light. She was holding fast to a stay. She could just see Merida's face in the starlight, and his eyes were on her steadily.

There had been a stop in speech.

"Was I uncivil when you finished my line for me, that night?" he asked.

"Rather," Miss Strathmore answered him.

"And you didn't know why, I suppose?"

She admitted that she did not.

"Well," he explained, "it's just this. I get so sick of having people go on the basis that all men down here are Don Juans, and all that. We get far too much of it."

She reminded him that he had laid himself open to it.

"I know I did. But one doesn't expect an American or an Englishman to know his poets—if you don't mind my saying so. I never thought about your going on." There was a pause. "And I don't go in for women and flirtations," Merida said. "I have never cared for any girl except you."

It was sudden, certainly—so sudden that she let go her hold on the stay. His hand went out to steady her instantly. Then he took it away.

"I suppose you are surprised," he said. "I am myself. But it's true."

Miss Strathmore's self-possession had weathered many experiences, but foundered at this. She could not think of anything to say.

"I don't want to bother," he told her, "and I don't expect you to like me yet—but I hope you will—before long." Then he went off to other things, but conversation was not a success.

They were at anchor off Mazatlan the next day, some two miles out beyond the bar. Merida put in his appearance at breakfast in shore clothes.

"I'm going to land," he told Miss Strathmore, "if the captain will have a boat whistled for me."

"It's rough," she tried to suggest.

"I know it is," he answered, levelling his eyes straight on her for the benefit of all who might choose to see, so that she flushed very pink. "If it were not I should ask you and your mother to go, too." They had done it at Acapulco and Manzanillo before.

"I will not go," observed the Chilian; "it is too much danger to."

Merida caught Miss Strathmore's glance of contempt and nearly smiled.

Towards the middle of the morning a rowboat, whose owners were courageous, responded to the signals and ventured out to the ship. Merida went down the ladder. The captain watched him.

"You'll come to grief, Matcho, if you don't look out. See that your men aren't drunk when you start back. It's pretty bad now, but it'll be rolling like fun then. We hoist anchor at three," he added, warningly.

Merida watched his chance to jump. He caught it expertly, and the boat pulled away.

It was two o'clock when it reappeared, coming slowly, hidden in a hollow, climbing a crest, flung about through the frothing bar. Miss Strathmore and the captain and a good many others were watching it. Miss Strathmore had been shooting at driftwood and at a big turtle that was floating on its back in the sun. The captain had been watching her. The turtle was a shifting and difficult mark, but she had hit it three times, and then a boat had put out to bring it in.

"We'll have turtle steaks to-morrow," said the captain; "you're a pretty good shot."

But she had had enough of the amusement, and they were leaning idly against the rail. The captain reverted to Merida.

"Did Matcho tell you about the palace?" he asked.

"He won't," she answered; "he says he's forgotten it."

"He isn't a great talker. Hasn't told you about the girl down below on the spardeck, either, I suppose?"

She shook her head.

"Well," said the captain, "she's a little Indian from one of his plantations down there—pretty little thing, too. It seems she's in love with him and he won't look at her. So what does she go and do but scrape the money together somehow and take steerage passage and follow him. She came on at San José, but he never knew she was aboard until after we got off the Guatemalan coast. She's a shy one—and sharp. Then one day when he was down with the doctor looking at the hospital she showed herself, clasped his knees and wept, and all the rest of it—made the dickens of a row. He acted very well, but it put him in a ticklish kind of place. Of course we won't let her up here, and he's particularly careful to keep off the spardeck now. He's going to ship her back from 'Frisco, he says." He pointed to the back of a black-haired head that appeared over the side directly below them. "That's her." Evidently the eyes in the head were watching the boat too."

"She's seen you with him, and she doesn't like you a little bit," the captain chuckled. "She calls you names."

Miss Strathmore did not think it amusing at all. The rowboat was near. Miss Strathmore met Merida's eye.

"He'll have a scramble of it getting up," the captain opined.

The ship was rolling heavily.

"And his Mexicans," said the captain, uneasily; "by Heaven, they're half-drunk, too. Look at their eyes."

Whether it was that or not, it was certain that they could not seem to manage to keep the boat alongside long enough for Merida to catch the platform, when the ship rolled down.

"Take your time, Merida," the chief engineer called to him—"take your time."

Apparently the word suggested something to Merida. He put his hand to his watch-pocket—and then his face changed. There were three Mexicans in the boat, but only two of them had rowed; the other had been sitting near him in the stern, steering occasionally with an oar. Merida said something to this one. The fellow looked too innocent and shook his head. Things happened quickly after that. Merida caught the man by the arm, and that began the fight. The rowers shipped their oars, and, urged by the excitement and the tequilla, which they had drunk, joined in. The boat pitched and plunged.

"They'll kill him," the captain called out. "Lower away a boat."

"If they've no knives"—began the purser. But as he said it a knife was thrown, and by the little Indian girl on the deck below.

The captain swore one oath. "They'll do him now—certain," he said.

Merida had his man by the throat, but he was down, and all three were atop of him. One of them jumped up and caught the knife by the handle as it came, dexterously. He gave it to the man who had Merida under him, and the other two drew back. A splendid brown arm, with its hand grasping the knife, rose high and poised above Merida's breast. Then it fell—but uselessly, limp from the shoulder-bone. There was smoke in the muzzle of the revolver in Miss Strathmore's hand.

Merida threw the wounded Mexican off, bent over him, felt in his sash, and drew out his own watch. The rowers had resumed their oars.

"Now," said Merida, quietly, "you take me alongside."

The little Indian on the spardeck had watched it eagerly, hanging out far over the side. She turned now, twisting around lithely upon her back, her face upturned. Her dark eyes glowed, her lips apart. Miss Strathmore, the revolver still in her hand, was straight above. The Indian threw back her head further still, and then laughed. Her right hand went to her forehead, and came away again with a sweep, in mock salute—the salute of the matador who has missed his stroke and forsakes the ring.

By RAFAEL SABATINI.

SUMMARY.

ANDREA DE MANCINI, a nephew of Cardinal Mazarin, is found one day by the latter in the Palais Royal, Paris, in a state of intoxication. Gaston de Luynes, the narrator of this story, and fencing-master to de Mancini, is blamed by the Cardinal for allowing his nephew to get into such a condition, and is removed from his position of fencing-master.

Eugène de Canaples insults de Mancini and a duel is arranged, but the Cardinal hears of it and tells de Luynes that it must not take place. De Luynes realises that if he does not prevent it the Cardinal has power to do him great harm, and accordingly raises a quarrel with de Canaples which ends in a fight, de Canaples being severely wounded. The onlookers are enraged with de Luynes because he indiscreetly lets fall the fact that he raised this quarrel so as to prevent a duel between de Mancini and de Canaples, and he has to flee for his life. To escape his pursuers he springs on the step of a passing carriage, and the ladies inside let him shelter there for a time, but when he says that he has wounded de Canaples they order him to alight.

De Luynes then accompanies de Mancini to the home of Eugène de Canaples, whose sister, Yvonne, Cardinal Mazarin wishes de Mancini to marry. The Chevalier de Canaples receives de Luynes and de Mancini very cordially at his château. Yvonne, however, is not at all gracious to de Luynes, because she knows of the duel which he fought with her brother, as she and her sister Geneviève were the two ladies who befriended him. De Mancini falls in love with Geneviève.

De Luynes does not stay at the Château de Canaples, but at an inn in Blois, the Lys de France. One morning he is visited there by the Marquis de St. Auban, who himself wants to marry Yvonne—for her money. After insulting each other a duel is arranged for the following morning, but the time is afterwards altered to the evening of the day of the insult. St. Auban tells de Luynes that Cardinal Mazarin has issued a warrant for his arrest.

As de Luynes is riding to Canaples after his encounter with St. Auban, he is met by Malpertuis, an officer who had been in the train of St. Auban, and by him he is told that a plot is on foot to kidnap Yvonne. De Luynes warns the lady, but she takes no heed and falls into the trap set for her. De Luynes starts out to her assistance.

CHAPTER XII.

The Rescue.

SOME precious moments did I waste standing with that green rag betwixt my fingers, and I grew sick and numb in body and in mind. She was gone—carried off by a man I had reason to believe she hated, and whom God send she might have no motive to hate more deeply hereafter.

The ugly thought swelled until it blotted out all others, and in its train there came a fury upon me that drove me to do by instinct that which earlier I should have done by reason. I climbed back into the saddle, and away across the meadow I went, journeying at an angle with the road, my horse's head turned in the direction of Blois. That road at last was gained, and on I thundered at a stretched gallop, praying that my hard-used beast might last until the town was reached.

Now, as I have already said, I am not a man who falls easily a prey to excitement. It may have beset me in the heat of battle, when the fearsome lust of blood and death makes every man a raving maniac, thrilled with mad joy at every stab he deals, and laughing with fierce passion at every blow he takes, though in the taking of it his course be run. But saving at such wild times, never until then could I recall having been so little master of myself. There was a fever in me; all hell was in my blood; and, stranger still, and hitherto unknown at any season, there was a sickly fear that mastered me, and drew out great beads of sweat upon my brow. Fear for myself I have never known, for at no time has life so pampered me that the thought of parting company with it concerned me greatly. Fear for another I had not known till then, saving perchance the uneasiness at times that I had felt touching Andrea, because never yet had I sufficiently cared——

Thus far my thoughts took me, as I rode, and where I have halted did they halt, and stupidly I went over their ground again, like one who gropes for something in the dark.

Because never yet had I sufficiently cared. I had never cared——

And then, Ah, Heaven! As I turned the thought over I understood, and understanding, I pursued the sentence where I had left off.

But caring at last, I was sick with fear of what might befall the one I cared for. There lay the reason of the frenzied excitement whereof I was become the slave. That it was that had brought the moisture to my brow and curses to my lips; that it was that had caused me to instinctively thrust the rag of green velvet within my doublet.

Heavens! It was strange—aye, monstrous strange—and a right good jest for Fate to laugh at, that I, Gaston de Luynes, vile ruffler and worthless bravo, should have come to such a pass; I, whose forefinger had for the past ten years uptilted the chin of every tavern wench I had chanced upon; I, whose lips had never known the touch of other than the lips of these; I, who had thought my heart long dead to tenderness and devotion, or to any fondness save the animal one for my ignoble self. Yet there I rode as if the devil had me for a quarry, panting, swearing, reviling, and well-nigh sobbing with rage at a fear that I might come too late, all because of a proud lady who knew me for what I was, and held me in contempt because of her knowledge, all for a lady who had not the kindness for me that one might spare a dog, who looked on me as something not good to see.

Since there was no one to whom I might tell my story that they might mock me, I mocked myself, with a laugh that startled passers-by, and which, coupled with the crazy pace at which I dashed into Blois, caused them, I doubt not, to think me mad. Nor were they wrong; for mad, indeed, I deemed myself.

That I trampled no one under foot in my furious progress through the streets is a miracle that passes my understanding.

In the courtyard of the Lys de France I drew rein at last, with a tug that brought my shuddering brute on to his haunches, and sent those who stood about, flying into the shelter of the doorways.

"Another horse," I shouted as I sprang to the ground. "Another horse at once."

Then, as I turned to inquire for Michelot, I espied him leaning stolidly against the gateway.

"How long have you been there, Michelot?" I asked.

"Half-an-hour, mayhap."

"Saw you a closed carriage pass?"

"Ten minutes ago I saw one go by, followed by M. de St. Auban and a gentleman who greatly resembled M. de Vilmorin, besides an escort of four of the most villainous knaves——"

"That is the one," I broke in. "Quick, Michelot. Arm yourself and get your horse. I have need of you. Come knave, move yourself."

St. Auban bore down on me, but the glittering point of my rapier drove him back again.

At the end of a few minutes we set out at a sharp trot, leaving the curious ones, whom my loud-voiced commands had assembled, to speculate on the meaning of so much bustle. Once clear of the township we gave the reins to our horses, and our trot became a gallop as we travelled along the road to Meung, with the Loire on our right. And as we went I briefly told Michelot what was afoot, interlarding my explanations with prayers that we might come upon the kidnappers before they crossed the river, and curses at the flying pace of our mounts, which to my anxious mind seemed slow.

At about a mile from Blois the road runs over an undulation of the ground that is almost a hill. From the moment that I left Canables, as the Angelus was ringing, until the moment when our panting horses gained the brow of that little eminence, but half-an-hour had sped. Still, in that half-hour the tints had all but faded from the sky, and the twilight shadows grew thicker around us with every moment. Yet not so thick were they become but that I could see a coach at a standstill in the hollow, some three hundred yards beneath us, and, by that, half-a-dozen horses, of which four were riderless and held by the two men who were still mounted. Then, breathlessly scanning the field betwixt the road and the river, I espied five persons half-way across, and at a like distance from the water as we were from the coach. Two men, whom I supposed to be St. Auban and Vilmorin, were forcing along a woman, whose struggles, feeble though they appeared, yet retarded their progress in some measure. Behind them walked two others, musket on shoulder.

I pointed them out to Michelot with a soft cry of joy. We were in time.

Following with my eyes the course they appeared to be pursuing, I saw, by the bank, a boat, in which two men were waiting. Again I pointed, this time to the boat.

"Over the hedge, Michelot," I cried; "we must ride in a straight line for the water, and so intercept them. Follow me."

Over the hedge we went, and down the gentle slope at as round a pace as the soft ground would, with safety, allow. I had reckoned upon being opposed by six, or even eight men, whereas there were but four, one of whom I knew was hardly to be reckoned. Doubtless St. Auban had imagined himself safe from pursuit, when he left two of his bravos with the horses, probably to take them on to Meung, and there cross with them and rejoin him. Two more, I doubted not, were those seated at the oars.

I laughed to myself as I took in all this; but even as I laughed, those in the field stood still, and sent up a shout that told me we had been perceived.

"On, Michelot, on!" I shouted, spurring my horse forward. Then, in answer to their master's call, the two ruffians who had been doing duty as grooms, came pounding into the field.

"Ride to meet them, Michelot," I cried. Obediently he wheeled to the left, and I caught the swish of his sword as it left the scabbard.

St. Auban was now hurrying towards the river with his party. Already they were but fifty yards from the boat, and a hundred still lay 'twixt him and me. Furiously I pressed onward, and presently but half the distance separated us, whilst they were still some thirty yards from their goal.

Then his two bravos faced round to meet me, and one, standing some fifty paces in advance of the other, levelled his musket and fired. But, in his haste, he aimed too high; the bullet carried away my hat, and before the smoke had cleared, I was upon him. I had drawn a pistol from my holster, but it was not needed; my horse passed over him before he could save himself from my fearful charge.

In the fast fading light, a second musket barrel shone, and I saw the second ruffian taking aim at me, with not a dozen yards betwixt us. With the old soldier's instinct I wrenched at the reins till I brought my horse on to his haunches. It was high time; for simultaneously with my action, the fellow blazed at me, and the scream of pain that broke from my steed told me that the poor brute had taken the bullet. With a bound that carried me forward some six paces, the animal sank, quivering, to the ground. I disengaged my feet from the stirrups as he fell, but the shock of it sent me rolling on the ground, and the ruffian, seeing me fallen, sprang forward, swinging his musket up above his head. I dodged the murderous, downward stroke, and as the stock buried itself close beside me, in the soft earth, I rose on one knee, and with a grim laugh, I raised my pistol. I brought the muzzle within a hand's breadth of his face, then fired, and shot him through the head. Perchance you'll say 'twas a murderous, cruel stroke. Mayhap it was; but at such seasons men stay not to unravel niceties, but strike, ere they themselves be stricken.

Leaping over the twitching body, I got out my sword and sprang after St. Auban, who, with Vilmorin and Yvonne—careless of what might betide his followers—was now within ten paces of the boat.

Pistol shots cracked behind me, and I wondered how Michelot was faring, but dared not pause to look.

The twain in the boat stood up, wielding their great oars, and methought them on the point of coming to their master's aid, in which case my battle had truly been a lost one. But that craven Vilmorin did me good service then, for with a cry of fear at my approach, he abandoned his hold of Yvonne, whose struggles were keeping both the men back; thus freed, he fled towards the boat, and jumping in, he shouted to the men in his shrill, quavering voice, to put off. Albeit they disobeyed him contemptuously and waited for the Marquis, still, they no longer left the boat, fearing, no doubt, that if they did so, the coward would put off alone.

As for St. Auban, Vilmorin's flight left him unequal to the task of dragging the girl along. She dug her heels into the ground, and tug as he might, for all that he set both hands to work, he could not move her. In this plight I came upon him, and challenged him to stand and face me.

With a bunch of oaths he got out his sword, but in doing so he was forced to remove one of his hands from the girl's arm. Seizing the opportunity with a ready wit and courage seldom found in women of her quality, she twisted herself from the grip of his left hand, and came staggering towards me for protection, holding up her pinioned wrists. With my blade I severed the cord, whereupon she plucked the gag from her mouth, and sank against my side, her struggles having left her weak indeed.

As I set my arm about her waist to support her, my heart seemed to swell within me, and strange melodies shaped themselves within my soul.

St. Auban bore down upon me with a fearful oath, but the glittering point of my rapier danced before his eyes, and drove him back again.

"To me, Vilmorin, you cowardly cur!" he shouted. "To me, you dogs!"

He let fly at them a volley of blood-curdling oaths, then, without waiting to see if they obeyed him, he came at me again, and our swords met.

"Courage, Mademoiselle," I whispered, as a sigh that was almost a groan escaped her. "Have no fear."

But that fight was not destined to be fought, for, as again we engaged, there came the fall of running feet behind me. It flashed across my mind that Michelot had been worsted, and that my back was about to be assailed. But in St. Auban's face I saw, as in a mirror, that he who came was Michelot.

"Steady there!" snarled the Marquis, springing back beyond my reach. "What can a man do with naught but fools and poltroons to serve him? Faugh! We will continue our swordplay at St. Sulpice des Reaux to-night. Au revoir, M. de Luynes."

Turning, he sheathed his sword, and running down to the river, bounded into the boat, where I heard him reviling Vilmorin with every foul name he could call to mind.

My blood was aflame, and I was not minded to wait for our meeting at Reaux. Consigning Mademoiselle to the care of Michelet, who stood panting and bleeding from a wound in his shoulder, I turned back to my dead horse, and plucking the remaining pistol from the holster, I ran down to the very edge of the water. The boat was not ten yards from shore, and my action had been unheeded by St Auban, who was standing in the stern.

Kneeling, I took careful aim at him, and as God lives, I would have saved much of the trouble that was to follow had I been allowed to fire. But at that moment a hand was laid upon my arm, and Yvonne's sweet voice murmured in my ear, "You have fought a brave and gallant fight, M. de Luynes, and you have done a deed of which the knights of old might have been proud. Do not mar it by an act of murder."

"Murder, Mademoiselle?" I gasped, letting my hand fall. "Surely there is no murder in this?"

"A suspicion of it, I think, and so brave a man should have clean hands."

CHAPTER XIII.
The Hand of Yvonne.

We did not long remain upon the field of battle. Indeed, if we lingered at all, it was but so that Mademoiselle might bandage Michelot's wound. And while he did so, my stout henchman related to us how it had fared with him; how having taken the two ruffians separately, he had been wounded by the first, whom he repaid by splitting his skull, whereupon the second one had discharged his pistol without effect, then made off towards the road, while Michelot, remembering that I might need assistance, had let him go.

"There, good Michelot," quoth Mademoiselle, completing her task, "I have done what little I can. And now, M. de Luynes, let us go."

It was close upon seven o'clock, and night was at hand. Already the moon was showing her large, full face above the tree tops by Chambord, and casting a silver streak athwart the stream. The plash of oars from the Marquis' boat was waxing indistinct, despite the stillness, whilst by the eye the boat itself was no longer to be distinguished.

As I turned, my glance fell upon the bravo whom I had shot. He lay stiff and stark upon his back, his sightless eyes wide open and staring heavenwards, his face all blood smeared and ghastly to behold.

Mademoiselle shuddered. "Let us go," she repeated, in a faint whisper. Her eye had also fallen upon that thing, and her voice was full of awe. She laid her hand upon my sleeve, and, 'neath the suasion of her touch I moved away.

To our surprise and joy we found St. Auban's coach where we had left it, with two saddled horses tethered close by. The others had doubtless been taken by the coachman and the bravo who had escaped Michelot, both of whom had fled. These animals we looked upon as the spoils of war, and, accordingly, when we set out in the coach—Mademoiselle having desired me to ride beside her therein, Michelot wielding the reins, it was with those two horses tethered behind.

"Monsieur de Luynes," said my companion softly, "I fear that I have done you a great injustice. Indeed I know not how to crave your forgiveness, how to thank you, or how to hide my shame at those words I spoke to you this afternoon at Canaples."

"Not another word on that score, Mademoiselle."

And to myself I thought of what recompense already had been mine. To me it had been given to have her lean trustingly upon me, my arm about her waist, whilst sword in hand I had fought for her. Heavens! Was that not something to have lived for—aye, and to have died for—methought.

"I deserved, Monsieur," she continued presently, "that you should have left me to my fate for all the odious things I uttered when you warned me of my peril, and for the manner in which I have treated you since your coming to Blois."

"You have but treated me, Mademoiselle, in the only manner in which you could treat one so far beneath you, one who is utterly unworthy that you should bestow a single regret upon him."

"You are strangely humble to-night, Monsieur. It is unwonted in you, and for once you wrong yourself. You have not said that I am forgiven."

"I have naught to forgive."

"Alas! you have—indeed you have."

"Well then!" quoth I, with a return of my old tone of banter, "I forgive."

Thereafter we travelled on in silence for some little while, my heart full of joy at being so near to her, and the friendliness which she evinced for me, and my mind casting o'er my joyous heart a cloud of some indefinable evil presage.

"You are a brave man, M. de Luynes," she murmured presently, "and I have been taught that brave men are ever honourable and true."

"Had they who taught you that known Gaston de Luynes, they would have told you instead that it is possible for a vile man to have the one redeeming virtue of courage, even as it is possible for a liar to have a countenance that is sweet and innocent."

"There speaks that humble mood you are affecting, and which sits upon you as my father's clothes might do. Nay, Monsieur, I shall hold to my first teaching, and be deaf to yours."

Again there was a spell of silence. At last—

"I have been thinking, Monsieur," she said, "of that other occasion on which you rode with me. I remember that you said you had killed a man, and when I asked you why, you said that you had done it because he sought to kill you. Was that the truth?"

"Assuredly, Mademoiselle. We fought a duel, and it is customary in a duel for each to seek to kill the other."

"But why was this duel fought?" she cried, with some petulance.

"I fear me, Mademoiselle, that I may not answer you," I said, recalling the exact motives, and thinking of how futile appeared the quarrel which Eugène de Canaples had sought with Andrea, when viewed in the light of what had since befallen.

"Was the quarrel of your seeking?"

"In a measure it was, Mademoiselle."

"In a measure?" she echoed. Then persisting, as women will, "Will you not tell me what this measure was?"

"Yes, Mademoiselle," I answered in despair, "I will tell you just so much as I may. Your brother had occasion to be opposed to certain projects that were being formed in Paris by persons high in power around a beardless boy. Himself of too small importance to dare wage war against those powerful ones who would have crushed him, your brother sought to gain his ends by sending a challenge to this boy. The lad was high-spirited, and consented to meet M. de Canaples, by whom he would assuredly have been murdered —'tis the only word, Mademoiselle—had I not intervened as I did."

She was silent for a moment, then—

"It grieves me to disturb you, but I have a warrant for your arrest."

"I believe you, Monsieur," she said simply. "You thought then to shield another—but why?"

"For three reasons, Mademoiselle. Firstly, those persons high in power chose to think it my fault that the quarrel had arisen, and threatened to hang me if the duel took place and the boy were harmed. Secondly, I myself felt a kindness for the boy. Thirdly, because whatever sins Heaven may record against me, it has at least ever been my way to side against men who, confident of their superiority, seek with the cowardly courage of the strong to harm the weak. It is, Mademoiselle, the courage of the man who knows no fear when he strikes a woman, yet who will shake with a palsy when another man but threatens him."

"Why did you not tell me all this before?" she whispered, after a pause, and methought I caught a quaver in her voice.

I laughed for answer, and she read my laugh aright; presently she pursued her questions, and asked me the name of the boy I had defended. But I evaded her, telling her that she must need no further details to believe me.

"It is not that, Monsieur. I do believe you; I do indeed, but——"

"Hark, Mademoiselle!" I cried suddenly, as the clatter of many hoofs sounded near at hand. "What is that?"

A shout rang out at that moment.

"Halt! Who goes there?"

"Oh, Heaven!" exclaimed Mademoiselle, and again the voice sounded, this time more sinister:

"Halt, I say—in the king's name!"

The coach came to a standstill, and through the window I beheld the shadowy forms of several mounted men and the feeble glare of a lantern.

"Who travels in the carriage, knave?" came the voice again.

"Mademoiselle de Canaples," answered Michelot; then like a fool he must needs add, "have a care whom you knave, my master, if you would grow old."

"Tut tut! Let us behold this Mademoiselle de Canaples who owns so fearful a warrior for a coachman."

The door was flung rudely open, and the man bearing the lantern, whose rays shone upon a uniform of the Cardinal's guards, confronted us.

With a chuckle he flashed the light in my face, then suddenly grew serious.

"Good Heavens! Is it indeed you, M. de Luynes?" quoth he, adding with stern politeness, "it grieves me to disturb you, but I have a warrant for your arrest."

He was fumbling in his doublet as he spoke, and during the time I had leisure to scan his countenance, recognising to my surprise a young lieutenant of the guards who had but recently served with me, and with whom I had been on terms almost of friendship. His words, "I have a warrant for your arrest," came like a bolt from the blue to enlighten me, and to remind me of what St. Auban had that morning told me, and which for the nonce I had all but forgotten.

Upon hearing those same words, Yvonne, methought, grew pale, and her eyes were bent upon me with a look of surprise and pity.

"Upon what charge am I arrested?" I inquired with forced composure.

"My warrant mentions none, M. de Luynes. It is here." And he thrust before me a paper, whose purport I could have read in its shape and seals. Idly my eyes ran along the words:

"By these presents I charge and empower my lieutenant, Jean de Montrésor, to seize where'er he may be found, hold, and conduct to Paris the sieur Gaston de Luynes——"

And so further, until the Cardinal's signature ended the legal verbiage.

"In the king's name, M. de Luynes," said Montrésor, firmly yet deferentially, "your sword."

It would have been madness to have done aught but comply with this request, and so I surrendered my rapier, which he in his turn delivered to one of his followers. Next I stepped down from the coach, and turned to take leave of Mademoiselle, whereupon Montrésor, thinking that peradventure matters were as they appeared to be between us, and being a man of fine feelings, signed to his men to fall back, whilst he, himself, withdrew a few paces.

"Farewell, Mademoiselle," I said simply. "I shall carry with me for consolation the memory that I have been of service to you, and I shall ever—during the little time that may be left me—be grateful to Heaven for the opportunity that it has afforded me of causing you—perchance without sufficient reason—to think better of me. Farewell, Mademoiselle. Heaven guard you!"

It was too dark to see her face, but my heart bounded with joy to catch in her voice a quiver that argued, methought, regret for me.

"What does it mean, M. de Luynes? Why are they taking you?"

"Because I have displeased my Lord Cardinal, albeit, Mademoiselle, I swear to you that I have no cause for shame at the reasons for which I am being arrested."

"My father is Monseigneur de Mazarin's friend," she cried. "He is also yours. He shall exert for you that influence he possesses."

"'Twere useless, Mademoiselle. Besides, what does it signify? Again, farewell."

She spoke no answering word, but silently held out her hand. Silently I took it in mine, and for a moment I hesitated, thinking of what I was—of what she was. At last, moved by some power that was greater than my will, I stooped and pressed those shapely fingers to my lips. Then I stepped suddenly back and closed the carriage door, oppressed by a feeling akin to that of having done an evil deed.

"Have I your permission to say a word to my servant, M. le Lieutenant?" I inquired.

He bowed assent, whereat, stepping close up to the horror-stricken Michelot—

"Drive straight to the Château de Canaples," I said, in a low voice. "Thereafter return to the Lys de France, and there wait until you hear from me. Here, take my purse; there are some fifty pistoles in it."

"Speak but the word, Monsieur," he growled, "and I'll pistol a couple of these dogs."

"Pah! You grow childish," I laughed, "or can you not see that fellow's musket?"

"Oh! I'll risk his aim. I never yet knew one of those curs to shoot straight."

"No, no, obey me, Michelot. Think of Mademoiselle. Go! Farewell! If we should not meet again, my friend," I finished, as I seized his loyal hand, "what few things of mine are at the hostelry shall belong to you, as well as what may be left of this money. It is little enough payment, Michelot, for all your faithfulness——"

"Monsieur, Monsieur!" he cried.

"How now!" I muttered, "we are becoming women. Be off, you knave. Farewell."

The peremptoriness of my tone ended our leave-taking, and caused him to grip his reins and bring down his whip. The coach moved on. A white face, on which the moonlight fell, glanced at me from the window, then to my staring eyes naught was left but the back of the retreating vehicle, with one of the two saddle-horses that had been tethered to it still ambling in its wake.

"M. de Montrésor," I said, thrusting my bullet-pierced hat upon my head, "I am at your service."

EMMA: "No, George, it cannot be. We must part." (Bitterly.) "My purse-proud father will not accept a poor man for his son-in-law." George (frantically): "Say not so. I cannot give thee up. My heart will break. I——" Purse-proud father enters the room without observing them. Throws himself into a chair and groans aloud: "Bankruptcy! Ruin! Every penny swept away!" George (sweeping himself away at these words): "Farewell, then, Emma, since you discard me." But he says to himself, "Mighty narrow escape that."

A Heart's Awakening.

"I DESIRE an explanation!" The man's voice was almost rough in its tone of command. "I wish to understand the situation exactly."

Enid Carew drew herself up haughtily.

"Indeed," she said, though, try how she would, she could not keep the trace of nervousness from her voice, "Indeed, and suppose I refuse, what then?"

She threw down her riding-whip on the table and sank into the nearest chair.

He stood, a giant of strength and anger, looking down at her.

"What then? I tell you," he began fiercely, then, suddenly changing his tone, said quietly, "I am waiting for the explanation of your conduct."

The girl looked up at him defiantly.

"As for that," and she shrugged her shoulders, "That is my own affair."

He stood with folded arms, looking sternly at her.

Enid shifted her position uneasily.

"For goodness' sake sit down, that tragic air is overdone. I wish I had not told you; but as I have, why not show a bold front, instead of——"

She did not finish her sentence, for a glance at his white set face, and eyes glittering with anger, made her falter. He came close to her, and stooping, took hold of her wrists,

"Enid, you shall rue this day, that I swear. To hink that all this time you have let me be your constant companion, let me—yes," he said fiercely, "let me make love to you, and all the while you had not the smallest intention of returning that love."

"Well, but my dear Jack, surely you could see it was merely a mild flirtation on my part. I am sure I quite understood your conduct to be but that."

"A mild flirtation! Only that!" he took up his hat. "If that is going to be your behaviour, I don't envy your future husband."

Enid sprang up, her face quivering.

"How dare you! How dare you!" she cried breathlessly.

"It is your own fault," he flung out recklessly; "You have destroyed my happiness, and my faith in woman."

She laughed scornfully. "That is quite the correct ending, the faith in woman is always the first to go."

He did not heed her. "I will be revenged; you were only playing with me, you say, you took all the love I had to give you, and have thrown it back into my face. Love, when so treated, turns to hate; for the hatred I now bear you I will treat all women as you have treated me. In the end," he said grimly, "it is the woman who suffers."

Without a word she turned and rang the bell.

He reached the door in long strides and gave one last long look back at her.

She was standing erect, her fair face flushed, her blue eyes flaming with anger.

Her wonderful beauty maddened him.

"You heartless flirt," he hissed, and was gone.

Enid threw herself in a chair, smarting under his words; she felt an unwonted tug at her heartstrings. What a pity money was so essential to her happiness! If it had not been for the money, perhaps——. But she checked the thought. She started, a little hand was resting on her shoulder.

"Dulcie!" she said sharply. "What are you doing here?"

"Sister Enid, do not be angry," said the child timidly, "I could not help being here. I was behind the screen reading my fairy tales and I could not help hearing. Oh, sister Enid," she cried piteously, "you are not a heartless flirt. Why did he call you that?"

Enid looked at the baby face, with its wondering eyes, lifted to hers with such adoring love. She hesitated as to how she should answer.

This child was the one being in the world who could touch her heart.

"It was only fun, Dulcie; he was only pretending," she said lamely.

The child's face flushed, and she lifted her head proudly.

"No, it was not pretence," she said firmly, "I know pretence; it was real. Why don't you tell me why he was so angry, and why he called you such horrid names?" still presisted the child.

"Because," broke out Enid, "he loves me."

Then, seeing the perplexity in the baby eyes, she said, "Darling, you can't understand such things just yet. Don't bother about them. Go and finish your fairy tales."

But Dulcie shook her head.

"I must bother. You are not a heartless flirt."

The persistence of the child began to weary Enid, and she said laughingly, "I tell you, darling, Enid likes to be called a flirt. Think of the dances, the lovely dresses, and all the gentlemen who are so fond of Enid, and who give her presents. All the glory, all the sparkle would not be there if Enid were not a heartless flirt." She spoke recklessly, her thoughts were of Jack Graham. She clapped her hands, "Dulcie! Dulcie!" she cried excitedly, "it is such fun to be a flirt."

For an instant Dulcie looked at her gravely, then she caught her sister's 'mood.

"How lovely you are," she cried, "Sister Enid, let me be like you; may I be a flirt?"

Enid started. How pretty, how fair the child was! How radiant the innocent eyes looked, shining with glee as she put the question, "Sister Enid, may I be a flirt?"

A wave of shame passed over Enid. To be a flirt did not seem to be such a thing to boast of after all. There must be better, fairer things for this little child.

She stooped and kissed the golden curls, so like her own.

"No, darling," she answered, with unwonted gentleness, "You had better be a good fairy princess."

"But shall I have the fun? Shall I be as happy as you?"

Enid stroked the child's head, then she said slowly, "Yes, my Dulcie, you will perhaps be happier," then, kissing the child, she suddenly changed her tone, "I am going to be very busy, dear, so run away now."

Enid did not appear to be very busy, she still remained where she was, buried deep in thought.

That morning she had been her usual ride with Jack Graham. During that ride he had again spoken to her of love; this time she had not led him on to tell of his passion for her, but had told him that her engagement with Lord Dunlop would soon be publicly announced. She knew this was not at present true; Lord Dunlop had not actually proposed to her, but had acted in such a way that she expected him to do so at any moment. It had been her ambition for some time to become Lady Dunlop, and she was one to sacrifice all to her ambition. She was nineteen, and enjoying to the full her brilliant beauty. She loved that beauty far too well to think of throwing it away on a poor man like Jack Graham. She was interrupted in her meditations, a letter was brought to her; she opened it eagerly.

"At last the time has come! My lord is rather wanting in courage to propose by letter! However, it will save a good deal of unnecessary exertion on my part to scribble off a few lines of acceptance."

As she read the letter her face underwent a change, her colour slowly ebbed away, her fingers trembled visibly. With an angry cry she threw down the letter and paced the room.

"It can't be! It shall not be so!" she muttered. But it was so. The letter mocked at her, as the very witness that it was so.

She picked it up, holding it as though it would scorch her fingers, and read it again.

"Dear Enid," it ran, "I have hastily left for town, and perhaps you will be surprised when I tell you that Lady Kitty is my reason for having done so. She has promised to be my wife; I want you to be the first to congratulate me. She wished that you should be the very first to know. I shall never forget the fine time you and I have had together.—Yours ever, RALPH."

Enid tore the letter into shreds; she shed tears; hot and fast they ran down her cheeks, tears of anger and mortification.

"Lady Kitty!" she ejaculated, "That designing little wretch! I really thought him safe in my hands. So she made him write at once and tell me! The insult! Her delight!" She stamped her foot, "she shall not triumph over me. She shall be informed of my news."

She got together pen and paper, and, with feverish haste, wrote:—

"Dear Ralph,—A thousand congratulations. I always knew Lady Kitty to be the one woman in the world for you. I was just writing to tell you of my news when your letter arrived. Congratulate me, for I, too, am to be married, to Colonel Dewey. We have known one another a long, long time, and I consider myself a happy, lucky, girl. He is a man worth loving.—Yours ever, ENID CAREW."

She then wrote a note to Colonel Dewey, consenting to see him that afternoon. He had written to her pleading for an interview, and stating his reason for coming. He loved her, and wished to ask her to be his wife. She had meant to refuse to see him, but now she altered her mind. Granting this interview meant accepting his love.

The sun was gradually sinking to rest when Colonel Dewey arrived. He was a tall, fine man, without a good feature in his face except his eyes, though Enid had always declared there was no life in them. They were serious eyes of a deep grey. People looked into those eyes and respected and trusted him.

"You heartless flirt," he hissed, and was gone.

Just now, as he came eagerly forward, there was a great light in those eyes; Enid no longer denied their lack of life, but now the discovery irritated her. He had a humble, happy look, and she detested a humble man. Most of her lovers had been wild and impetuous.

Many voted Colonel Dewey a "bore"; he had a slow, drawling style of speaking, and a quiet, very slow way of doing things; but he had two great advantages, riches, and an even temper.

As Enid went to meet him, a shiver ran through her. Why had it to be this man?

"Enid!" he said, "Do you know what this means to me?"

"Yes," she answered, with a soft smile, "At least, I know what it means to me."

"Enid!" he exclaimed, "Dear, if you could but see the depth of my regard for you! If you could but know the firm resolve with which I have dedicated my future life to your happiness and welfare; if, my dear love, you could but understand the intense gratitude I feel for such unspeakable joy!"

He put his arm around her.

"Enid! Turn your face towards me, that I may see your dear eyes of love. Oh, Enid, make me worthy of this."

Enid slowly raised her eyes and looked at him.

A deep, pure love shone in his eyes, a great gladness was written on his face; from such love and joy she hid her face.

She suddenly felt ashamed.

He pressed her closer to him.

"Sweetheart, I love you with my whole soul. Tell me that you love me."

Enid was silent, she felt the words would choke her; she freed herself from his embrace, and said, in a low voice, "Philip, I am glad I am to be your wife."

She stood looking out of the window. Slowly, very slowly the sun was sinking; in a few moments it would be gone, taking with it all brightness and warmth.

She felt a strange impulse to call out to it to stay yet a little while longer; a thousand thoughts flitted through her brain.

Her first thought had been, "I cannot marry him, he is too good, and I cannot wrong him so." Then, quick as lightning, came the thought of Lady Kitty's triumph; Jack Graham's words rose clearly before her. Her vanity was sorely hurt. Her face was pale, and in the fast fading daylight it looked wistful.

"I am glad I am to be your wife," she repeated, turning to him.

With a glad cry he took her again in his arms.

This silent, slow man, seemed transformed.

The intensity and depth of his passion made her tremble.

She longed, with a feverish longing, for the interview to end. She felt helpless before him, and unlike her usual self; and this feeling made her angry with herself and him.

When at last he left her, she flung herself into a chair and buried her face in her hands.

"What have I done? But I could not help it. As I cannot marry Lord Dunlop nor—nor Jack, it may as well be Philip as any other man. I could not wait, both Lady Kitty and Jack must hear of my engagement at once. Philip will always let me have my own way and that is the great thing."

It is nearly two years since the day Enid consented to be Colonel Dewey's wife.

Those two years had not passed well with her; her life, wedded to the man she had never loved, seemed hateful to her. She had deeply repented her rash act, but regret did not soften her towards the man she had so cruelly wronged; it gave her a cold dislike towards him, and everything he did irritated and bored her beyond bounds.

Philip still loved his beautiful young wife, but his love was patient and quiet, reposing infinite trust in her; he could not understand her restless character, judged by his own, restful, slow one.

To escape from the dumb pleading of her husband's love, to escape from those trusting eyes, she often left him for weeks together to visit friends.

He never accompanied her. She had once given a hint that she did not want him; he accepted the hint and stayed at home. People said it was this quiet acceptance of facts that was so bad for his wife. Perhaps such was the case. Perhaps he should have gone with her or bidden her stay at home. But he did neither; with a loving, quiet smile, he bade her go and enjoy herself.

How she did enjoy herself, she took care he should not know.

One sunny afternoon Enid was pacing the beautiful lawns of "The Hall," with her little six months' old baby in her arms.

The child had been ill, and had but recently left death's door. During that time the mother's heart had stirred to new emotions. A great passion awoke within her.

For the first time since her childhood she had fallen on her knees. She prayed God to spare the little life. She saw in her child a means whereby she might rise to better things. She felt that through her child she might fling off her old, wild, restless life, and be led by baby hands through happy peaceful paths.

God heard her prayer and the child lived. From that day she seemed a softened being, gentle and tender even towards her husband. As she now paced the garden she sang a soft lullaby until the little one fell into a sweet sleep; then, with a happy sigh, she settled herself in an easy chair, holding her baby tenderly to her.

She looked at the sweet face which death had so nearly snatched from her, and a wave of love swept over her.

"My baby!" she murmured. "I never thought I had such love in me. My little Dulcie, be mother's guardian angel; with these tiny hands keep mother back from her thoughtless ways."

Then, with a sob, she strained the child passionately to her.

"Oh, my baby! if you could see your mother as she really is, my baby, how you would despise her! Baby! that shall not be. Mother will live so that her child shall see, and not suffer. Baby! I will walk with you through life afresh."

Colonel Dewey came towards them. She turned to him, and held out her hand. There shone a light within her eyes he had but lately seen there.

"Come and look at baby," she said.

Something in her softened voice, in her eyes, made him exclaim, "My darling, tell me you love me?"

The words broke from him ere he knew he had said them.

Enid looked at him and saw the same deep love that was there on their wedding day, and, for the first time since then, she longed to answer him as he wished.

And why not? Surely she was beginning to love this tender, true husband! She looked at her baby, was he not the father of her child? Yes, she was sure, at last, the love for him was growing.

She unconsciously pressed the child closer to her, she felt so happy.

Then she said in a low voice, with eyes bent upon the little sleeping face, "Philip, you know I love you."

"And, Enid, are you happy, dear?"

"Yes, so happy," she pressed her cheek to that of her baby; then she added almost passionately; "Philip, help me to be a better woman. Never take your love from me. If we are ever in sorrow, let our love for one another compensate for all."

Never had she felt such joy of living as now, with the sweet sunshine around her, and her baby in her arms.

Then came a fearful day; early one morning their child was suddenly taken from them. All that day

Enid lay in a stupor, holding the child in her arms and caressing its cheek. When at last it dawned upon her that this cold, stiff form was her little daughter, she recoiled from it, uttering low moans of anguish and despair.

When she left her child, her husband came to meet her. His words of love and comfort were checked as he gazed upon her face. Her eyes shone with a strange, cold light, her lips were tightly drawn in one hard line.

He put his hand upon her shoulder, he tried to soften those cruelly cold eyes.

"Enid, let me try and comfort you. Remember your own words, 'If we are ever in sorrow let our love compensate for all.'"

She broke into a harsh, bitter laugh.

"Then, I did not know what sorrow was," she said.

"But, dear, you knew what love was," and his voice was melting with tenderness. "You know that it can heal all."

She answered coldly, "I lied to you. It was not love for you I felt, but love for my child, who now lies dead. God has been cruel and merciless. Why did He let me taste such happiness only to take it from me? He showed no pity, and I will show neither mercy nor pity to any one."

Her husband put his arms around her, the tears were in his eyes.

"My wife," he said huskily, "you are wild with pain and do not know what you say. Hush, Enid, for my sake."

She broke from him.

"I will have no pity, no love, since the only thing that made my life happy is denied me. Go from me," she cried, "I wish to be alone."

Her words struck deeply through his heart, and left it slowly bleeding. With eyes full of pain, he turned and left her.

For months Enid remained in a wild state of grief, shutting herself away from her husband, leading a solitary, miserable life.

The months grew into years; another child was given to her, this time a son.

No sign of love shone in her eyes when they brought her baby to her. She turned from it hastily. "Take it away," she cried, "Lest I learn to love it, and then it will die. I will never love again."

And so the baby grew into a little grave-eyed child, hungering for his mother's love. As time passed slowly by, Enid felt a vague uneasiness filling her heart. Her husband's love for her seemed to have died, and a stolid, cold indifference reigned in its stead.

Her son, Roy, had her little daughter's eyes, and, from them, always seemed to shine, for her, a dumb, pathetic pleading that stirred her heart with strange emotions. A vague unrest entered that heart which, at her baby's death, had turned to stone. Now she felt an undefined craving for she knew not what.

When love would have entered once more into her life she thrust it, trembling, from her. But sometimes she felt a longing to hold her boy in her arms, and satisfy his hungering gaze.

One night she dreamt a dream. Her boy was calling her with outstretched arms; she hastened to him, and folded him in a passionate embrace, all the pent-up love rushing out in mighty strength. She put him from her in order to gaze upon the little face, when her blood ran cold within her. The child was dead; she had crushed the life from out him, in that one long embrace.

She awoke with a cry on her lips, and a great fear at her heart.

During the remainder of that night she lay awake, her brain on fire with many thoughts. She found herself repeating words until their meaning had ceased to strike her.

"My boy, I must not love you, it will be your death. I cannot, dare not, love you," she said to herself over and over again. When the dawn began to break she had come to a firm resolve to go away and drown her uneasiness of heart in social pleasure.

"I am getting morbid," she reasoned with herself, "I am getting even careless of my beauty."

That morning, as she was arranging the flowers in the breakfast-room, she said to her husband:

"Philip! I think I will go and pay a visit to the Chasemore's."

Philip continued to read his morning paper; he did not answer her.

She turned slightly to him. "Philip, did you hear?"

"You are going to the Chasemore's," he said in a tone of indifference.

She knew his disapproval of her friends, and had expected him to protest against her going. She felt a longing to bring a little life into his voice, even if it should be anger.

"Philip," she said slowly, and with emphasis, "I always have great fun at the Chasemore's." She looked at him significantly, but he was not looking at her.

She turned away, hurt and vexed; angry words sprang to her lips, but she checked them. She was holding in her hand a little china dog she had once given to her baby girl. It recalled those happy days. She suddenly wished her husband would ask her not to go; the "fun" at the Chasemore's seemed to fade away.

"Philip," she said, and there were tears in her eyes. "Shall I go, or would you rather that I stayed?"

Philip did not see those tears, he rose, and stood looking out of the window.

His pride was struggling with his love. She herself had proposed to stay and he longed to ask her to remain. Yet how often had she been on the point of yielding to some wish of his, only to suddenly turn coldly from him? How often had his words of love been withered upon his lips? Pride forbade him to trust again to her waywardness. He stifled his desire to go to her and bid her stay; and his voice rang out cold, and seemingly indifferent:

"Go by all means, it is best that you should sometimes have a little fun." And so she went.

On the evening of Enid's arrival at Chasemore Hall, a ball was given. She had nearly danced the evening through when, feeling strangely tired, she escaped from the hot crowded rooms into the fresh night air. As she was strolling in the garden she saw, coming towards her, the figure of a man; as he came nearer she felt a strange quickening of her heart, the figure seemed familiar. It was Jack Graham.

He came to her with outstretched hand, a glad smile upon his lips. She saw the look in his eyes and turned away. She did not hear him murmur to himself, "Now is the time of my revenge." She only heard him call her name in a low voice, "Enid!" Then, he continued abruptly, "I have just discovered that Lady Dunlop is not you. Is it true that you are Dewey's wife?"

"I am Colonel Dewey's wife," she answered. "I discovered, just in time, that I did not care enough for Lord Dunlop to be his wife."

Jack Graham had only returned from South Africa a few months; during that period he had lost no time in discovering what had become of Enid. Having heard she was, at the present time, at the Chasemore's, he determined to follow her thither, not from any feeling of love—that had left him long ago—but from a keen desire to punish her for her treatment of him years ago.

After that evening, Jack Graham and Mrs. Dewey were to be seen always together. Some said it was scandalous, but these were only recent friends of the Chasemore's, and they were told, "It is nothing; it is merely Mrs. Dewey's way."

Weeks had slipped into months, and each day had been spent in Jack's company, until her heart was filled with feverish unrest. One day the crisis came, he had pleaded with such earnestness that it seemed as though she were to be carried away.

"Come," he concluded, "trust yourself to me for ever, and you will never regret it."

His eyes were turned from hers, and she did not see their evil look, nor hear his muttered whisper, "In the end the woman suffers. This is my revenge."

Unconsciously she put her hand to her heart; her breath came in gasps.

"Let me think one moment. Give me time, give me time."

Suddenly a footstep was heard approaching.

Jack started to his feet.

A telegram was brought to Enid; she opened it and read: "Do not return home; Roy has scarlet fever."

She stood staring at the piece of paper. Jack strode to her side and read the news.

He took her hand in his, "Fortune favours us," he said abruptly. "Now—"

But she interrupted him with a fierce gesture; she put her hand to her forehead and sank into a chair.

So it was to be the same thing with this other child. She had dreaded to let herself love her boy for fear that he might be taken away from her, and yet, perhaps, after all, he was going to die.

Now, against all reasoning, she felt a mighty longing to give her boy her love, reckless of all consequences. Now her one thought was that he was needing her.

"Go, leave me!" she cried huskily.

"Enid! You do not mean to let this make any difference! You know you do not care for the child."

She rose and drew herself to her full height.

"You do not know me," she said. "Neither did I know myself. Oh, baby! I have tried to starve myself from your love, and now my heart is crying out against it. Oh, baby! What have you not saved me from? Jack, I will go to my boy, and, oh! if you have any pity, forget what has happened between us, forget what we have said to-day."

"How can I forget?" he said angrily. "Forget, indeed, when you have let me—"

She interrupted him hastily; "Oh, I know, I know; but I am not wholly bad, though, to others, it must seem so. You do not really love me, it is but a mad fancy, and again, I intreat you to forget. I was in a wild dream; I was unhappy, and I wished to drown my thoughts in excitement. Jack! remember I am a mother—and forget me."

"You should have thought of that before," he said coldly.

He was angry, but looking at her face, he could see how remorse had already laid its terrible finger upon her. He saw the pleading in her eyes, and he felt pity for her suffering.

"Enid," he said slowly, "I will forget."

* * * *

"Why did you come?" said Colonel Dewey. "You can do no good, and will only run the risk yourself."

Enid turned on him fiercely.

"Why did you not send for me? How dared you keep me from my child?"

"You said you disliked him," answered her husband slowly, "and I thought you would never forgive me if I brought you in the midst of scarlet fever."

She looked at him in silence, and something in her gaze made him take a step nearer to her. He put his hand upon her shoulder.

"Enid, do you really care so much, dear?"

There was a pleading in his eyes; a note of his old love for her had crept back unawares into his voice, the sight of her suffering had called it there. The tears were running down her face.

"Philip! We cannot lose this one, too. My heart has never healed from that great blow, and God cannot be so cruel as to take my boy from me; he is all we have; he must not die. Oh, Philip! I have been hungering for this love, but I feared to love him. My heart was bitter, and I thought to drown my unhappiness in excitement, so I went away. Yet if I had known he really wanted me, I would have stayed. Philip, take me to him."

When she saw the tiny wasted face of her child her heart contracted painfully. She met his brilliant restless eyes and knelt down beside him.

"Mother has come," she said softly. "Mother is here."

She put her hand upon the burning forehead. At her touch the fever-stricken eyes remained still, a smile played round the little mouth. Only for one instant, then, once more the little body was tossing to and fro in restless movements. Enid tried to soothe him, tried once again to recall that smile, but he did not heed her. He was separated from her by the awful gulf of unconsciousness. She turned blindly to her husband.

"Philip," she said piteously, her voice breaking with tears, "help me to bear it."

He went to her and put his arms around her, and, in silence, they watched the struggles of their child.

Together, thus, they looked for the critical moment when the fever would leave its victim.

The child recovered, and was given back to the mother's aching heart.

Night and day Enid watched over her boy with humble, joyous gratitude. Her soul was filled to overflowing, with a great, solemn peace.

Not only was her child restored to her, but, now best of all to her, durng those long, long, weary days and weeks of watching she had learnt to love her husband; learnt to give him what she once thought she could never give. Her heart was full of deep, full happiness.

Philip's love for her had never died, it now met hers in a great flood of tenderness.

"Enid! Say 'I love you, Philip!' and, this time, look deep into my eyes."

She lifted her face to his, and, with eyes full of love and reverence, put her arms around his neck, saying: "My Philip! I love you so; I love you so!"

The Lovers' Leap.

WHITE ELK the son of Standing Bear, the Shoshone chieftian, sat stolidly in the grim circle of Indians that sat round the council fire. He sat unmoved as each Indian in turn thrust his hand forward with the fingers outspread and the thumb pointing downward.

The last Indian in the circle had made the sign. Standing Bear rose and stood stiff and stern in the red light of the burning embers. Every eye was upon him. White Elk sat looking stolidly at him through half-closed eyelids. Standing Bear thrust his arm out at full length and slowly spread his fingers apart and turned his thumb towards the earth. A scream came from a group of women standing near the chief's lodge. Then two old squaws led away a young Indian woman who still sobbed in spite of the storied stoicism of her race.

The sentence of death had been passed on White Elk. He slowly rose as his father turned towards him and extended a piece of black wampum. He took it and tucked it in his girdle, bowed slowly to the council, and strode away to his own tepee, where he sat calmly puffing at his pipe long after the council had broken up and its members had gone quietly to their lodges.

White Elk sat alone in the silence of the night listening to the rushing waters of the Popoagie. It was the voice of his executioner. Three days more and he was to be cast from a high rock into the "Place of Punishment," the deep hole in the mountains, which swallowed up the rushing Popoagie, and carried it somewhere deep down into the bowels of the earth. Into this place White Elk was to be thrown because the Shoshones believed that the person who disappeared into the depths along with the roaring waters of the Popoagie, died a death more dreadful than any other that could be meted out to him. Because the Popoagie drew its victims so deeply down into the dark regions under the earth that the soul could never escape and find its way to the happy hunting ground of the tribe.

White Elk was not afraid to die. He had met death face to face a dozen times, and had not trembled. He had fought with the Blackfeet and the Sioux, and led his warriors to victory on many a hard fought field. He had fought hand to hand with the murderous Apaches, and never knew what it was to be afraid. But in spite of his seeming indifference, he shivered as he heard the fierce roar of the Popoagie tumbling riotously over the rocks and leaping down the precipice to disappear in the dark depths below.

He pictured his soul fighting with the angry water to regain the upper air, that it might ascend to the happy hunting ground in the clouds. But he knew the Popoagie would triumph. He was certain that no soul could defeat the malevolent spirit of the Popoagie.

White Elk could regard death with equanimity, but he could not bear the thought of an eternity spent battling with the spirit of the waters while Laughing Eyes waited for him in vain in the happy hunting ground. White Elk's head dropped forward and he groaned. He heard a sound behind him and sprang to his feet. Laughing Eyes stood beside him in the moonlight. She motioned him with her hand and he followed her out to the cliff overlooking the deep crevice, down which the Popoagie lost itself. On the cliff the two sat in the moonlight.

"You must not give yourself to the spirit of the Popoagie," said the girl. "You can go away. I will go with you. The Blackfeet have been your enemies but they love you, for you are a mighty warrior. To them you can go and they will make you a chief, and I will go with you."

White Elk sat silent. Then he spoke: "I must die, because I did not put to death Nazalla, the Blackfeet chief. I had my spear at his throat. I might have killed him. But years ago Nazalla spared my life when as a boy I was hunting alone in the forest. He gave me food and water and showed me the way back to my own people. I could not kill him as he lay wounded. But the Shoshones fear Nazalla. They think that with him dead the Blackfeet would never more triumph in battle. It is true. But I could not kill him. I would rather die and disappear into the under darkness forever."

The girl fell on her knees and intreated him. White Elk softly stroked her hair. But he only shook his head in reply to her intreaties. Long the two sat there. Then they arose and walked back to the village, and White Elk left Laughing Eyes at the door of her father's lodge.

Three days passed away, and the next morning just before sunrise all the Shoshones were gathered in view of the great rock that lifted itself above the deep sink hole of the Popoagie. The medicine men of the tribe swaying their bodies chanted a death hymn.

As the first rays of the sun shone down the valley and rested redly upon the little group on the rock, White Elk stepped forward with a strong young Indian on either side. He turned and looked keenly back at the group of women who stood about Laughing Eyes. He gave a sign and the two young Indians rested their hands on his shoulder. White Elk stood with his face lifted up for a moment to the clouds.

He cast his eyes around and took a last look at the woods and at his people standing grim and silent in the clefts of the rocks. Then he sprang forward and shot straight downward from the top of the cliff. His body turned half over in the air. Then it struck with a splash in the roaring water and was drawn downward and disappeared forever in the cavernous depths of the "place of punishment."

The Indians stood looking downwards where the form of the young chief had disappeared. Then there was a cry and all looked again towards the top of the rock just as they saw Laughing Eyes hurl herself headlong downward towards the rushing water. She sank from sight, and her body, too, was drawn downward to the depths. White Elk's soul would not have to escape the spirit of Popoagie to meet that of Laughing Eyes.

A Bile Bean Miracle.

SWOONED AFTER WALKING FIVE MINUTES; BUT CAN NOW WALK TEN MILES.

ANÆMIA AND HEART TROUBLE CURED.

CHARLES FORDE'S Bile Beans for Biliousness have just worked a cure which is locally regarded as miraculous, at Woburn Sands, amidst the most charming scenery in Bedfordshire. The subject is Miss Ellen Cooke, a domestic servant, of Inwood's Cottages; and to a Bedfordshire Express reporter she said: "It is now quite 11 years since I began to be ill. I suffered from anæmia with all its accompanying weaknesses. As time went on my condition grew worse. I had no colour and endured most severe pain. The climax appeared to be reached about four years ago when I was taken very ill indeed. I was told that I also suffered from ulcerated stomach and chronic indigestion. I had palpitation, which made me afraid of overtaxing myself in the least. As far as I dared I continued to attend to my duties; and the result was that I became utterly prostrated, and had to remain lying down and perfectly quiet until I could recover. On one occasion I set out to reach a place five minutes' walk away, but I was so very weak that I swooned before I got there. Even slow walking made me exhausted and faint. For six weeks I was too weak to live on anything but milk food. Several times I went in for different medicines, but all efforts to bring about a cure were perfectly futile, until one day I happened to read in the weekly paper how a similarly extreme case had been cured by Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. My father strongly advised me to give them a trial; and I consented. I had not been taking the Beans long before I felt that I was benefiting. My appetite improved day by day; and the food was digested without giving me any trouble such as I used to have. My spirits brightened, my strength increased, and life seemed to open out new promises of joy. Thanks entirely to Charles Forde's Bile Beans, I am now thoroughly recovered. I have neither the sickly look nor feeling I had before; and my appetite is quite satisfactory. The palpitation, ulcerated stomach, and chronic indigestion are complete strangers to me; and I never experience the 'fagged' feeling I used to do. Only the other day I walked ten miles; and neither then nor since have I experienced the least discomfort or sign of weariness."

Miss Cooke's parents fully bore out her statement, and said they had despaired of her ever being restored to health.

More conclusive testimony to the wonderful powers of Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness could not be desired. They are the "World's Greatest Specific" for anæmia in its worst forms, summer-end fag, chronic indigestion, palpitation, ulcerated stomach, and debility; while they are also unsurpassed for headache, dizziness, pains in the chest, side, and back, constipation, piles, pimples, face sores, blood impurities, liver and kidney disorders, female ailments, nausea, and fulness after meals. Obtainable from all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 and 120 London Wall, London, E.C., for price 1s. 1½d. or 2s. 9d. (2s. 9d. box contains 3 times 1s. 1½d).

Short Stories That . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 20th. Post-cards only, please.

Easily Done.

JACK: "Maud wants to know why you shun her company now." Tom: "Well, the fact is, I'm hard up." Jack: "I'll tell her, and you needn't shun her any more." Tom (brightening up): "By Jove, do you think so?" Jack: "Yes. She'll shun you."

Bobby Knew His Name.

"MAMMA, I know the gentleman's name that called to see Aunt Ellie last night, and nobody told me either." "Well, then, what is it, Bobby?" "Why, George Dont. I heard her say 'George, don't!' in the parlour four or five times running. That's what his name is."

It was Necessary.

"MY friend," he said to the hotel manager, "I'm a very nervous man. Couldn't you give me a room with a fire-escape in it? You've got one, haven't you?" "Oh, yes," replied the manager. "And I might remark that, except in case of fire we keep the bulldog chained at the bottom of it." And the weary stranger sighed and sauntered forth.

He Hadn't a Chance.

JENKINS: "Well, sir, I gave it to that man straight, I can tell you, sir. He is twice as big as I am, too, but I told him exactly what I thought of his rascally conduct right to his face, and I called him all the names in the dictionary." Spudds: "And didn't he try to hit you, Jenkins?" Jenkins: "No, sir, he didn't. And when he tried to answer back I just hung up the telephone and walked away."

What Could Have Upset Her?

"I DON'T believe in feeding beggars at the door," said Mrs. Will. "You feed them once and they are sure to come back." "Well, I don't know," replied Mrs. Yeast. "I always give them bread when they come to my door, and I can't say that I ever knew a beggar to come the second time." "Oh, well, Mrs. Yeast, you make your own bread, do you not?" That was all she said, and yet Mrs. Yeast went down the street like a straw hat on a windy day.

He was All Right.

AN unfortunate fellow who had worked in a Lancashire cotton mill went out of his mind and was removed to an asylum. A fellow-worker, who chanced to be passing the asylum a few months after the man's removal, saw Jimmy sitting in the grounds smoking his clay pipe. "Hullo! Jimmy," he called out, "how are ta gettin' on?" "Oh, Ah'm gooin' on fust-rate," answered Jimmy. "Ah'm very glad to hear it, lad. Tha'll happen be gettin' back to work, sooin. What's ta think?" "What?" exclaimed Jimmy in huge surprise. "Live in a big house an' a grand garden like this, and go back to wark? Does ta think Ah'm wrang in mi yed?"

Drew the Line.

THE lion was at no pains to conceal his irritation. "I must insist," he finally declared, "upon knowing what that affair is which you are pointing at me." The hunter trembled violently. "It is a gun, sir," he faltered. The lion frowned. "Very well," said he, "but if I ever find it is a camera I shall hold you personally responsible."

The Way of Women.

THE MAID: "Mrs. Brown-Jones, ma'am." The Mistress: "Oh, such a bore! Tell her I am out. Janet." The Maid: "Yes'm." The Mistress: "But stay. What kind of a dress is she wearing?" The Maid: "A new one, ma'am; and it looks just like a late Parisian style." The Mistress: "Gracious! Tell her I'll be down without a moment's delay."

Couldn't Help her Hands.

HUSBAND: "The new cook makes everything too salt. It's terrible." Wife: "Well, she can't help that, poor thing. It isn't her fault that her hands are big." Husband: "What earthly difference can that make?" Wife: "That shows how much you know about housekeeping. The cookery books always measure salt by the pinch."

Not Good Enough.

SERGEANT (to private returned from South Africa): "Come now, fall in to be mustered. Don't you know this is the day for the commanding-officer's muster parade?" Private (in undertone): "Well, well, isn't it bad enough to have just returned from being 'peppered' by the Boers without having to be mustered by the commanding-officer?"

Lizzie's Great Trouble.

"MAGGIE, I am in great trouble. I am engaged to two young men at the same time, and the wedding day is set for both on the same date." "Well, Lizzie, which is the best?" "I don't know. Henry is a banker's son and Arthur is a reporter." "Well, goodness gracious, be sensible and take Arthur. He can describe the wedding in his paper."

How he Won the Bet.

A GENTLEMAN made a bet with a friend in a well-known West End club that he could not satisfy a cabman. "Done," said his friend, and the money was staked. They came out of the club, hailed a passing cab, rode a short distance, got out of the cab, and gave the driver a sovereign. The driver looked first at the sovereign, then at the gentleman, and said, "It's a long time since I had a 'quid,' sir; you might give me twopence for a drink to save changing it."

Insult to Injury.

A PARTY of amateurs some time ago arranged for a shoot, and ordered thirty pigeons from a dealer in a neighbouring town. The shooting was of a really wonderful character, but the actual performances need not be described in detail. The net results will be gathered readily from the following note which was subsequently received from the dealer. It ran: "Gentlemen, I beg sincerely to thank you for your order, and to intimate that I shall be only too happy to supply you with any number of birds on future occasions of the sort. The whole of the thirty birds, for which you paid me at the rate of eightpence per head, returned home in safety, and, moreover, brought with them a stray pigeon. My price to your party henceforth will be three-halfpence per bird."

With a "Health and Strength"

WRIST MACHINE

Physicians and Athletes have generally concurred that the wrist is the weakest portion of the human frame. It is the portion of the anatomy where strength is measured.

A person with weak wrists is a weak person constitutionally. When the wrists are strengthened the entire muscular system is made stronger.

There is no point in a man's anatomy where lack of strength is felt so much as in the wrist, nor where great strength is so useful, often seriously, affecting his bread-winning power. With a systematic use of this machine only ten minutes twice a day you can double the strength of your hand in one month, and increase the size of your forearm very materially.

Purchasing and using a pair of Wrist Machines—one in each hand—saves half the time occupied in exercising both hands with one machine, and also ensures a more equal development of strength in the two hands.

THE MOST ASTOUNDING WORK OF MODERN TIMES.

EVERY year thousands of new books are published. They are read and forgotten. But once in a hundred years a new book appears which THE WORLD IS WAITING FOR. It contains some new truth which alters the history of mankind. Such a book has been issued, and is pronounced by the Press to be the MOST REMARKABLE WORK OF THE CENTURY. You will read it. If not to day, then some other day, for sooner or later it will be read by all men and all women. The writer of the book is Professor Boyd Laynard, who is now recognised as the greatest living authority on personal hygiene. The name of the book is "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE." Its sale is rapidly approaching copies.

The publishers have issued a popular edition, at a price within the reach of all, so that the book may find a place in every home. The work is arranged in 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of SHORT STORIES, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Among the numerous subjects dealt with, the following are but few. A complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 CHAPTERS, enumerating upwards of 500 SUBJECTS and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers:—

A New Feature.

In Confidence.

Conducted by Madge Morris.

THE following are replies to some of the many letters which I had received before the Editor of this paper agreed to devote a page to my correspondence each week. All communications must be sent to me personally at the offices of this paper.—MADGE MORRIS.

"Stephanie."—You have placed yourself in an awkward position. You are engaged to a man to whom you are deeply attached, and the spirit of mischief suggested that you should test the affections of your lover by walking out with someone else and allowing your lover to see you. He is too much of a gentleman to ask for an explanation in public, but he writes to you—a very nice letter, judging by the copy you have sent—and asks you to explain. Your answer is a reproach that he cannot trust you, and he accordingly ceases his visits. Now you see what you have done, and you ask me to advise you how to rectify matters. You must tell him plainly what you did, and ask forgiveness for an act for which you are now heartily sorry. If you write as you should, I have not the least doubt he will be ready to forgive. His letter shows him to be every inch a man.

"Maidie" puts the following question: "Should a young woman marry an old man?" She then proceeds to tell me that she is twenty and has had an offer of marriage from a man of forty-three, which she is disposed to accept. She believes she would be happy with him. As a rule, I think it unadvisable to marry when the ages are so different; in the earlier years of the married life the disparity is not perhaps so noticeable; but as the time rolls on, the one gets old while the other is still in the prime of life. And then, very often, unhappiness begins. Still, I have known two cases similar to yours, and in each instance the man and wife have been thoroughly happy. One of these husbands is now nearly seventy, and I know that the wife of forty-five has been, and is, as happy as anyone can wish to be. Other conditions being favourable, "Maidie," I see no objection.

No, "Queenie," it is not possible for you to love two young men with equal affection. Either you love one better than the other, or you really are not in love with either—you merely have a liking for them. Put yourself to the test. Try to imagine that one of them has proposed and you have accepted him; think over his character generally; then ask yourself whether you would like to spend your life with him. If you do this with all seriousness—as you would do before accepting an offer of marriage—you will not be long in discovering the true state of your feelings.

Your conduct, "Claude," is very foolish; I will not use any harder expression. You are dearly in love with a girl who, you believe, would make you an excellent wife. She is domesticated and loving, but she has not had the opportunity of educating herself to a great extent. She is doing her best to remedy this defect, and your friends tell you that your choice is a good one. But you are afraid of what your fellow-clerks might say, so you propose to break off the engagement. Perhaps you will see how unmanly and foolish your conduct is when you read it in black and white. Trust to your mother's instinct; she, who has your welfare at heart, advises you to marry the young woman, and a mother's love makes her far-sighted.

Yes, "In Doubt," I advise you to tell your lover that you were engaged two years ago to another. In the first place, if you really love him, it will come quite naturally to you to wish to tell him everything, and apart from this, he is sure to hear of it sooner or later, from someone else. To be perfectly open with those we love is the only way to insure a happy life with them.

"Troubled One."—Your dearest friend is indeed not worthy the name of a friend. I must say you were indiscreet to confide in her your love of a man you had never spoken to. Nineteen is very young; and you will most probably meet someone who suits you far better than this man. I should let it stand as it is. To write and explain to any man that you are "passionately in love" with him, would only be to place you in a very awkward position, and as things stand you surely can carry it off as a joke. No nice-minded girl would care to be thought pushing or forward.

"Irish Lass."—I am sorry to hear that you and your young man have quarrelled over the photo of another man, and I must say that quarrelling over so trivial a matter speaks badly for you both. Remember a breach is very easy to make, and very difficult to heal. I should either see him or write to him, and tell him you are lonely and miserable, and, if he really cares for you, he will be glad enough to be friends again.

PETTINGILL'S HUNT.

JIM PETTINGILL, who is a stout man, went home to his wife the other evening and asked her where she kept the key of his gladstone, as he wished to pack up a few things and take the night train for Glasgow to look after some important business matters.

Mrs. Pettingill told him to go upstairs to her room and he would find the key in the pocket of her black dress, which was hanging on a nail behind the door.

Poor, foolish mortal, he did not know that it was easier for the eye of a rich man to crawl through a camel than for his miserable self to find the pocket of his wife's dress.

Blinded by his own confidence, he took the dress off the nail, and that moment his sufferings commenced. He took a short survey of the garment as he held it up in his left hand in order to locate the position of the pocket.

His eyes rested on a small opening, and he thrust his hand into it, only to find his fingers gliding through a kind of bottomless concern, and then sticking his arm into it to the hilt he observed that his hand was protruding from an aperture on the other side. This caused him to change the position of the dress, and he saw another opening, and sounded its depths, and ascertained that it was the same mysterious hole he had been in a moment before.

This slightly annoyed him, and, after throwing off his coat, he went again in search of the pocket. He saw a little slit on the other side, and a softer light came into his eyes. "This is it," he murmured, and, putting his head into a shallow flounce, commenced to grope for the key, which, however, was sleeping snugly in the pocket at least two feet away. Pettingill got angry. He determined to find the pocket or die with his face to the foe, and the next minute he commenced stabbing the dress with both hands, hitting it straight blows from the shoulder, and dancing round it, just as if he were engaged in a rough-and-tumble fight.

He glanced at the clock, and saw that the train would start in forty minutes, and once more he jumped for the dress with a low yell that indicated plainly that he was angry enough to match himself against a hornet. He jammed his head into the folds of the dress, and commenced digging with both hands, and the air got full of satin bows, pieces of Watteau pleats and smothered growls.

While seated in a chair resting himself, he glared at the crumpled dress lying on the floor, and the idea occurred to him that the only way to keep the pocket from dodging him was to put the dress on. He did so, and then renewed his search, but his hands would slide into loops, furbelows, folds, flounces, and everything else except the much-desired pocket.

This was more than he could stand, and he determined to take off the dress and tear it to pieces, and thus discover the dwelling-place of the pocket. He pulled the dress up over his head as if he was divesting himself of a shirt, and it got caught in his braces and wrapped itself round his neck in a peculiar way, and he stooped forward and tugged at it with all his strength, but it would not give an inch, and appeared to tighten its grip round his head.

It was hot, and he was smothering in its folds, and, in order to release himself, he beat the air with both hands and danced up and down in one spot until the window-panes rattled.

The dress, however, knew that it was getting the better of him, and would not let him go, and then Pettingill, in his rage, made a blind dash and butted the basin and jug off the washstand and upset the rocking-chair, which prodded him severely in the ribs. The next dive he made the dressing-table suffer, and cologne bottles and powder boxes, mingling with a tin bath-tub and a bird-cage, rolled over the floor.

Mrs. Pettingill heard the crash, and hastening upstairs, discovered her husband lying on the floor on his back, with his arms and head bound up in her dress, and kicking both his legs in the air and using profanity to the tune of 140 degrees in the shade. She pulled him out of the dress, and he sat up on the floor and gazed at her in a dazed way, and rubbed his ribs with one hand, and wiped the blood off his nose with the other.

There was a look in his eyes which told Mrs. Pettingill that it was not the time to talk to her husband, so she merely picked up the dress, and without any trouble at all stuck her hand in a certain place and took out the key, which she handed him without saying a word. It was too late to catch the train, so Pettingill quietly bathed his bruised head and then went to a locksmith's, and when he came home he brought his key with him, but it was chained to a bar of pig-iron.

The Lady of the Island.

CHAPTER I.

A Singular Predicament.

"EXCUSE me, sir, but what might your name be? You'll pardon my asking, but you see it's this way—you're the only passenger by the eight-forty left on the platform, and mine's the only private conveyance left in the lane. So, as I was to meet a gentleman from London, I thought perhaps——"

The inquirer hesitated. He was a sturdy, cheerful fellow, in a blue livery and black top boots, with buff bands to them. In his deferential tones there was the suspicion of an Irish accent; its insinuating music disarmed the person whom he had addressed, and whose glance had rested almost irritably upon him. Both had been lingering near the exit of the small country station for a long five minutes.

"I am Robert Causton," was the answer, "and I am bound for Swart Island, to Mrs. Valentine Tennant's place there. I understood that a dog-cart was to meet the express."

"Dear, dear, sir," responded the other, "it's a turble mix, to be sure, for the dog-cart cast a tyre, and I brought the phæton instead. And it was an elderly gentleman I had to fetch, and you're what—saving your presence, sir—many of us'd give a deal to be once more; that's about seven-and-twenty, sir."

"I come in my father's place," said Causton, briefly. "I have just this kit-bag," he added, "and I telegraphed that I would be with Mrs. Tennant at nine o'clock."

"Quite so, sir," assented the Irishman, taking the article in question, "and you'll be meaning it's nigh that now. But you couldn't have done it at the best, for the drive to the Island'll cost fifteen minutes, and the train was late. However, sir, I'll do my utmost with the cattle, and they're not bad bits of blood, either."

He piloted the visitor out of the white-painted wicket that opened from the platform, and slung his burden into the rumble of a tall phæton that was harnessed to a pair of gaunt but powerful bays, held by a lounger. A moment afterwards the vehicle was spinning down the soft macadam road, between thick and dewy hedges, in the direction of the sea, which lay athwart its extremity like a pale-grey ribbon. The evening had descended, but the autumn air was clear and mild.

"How is Mrs. Tennant?" queried Robert Causton, rousing from a thoughtful contemplation of the quiet prospect.

"Worse, sir," he was told—and the driver whipped up his horses, lending an unconscious emphasis to his report—"she's failing fast. Not but what they're keeping it from Miss Delia, poor child."

The Irishman steadied the bays as they crossed a strip of wild fore-shore, gained the sandy flats of the beach, and turned to the obscure and purple horizon.

All rights reserved.]

When they had settled into their stride again, he glanced at the clean-shaven, impassive face beside him. It expressed no surprise.

"The Island lays off round the head yonder," he vouchsafed; "we can manage a couple of journeys betwixt tides, if we start with the water to the beasts' fetlocks. I've got back with it to their knees, sir."

He chirrupped encouragingly, and the pair started into a quick trot, notwithstanding the heavy nature of the substance upon which they had been guided, and the twinkling lights of the coast began rapidly to diminish. Soon the phæton escaped from the eclipsing bulk of the great promontory on the left, and a yellow point appeared in front, low, steady, yet far-off."

"That's the Island, sir," explained his cicerone; "but it's tricky going hereabout, we daren't run a straight course on account of the quicksands."

Causton shaded his brows and peered into the dusk. Lawyer as he was, the singularity of his surroundings stirred in him an unusual instinct of romance—the distant sigh of the ocean, the glimmer of an occasional star in the sky flooded with the silver radiance of the risen moon, the fresh salt breath that blew upon his stalwart figure—set him wondering if he were the victim of some fantastic dream, or whether his prosaic office in Lincoln's Inn Fields—yes, even the Fields themselves and the noisy, fretful metropolis about them—were not rather the dream, and this dim world of peace and invigorating breezes the reality.

The Irishman broke into his reverie. "The tide's making turble hasty," he said; "hark to that!"

"That" was the splash of the horses' hoofs in the thin sheet of water which had crept up over the wide, level shore. The luminous point on the Island had apparently swung through an arc of ninety degrees, making the change in the route followed by the phæton, and now gleamed well to their right. The moon had been clouded over unnoticed, and the carriage-lamps threw a twin-halo on the rippling expanse of shallow sea.

A lash at the bays sent them flying forward, swerving as if to reach more directly the faint index of their destination. A hundred yards they went, and then the off-horse plunged and reared, sending a shower of scattered brine into the phæton.

"St. Patrick!" muttered the driver, "we've come too westerly, the beasts are off the ridge, there's two foot under us, sir, we'll have to dodge back a bit."

The creatures answered the reins readily enough, but the tide was flowing on every hand; the horse that had so narrowly escaped a fall jibbed, shivered noisily, and screamed—a shrill and tremulous cry of fear. Its companion shied and hung against the pole; the phæton halted in the waste of water.

"Can ye swim, sir?" observed the Irishman coolly.

Robert Causton assented.

"Then I'm thinking you'll have to get the rest of the way yourself," he was informed. "I'll stop with the horses, sir, it's not Michael Dowd as would leave the poor brutes he's steered to their death. I'm a clumsy fool, I am, and I'll do my penance for it."

"Nonsense!" retorted the young lawyer, making ready to leave the phæton; "besides, you must guide me ashore."

"Make for the beacon, sir," said Michael Dowd obstinately; "the beach is gravel and no rocks foreninst the light. Give my service to Miss Delia, sir."

Causton, unheeding the advice and the request, stooped over the splash board of the phæton and detached the traces.

"Climb across and rid them of the saddles," he ordered; "they know you. And then you can slip the chains, we must drive them, if they won't stand us mounting."

The Irishman raised a joyous whoop and did as he was bidden. "It's yourself that's the real genius, sir," he called from the withers of the near bay. He was unbuckling girths, freeing collar-irons, and shortening reins.

Meanwhile the swift tide sobbed and gurgled through the carriage wheels, the wavelets were above the hubs, and once the phæton lifted to a roller. Behind were the cluster of luminous sparks that indicated the position of the village; before, the beacon of the Island. All else was vast, windy, and indistinct.

A new sound floated abruptly to the lawyer's ears—the unmistakable lap of divided water under a boat's bows. A novel danger was threatening them, that of being run down. Robert Causton caught up a carriage-lamp and held it high in the direction of the peril. A rattle was heard and a black shadow, monstrous and swaying in the gloom, lessened. A lug sail had been allowed to fall; the low hull and squat mast forged onward, into the glow of the lamp supported by the lawyer.

"By St. Patrick!" yelled the driver of the phæton, "but it's Miss Delia. Heaven be praised."

Robert Causton strained his vision to penetrate the night. He could indeed distinguish that the craft which had approached them was a small fishing coble, impelled by the flapping peak of its half lowered mainsail, and controlled by a feminine figure in abbreviated skirts and a big hat. An arch voice reached them, musical in its suppressed excitement:

"Hullo, Michael!" it said; "sit tight—I'm coming."

The coble glided nearer, the steerswoman skipped over the ballast, dragged down the gaff of the lug, threw out a rusty anchor, and hauled on it. The boat stayed a few inches from the now buoyant phæton and its frightened horses.

The rescuer was some twenty years of age, slight, but graceful, and active. Her dark hair was tumbling from its pins, disarranged by her exertions, and her eyes shone.

"Jump in," she commanded, but checked herself to exclaim: "Oh, the poor gee-gees—I had forgotten them."

Robert Causton raised his neat brown bowler with a grave formality; he had managed to retain that article, despite the excitement.

"They will swim at the stern of the boat," he said; "we were going to try and get them back in some such fashion."

"By Jove!" ejaculated the girl crisply; "so Michael didn't quite lose his head—I'm glad of it."

"'Twasn't my notion, Miss Delia," said the Irishman; "my idea was just to drown with the beasts while Mr. Causton swam back alone."

Delia laughed, she was tethering the bays to the rear of the coble. "If you were as clever as you're plucky, Michael," she remarked, "you'd be a marvel. Come on, the phæton must shift for itself."

Michael Dowd flung in the solicitor's kit-bag and stood aside to let him enter the boat. Causton delivered the carriage-lamp to the Irishman, sprang in over the gunwale, and commenced to loose the anchor chain thwart to which it was secured.

"We'll take a turn or two of this round the body of the phæton," he decided, measuring the small coble with a keen scrutiny, "it can be hauled up to morrow not much the worse, except the stuffing."

"That's a smart dodge," commented the person whom Michael Dowd had addressed as Miss Delia. She was leaning against the mast, and the pose showed to advantage the supple youth of her figure and the proud unconsciousness of her expression.

The device, thus indorsed, was acted on. The carriage, fastened to the anchor of the coble, was temporarily abandoned, the mainsail was hoisted and the little craft, with the horses swimming astern, bore down upon the Island. Ten minutes had scarcely elapsed when she grounded in a sheltered cove, and the bays shook themselves free of the unfamiliar element.

As Michael Dowd improvised a new mooring for the coble, the lawyer, who had made himself responsible for the custody of the horses, turned to his rescuer. "I am Robert Causton," he said, "of London, and Mrs. Tennant's solicitor. Please accept my thanks for the obligation under which you have laid me. May I not know to whom I am indebted?"

The girl smiled; Robert Causton was holding the carriage-lamp they had brought with them, and thought he had never seen a smile at once so mischievous and so gay.

"I—I am Delia Tennant," she rejoined; "and, oh, won't I get into a row for this!"

With which unexpected announcement she flitted away and was lost in the prevailing obscurity.

CHAPTER II.

Robert Causton's Morning

"I TRUST, sir, you have slept well, though the wind did get up about dawn—doubtless you are not accustomed to the sound of the sea."

The solicitor bowed to the maker of this stiffly polite observation. She was angular, self-possessed, high-nosed, and wore a severe gown of black alpaca. Robert Causton himself had risen on her appearance in the small yet pleasant room where he had been breakfasting. The chill, characteristic sunshine of an autumn forenoon flooded the apartment, and shone on the silver plate and trim damask before him. From the window at his elbow he could see the little cove where he had disembarked the previous evening. Across a blue sheet of water—for the tide was nearly full again—was the coast of the Bristol Channel, and the picturesque village of Fawlish.

"Thank you, I spent a most comfortable night," he said, "but tempered by some anxiety about my client. Is she—is she any better?"

The housekeeper folded her arms and sighed. "There are some tokens of a rally," she told him, "or so Dr. Philpot thinks. But in cancer, Mr. Causton, and at this stage, hope is a delusion. That is why you were sent for—or rather your father was, since Mrs. Tennant was not, and is not so far, aware of his death. Pray be seated, sir, and go on with your breakfast, I only looked in to make sure it was to your liking."

Robert Causton sank back upon his chair, fidgeting with a heavy pencil case; he had been scribbling notes on one and another of a sheaf of documents. "A—a moment, Miss—Miss——" he began, and paused uncertainly.

"Royle is my name, sir," said the housekeeper, "Naomi Royle. It was well known to your father, sir; I've been on Swart Island with Mrs. Tennant a matter of—of nineteen year, I helped her to nurse her first and only child, which was a mite nobody expected to live."

"A long, and I am sure, an honourable service," declared the solicitor courteously. "Pardon me, Miss Royle, if I remind you that I am a busy professional man. My father's decease has inundated me with work, and I should be in town for an important consultation to-day. Can I not run up and return when your patient has rallied sufficiently to receive me?"

Naomi Royle lifted her hands in dismay. "Don't dream of it, sir," she begged; "Mrs. Tennant might slip away at any moment. Dr. Philpot says she mustn't see you for some hours at least, or she will collapse without doing as she wishes. She is only reconciled to the delay by the understanding that you are in the house, and by the doctor's assurance that she is nearing a rally. If I may be so free, sir, I should wish to add that expense is no object, and that what inconvenience we put you to must be reckoned with. Dowd will take letters or telegrams for you to Fawlish, when the tide is in, by trap, and at other times by boat."

Robert Causton resigned himself to the inevitable. "I suppose the horses were none the worse for their adventure," he remarked.

"No, sir," allowed the housekeeper, "which is a blessing, poor creatures—we are indebted to you, sir, for saving them, it seems Dowd clean lost his wits."

"It was not I who brought off the rescue," demurred the lawyer, finishing his cup of tea, "but Miss Tennant. By-the-bye, how is she?"

Miss Royle's harsh features became harsher still, and she moved hurriedly towards the door. "Well, I thank you, sir," she said; "you will please make yourself as comfortable as possible under the circumstances. The Island," she added, pausing after thus unceremoniously changing the subject, "is not large, but you may care to explore it, and there is a boat, sailed by a fisherman who farms a few acres near us. He would be glad to show you round the coast. Good morning, sir."

Causton raised his eyebrows when Naomi Royle had departed. "By Jupiter!" he muttered, "they don't want me to ask questions about Miss Delia, that's flat. Now I recollect, she said she would get into trouble over that affair last evening. She was as pretty as a picture in the lamplight; I wonder what she would be in the day. Anyhow, she must have sense to understand the danger involved in the wrong trend of the phæton lamps, and pluck, to come off alone in that heavy boat."

He got up, musing, collected his papers, went for his hat, and strolled out on to the lawn which sloped, unfenced, to the beach. From this point the house on the Island was visible as a low, straggling residence, stoutly built and cleverly sheltered. In the sandy bay, beyond the shingle, the fishing-coble was grounded at the edge of the tide. He noticed that she had been anchored, and, judged by the fact and the fresh wheel-marks on the shore, that the phæton had been brought back, in the early morning, from its singular position.

Casually enough, he lounged over to the boat and peered in. To his surprise he beheld, seated on the flooring boards, with her feet tucked under her, and absorbed in the disentangling of a line, Miss Delia Tennant herself.

Robert Causton saluted her respectfully. His acquaintance of the preceding night had nothing to fear from the fuller radiance of the day. Her ample locks and hazel pupils lent force to a countenance peculiarly soft, mirthful and feminine; her dress was short-skirted and plain, and a big blue pinafore covered the whole. She smiled at him archly.

"So you've found me out," she said, pulling at a knot; "please take notice that the blame isn't mine. If you wish to talk to me you must come inside or Naomi will spot you."

A trifle astonished by this frankness, the young solicitor mounted to the coble and paused, regarding her.

Delia made a gesture towards the stern-sheets. "You'll have to plump down," she warned him; "you're not hidden there, you know."

Causton obeyed her curt directions, and picking up a skein of the line, commenced to straighten it. "Do you mind telling me," he queried calmly, "why I have to conduct this interview sub rosa, so to speak?"

"Sub rosa!" repeated Miss Tennant, poring over an obstinate snarl of hemp; "yes, it's in the end of the dictionary, isn't it, and means on the sly? Well, because I'm being brought up properly, and no girl can be brought up properly who has men running after her. Naomi says so."

"Do men run after you?" asked the solicitor, piqued.

The other considered. "I'm not certain," she said, "they might if they had the chance. But you can't imagine what Naomi is; every second I'm expecting her head to pop up over that gunwale, and to have to go to my room for the rest of the morning. While you, you would simply be ordered off the Island."

Robert Causton laughed; the child-woman, with her imperious ways, her crisp speech, and her dazzling candour, interested him.

"Such cases have occurred before then?" he demanded.

Delia blushed. "Once," she faltered; "he was an engineer—we were having a reservoir built, with a pump for our drinking water. I didn't like him a bit, but I wanted to tease Naomi. If I had cared for him, I should have run away with him—if he had asked me to."

"You—you read novels, of course," ventured Causton, twisting the line about its frame.

"Rather," said the girl. "Michael Dowd smuggles them for me. I've a regular pile in the cave under the hill, 'Ivanhoe,' and 'David Copperfield' (he ran away with Dora Spenlow, you remember), and 'Jane Eyre.' Oh, isn't 'Jane Eyre' the darlingist tale! Would you like to see my books?" she added impulsively, but checked herself. "I'm sorry," she supplemented, "I can't show you them now, not that it matters, I could go through them by heart—I've a very good memory."

"I should be glad to learn," confessed the lawyer, out of his own thoughts, "how you got this clumsy boat off yesterday evening—are your muscles as exceptional as your memory?"

A ripple of merriment answered him. "It was just afloat," said Delia, "the tide comes in quickly at the Island—the shore shelves and the currents are rapid. The moment I saw the phæton lights—we're used to watching for them—pass the bend, I knew Dowd had missed the ridge and slipped into the deep channel. So I cast adrift, rowed off, and hoisted the lug—there was a nice breeze, and I fetched you on the third tack."

"You acted promptly," commented the solicitor, "I can hardly decide which to admire more, your coolness or your dispatch. I suppose, though, you are familiar with boats."

"Only this," replied Delia Tennant, "it's old Amos Godson's—he has fished about Swart Island for years; we let him set night-lines from the rocks, and he delivers our messages and stores. I often sail her myself off the cove here when Amos is on his little farm, Dowd says the fishermen about call me the Lady of the Island. It's mother that ought to be called that, but then they've never seen her—when she drives out it's always in a closed brougham. Oh," she cried, "you're a lawyer, aren't you?"

"I am," assented Causton, "that is, to be exact, a solicitor. My father was your mother's lawyer when I was a lad at Eton. Now he is dead, and I am the principal partner."

Delia clasped her hands over her knees. "You are going to do something about mamma's will," she said; "don't people usually make wills when they're expecting to die?"

Robert Causton hesitated. "Sometimes," he rejoined, "by no means usually."

Miss Tennant nodded, appreciating the distinction. "Then my mother isn't—isn't very ill," she interpreted. "Oh, Mr. Causton, I am glad, I have been dreadfully afraid she was. Dr. Philpot and Naomi put me off, but you wouldn't deceive me, I can read it in your face that you are honest."

The young lawyer hesitated. "You—you asked me a general question," he objected, "and I answered it truthfully." Causton caught himself wondering why the idea of deceiving her was so repugnant to him. "Your mother," he pursued, "is, I regret to admit, gravely unwell, but everyone hopes for the best."

Delia's lip trembled and her lashes grew wet. "I was right," she said, "you haven't cheated me with a stupid lie, it was Dr. Philpot and Naomi who did that. I—I understand you, my—my mother is dying."

She dashed her sunburnt palms to her eyes, and her head drooped. Causton comtemplated her piteous figure, and an inexplicable emotion stirred in his breast.

Suddenly a bird-like cry arose on the air—thrice it was reiterated and thrice it faded into silence. Delia sprang up, shaking the tears from her lashes.

"I must go," she told him; "I have stayed out too long—I'm—I'm not sorry I met you, Mr. Causton, you've let me know the truth about mamma. They've been treating me as if I were a baby."

She extended her hand, and the solicitor grasped it warmly. "Don't misunderstand me," he murmured, "your mother is seriously ill, but she is on the verge of a rally. She may live for a year, for two years, even more. I have no justification for explaining these things to you, but you are, as you say, a woman, and you have proved yourself a brave one."

Delia Tennant glanced up at him quickly, and the colour throbbed in her cheeks. But she did not answer except by that mute gaze and girlish flush, and leaping on to a thwart of the boat, jumped down and hurried off. She had not crossed to the house, the bird-like cry had been heard again, and Delia, hastening her steps, flitted up a narrow path that ascended the cliff.

The triple cry lingered on the young lawyer's ear; it might have passed for that of a gull, but there was a tremulous inflection in it that suggested the human mimic. Why had it so abruptly withdrawn Delia Tennant from his side. Robert Causton, though he would have been the last to own the fact, became profoundly curious. The sensation was mingled with a spice of unconscious jealousy. He stalked out of the coble, and traversing the beach, took to a higher level of the hill than that trodden by Delia.

Slowly he gained the rough promontory forming the most distinctive characteristic of the Island on its inner coast. It was green to the edge, which fell away in jagged stairs, patched with occasional turf and mountain immortelles.

From an eminence of the lofty cape, yet screened by a taller rock, Causton reconnoitred the position, to perceive Delia on the very brink of the abyss, her blue pinafore and flapping hat tossed by the wind, while their wearer was engaging in conversation with a person who occupied a scarcely less dangerous nook of the precipice. This latter was a man, tall, grey-haired, stooping, and shabbily clad.

As the solicitor completed his survey Delia moved backwards, and both she and her companion vanished as utterly as if they had never existed.

A shiver crept over Robert Causton, but he recollected Delia's words, "the cave under the hill." She had offered to take him thither, and had instantly cancelled her invitation. Was that grey-haired, stooping personage the cause of her retreat from the proposal?

Causton stared at the giddy descent, mechanically preparing a cigarette for lighting. The match in his fingers halted, unstruck! Below him a head and shoulders emerged above a shallow rampart of stone. The face was visible, and the lawyer had recognised it—it was that of a well-known London detective, and he was peering in the direction of the spot where the girl and the man had disappeared.

Robert Causton shrank more closely into the species of recess which screened him. His mind was busy with conjecture. But ere he could form a definite statement of the problem that had presented itself, Delia reappeared and glided up the slope. At sight of her, the figure, which the solicitor's professional experience had enabled him to recognise, ducked, and became invisible.

Ignorant of the double espionage that had been maintained upon her, Delia hurried by Causton's place of concealment. He darted after her, shielding himself dexterously from the possible view of the detective. If there were anything in progress demanding the attention of the authorities, it behoved him to act with caution.

Overtaking Miss Delia Tennant, he called to her in a whisper. She turned and a look of disdain thinned her features.

"Mr. Causton," she said coldly, "you've—you've been spying on me. And I thought you were a gentleman."

The lawyer winced. "My curiosity is the measure of my interest in you, Miss Tennant," he responded firmly; "in any case it may be worth mentioning that I was not the only witness of your proceedings, and those of your companion. At the back of that huge boulder there lies hidden a certain Samuel Bevan, a smart detective officer from London, and well known to almost every lawyer in the metropolis. You yourself will judge if the information has any bearing on your objection to my—my spying."

Delia caught at his arm. "Oh," she gasped, "forgive me; it wasn't my secret, or I would have trusted you, I would, indeed. We must tell Naomi, quickly, she will decide what to do."

Robert Causton paused. "Had I not better keep an eye on Master Bevan?" he suggested.

"No, no!" retorted Delia, "nobody could ever find the cave under the hill without they were shown it. But Naomi must be told immediately."

The solicitor yielded to her impatience, they scrambled down the steep path together, and entered the house at the head of the tiny bay.

Miss Naomi Royle met them in the hall. "Mr. Causton," she said, "I was about to send in search of you. Will you come to Mrs. Tennant's room at once? I have explained to her that you have taken your father's place. Be quiet and rapid, as she is very weak, Dr. Philpot is with her."

She led the way to a door on an upper landing. Delia followed them, awed by the housekeeper's haggard visage, yet eager to make her momentous communication.

As the solicitor passed into the sick chamber Delia drew Naomi Royle back, and whispered to her excitedly.

CHAPTER III.
The End of the Day.

"ALL else that I die possessed of to my dear daughter, Delia Tennant, especially the long lease of Swart Island and the house on it. And I charge her to continue, as, indeed, I know she will, the payment I have made for so many years towards a charitable object, the nature of which she has lately learnt."

Robert Causton finished reading the formal sentences.

"And the executors?" he said, glancing at the white countenance on the pillow hard by. The sick woman turned her head and parted her dry lips.

"Naomi Royle," she murmured, "and—and—" She put out a frail hand and pushed at the shade of the lamp, so that its rays fell on the features of the young solicitor. "And yourself," she said, then collapsed upon the tumbled bed.

The lawyer wrote down the necessary phrases and rose, with his pen in his hand. But another figure had stepped to the side of the couch—that of a grave, well proportioned man, in the prime of life.

"One moment, Mr. Causton," he whispered, and touched the thin wrist on the counterpane. His brows knitted, he poured out some brandy into a medicine cup, and slipped the mouthpiece between his patient's lips.

"Open the window," he requested curtly, "and ring to hasten Miss Royle. You must be quick or the will may go unsigned."

Causton acted on the double instruction. As he threw up the sash he realised suddenly that the obtaining of her final directions from the dying woman had cost hours. The tide was full again, and the moon high in the heavens. In the azure strait that separated Swart Island and the coast of Devonshire rode a steamer—a long, black cargo-boat, strangely out of place in that open and unfrequented anchorage. On the beach beneath, the fishing coble swayed to the wavelets, its sails loose, its keel half-grounded. By her floated a small pair-oar boat.

A moment later, Robert Causton had pulled the bell-cord and a firm step in the passage without betokened the approach of Naomi herself. Additional footsteps neared the threshold—a light and a heavy one. They were those of Delia Tennant and the Irish coachman, Michael Dowd. The three entered, to perceive that the doctor had raised his patient skilfully, her emaciated form was supported against his shoulder.

"Now, Mr. Causton," he said significantly. The lawyer slipped the pen into the fingers of the dying woman and the sunken lids opened. The pupils under were clear and comprehending.

"You sign this, Mrs. Tennant," queried Robert Causton distinctly, "as your last will and testament?"

"I do," faltered his client, and the syllables were scarcely heard in the silence of the room. But she scrawled her name at the bottom of the document with a determined effort that brought the beaded sweat to her cheeks and forehead. The physician laid her down gently, and administered another mouthful of brandy.

Robert Causton was obtaining the signatures of the witnesses, Naomi supplied hers, calm and resolute as ever. But the Irishman's face was wet with tears.

"You will leave Mrs. Tennant to me now, gentlemen," said the housekeeper, dismissing Michael Dowd by means of a peremptory gesture, and turning almost haughtily to the others. "She has one more person to see before she can die in peace."

She threw wide the door and the solicitor strode towards it. He paused, to look about for Delia. She had disappeared. The doctor had stayed for a word with Naomi, he caught up the young lawyer, and they went out together. In the corridor Delia passed them—she was leading a person clad in a dark overcoat, and wearing a soft hat pulled down on to his brows. But Robert Causton had a glimpse of loose grey locks and knew her companion was the same that he had seen in conversation with her upon the cliff. Before he could complete his scrutiny, the latch clicked and he was alone in the corridor with the doctor.

The physician held out his hand. "Good-night, Mr. Causton," he observed, "it is no use my remaining, she will drift away about midnight or earlier. Poor soul, hers has been a sad life and yet her daughter will miss her. You and I," he continued, feeling for his gloves and drawing them on, "could read between the lines of all this if we chose, but it would not be wise to recognise the act, even though we are professional men, and must preserve out client's secrets. Au revoir, I have a boat and an oarsman in the cove, and there are patients in Fawlish whom I can help."

He nodded cheerfully, and stalked off down the corridor. Robert Causton gasped. Suddenly a gleam of comprehension broke in upon him. There must have been some scandal in the Tennant family, which his father and the grave medical man who had just left him had been acquainted with. Such scandals are not always committed to writing in lawyers' offices, and the elder Causton had died without confiding this to his son. No doubt the latter was supposed by his client to understand precisely that which, as it was, he could only guess at.

But what could be the nature of the scandal, what the reason for Mrs. Tennant's so singularly postponing the preparation of her will, what the identity of that disguised figure at present with the dying woman, what the cause of a detective's secret visit to the Island? The solicitor exhausted himself in speculations; but the thought of Delia Tennant dominated them all.

Thus musing, Robert Causton strode to the extremity of the corridor, where an oriel window commanded the cove below. Here he stood for some while, and then a footfall in the passage at his back made him face about. It was Naomi Royle and the mysterious unknown. Not noticing him they hastened down the curving staircase—soon he saw them emerge upon the beach and move towards the fishing-coble at the water's edge. The little craft was floating in the wash of the tide.

They entered its black shadow, yet he could discern that Naomi had halted, while her companion had pressed on, wading knee-deep. A dark shape aided him into the boat, the lug-sail crawled up the mast, the canvas bellied to the wind, and the boat crept from the shore. The housekeeper watched it steadily as it stole forth upon the rippling strait. Ten minutes after it had glided to the lean cargo-steamer that lay off the Island.

The two vessels blended their shadows for a time, and then the coble slid astern, the steamer, forging ahead, gathered way, and faded in the night. Naomi Royle abandoned her post and came towards the house.

When Causton heard her foot once more upon the stair he changed his position to bar her passage. She glanced up and he could tell that under her iron exterior some powerful emotion was fighting with her reserve.

"What is the purport of all this?" he asked abruptly. "I am a lawyer, Miss Royle, and there is such a thing as becoming an accessory after the fact. As Miss Tennant will have told you, a detective is in hiding on the Island. Of whom is he in search?"

Naomi Royle answered him harshly, but her voice trembled. "Of Valentine Tennant," she said, "fratricide and outlaw, who has looked his last on a dying wife and an only child. Fifteen years ago he killed his brother, out of jealousy for a young and flighty wife, who, nevertheless, loved him dearly. He fled the country, was outlawed, and his estates forfeited. But his wife knew herself to blame, and would not will her own property away from him, until she realised that it was necessary for Delia's sake."

The housekeeper glanced from the window, the cargo-steamer had vanished utterly.

"We have always been aware of his hiding-place abroad," she pursued, "and lately we wrote him that Mrs. Tennant was dying. He swore to come home and see her, if he should be hanged for it. Once here, he convinced Mrs. Tennant that if she did not will her fortune and the lease of the Island to Miss Delia, they would pass to him, and be forfeit to the Crown. Now you understand everything, Mr. Causton, but the law cannot touch you, for Valentine Tennant is no longer within your reach or mine."

She stepped by him—determinedly rather than hastily—and went along the corridor. As she neared the sick-room there was a low cry from its interior—a piteous, girlish cry, and the sound of a fall.

Naomi sprang in and darted to the bedside—her mistress' jaw had settled into the last grim position and Delia lay insensible on the floor.

* * * *

The next day Robert Causton returned to London, to devote a few breathless hours to the interests of his neglected clients before retracing his steps to the West Coast, to arrange for the administration of the late Mrs. Tennant's estate. Glancing down an evening paper in his club the same night, he discovered a startling paragraph:

> "The body of Mr. Samuel Bevan, a distinguished member of the Scotland Yard detective establishment, was found this afternoon among the rocks on Swart Island, off the Devon coast. It is supposed that the deceased officer was exploring this romantic spot, when he lost his footing and fell from the cliffs. Oddly enough, the owner of the Island, which is private property, died last night."

And this is how it comes to pass that the real route to the cave under the hill, where Valentine Tennant was concealed during his dangerous visit to England—a visit which, by some means, had reached the ears of the police, is unknown to any but Delia Tennant, Naomi Royle, and Robert Causton. Delia herself showed it to the last-named on one of his frequent little holidays at the house on Swart Island—holidays that ended ultimately in his becoming to some extent a proprietor of this piece of British territory. That is if a man can be said to share his wife's property in the long lease of an Island.

As for Valentine Tennant, during many years a certain sum per annum was remitted by Delia Causton to a banker in the Argentine "for an agreed purpose." At length the banker wrote that the "beneficiare" no longer called for the amounts. Then it was that Delia told her husband, what he had always guessed, that it had been paid for her father, and that he was now dead.

When, in the course of time, the present possessors of Swart Island pass away, the secret of a very curious hiding-place will die with them. Should it itself ever be recovered, it is doubtful whether the chief feature of the "cave under the hill" will be ascertained. This is its second exit, a funnel-shaped air-hole traversable by an agile climber. It was through the aperture in question that Valentine Tennant escaped to his wife's death-bed, notwithstanding the vigilance of the luckless Mr. Samuel Bevan. R. NORMAN SILVER.

"I PARTICULARLY desire, Kate, that this may be the last experiment of the kind that you will try."

George Germond spoke gravely, with a deep line between his brows, and his lips formed into a cold, stern line. Kate Brewster tossed her pretty head.

"There's no occasion for your being so cross about it, George," said she. "It's only a frolic."

"A pretty frolic to walk deliberately into a room full of men in the disguise of an orange girl, selling oranges."

"Well, what then? Weren't my oranges good?"

"Kate, do you want to drive me frantic?" expostulated the aggrieved lover.

"Well, go on with your lecture."

"Answer me—do you think it was a ladylike or a dignified thing to do?"

"N—not exactly," faltered poor Kate, while Mr. Germond gloomed down upon her like an avenging genius.

"I wish it to be distinctly understood," he went on, "that if our engagement is to proceed—if, I say—you are to pledge me your solemn word of honour never again to let yourself be drawn into any of this absurd masquerading."

Kate's colour deepened, and her eyes flashed ominously.

"I do not choose to bind myself by any promise, George Germond," said she. "It was only a freak of mine to pass myself off on you and your cousins, and Henry St. John, as an orange vendor. You—none of you—would ever have suspected my identity if I had not told you afterwards."

"You will not promise, Kate?"

"No. I will not promise. If you cannot trust me without——"

"Exactly," hotly interrupted Germond. "I cannot trust you. You have spoken well."

"Then we had better part."

"Now, Kate, don't be so unreasonable. You know that I love you—you know that I have only your best interests at heart. This mania for acting will surely, sooner or later, bring you to grief. Promise me, darling, that you will give it up. Promise me not to take part in Mrs. Synclare's theatricals next month."

"Never!" was Kate's spirited reply.

"Very well," said Germond, deeply offended. "Then you know the consequences."

"That is just as you please."

And she courtesied him imperially out of the room.

"So let it be!" she cried, dashing the briny drops out of her eyes. "I will not cramp the royal gifts God has given me to suit the narrow ideas of any man alive. I feel that I can merge myself entirely in the identities of the creatures of other geniuses—and I am determined, sooner or later, to go on the stage. I fancied I loved him, but I could never thoroughly respect a man whose soul ran in such despicably narrow grooves!"

People shook their heads when Kate Brewster resigned her situation in a flourishing academy for young ladies, and accepted a fourth-rate opportunity to go on the stage during the engagement of a star actress.

"I have only to walk on and off, and say four or five words, mamma," pleaded Kate; "and I have such a good chance to study Mrs. Legrange!"

"But, my love, this can only end in disappointment and distaste for ordinary occupations!"

"You'll see, mamma," said Kate, brightly.

"If you had been a sensible girl and married young Germond——!"

"I should have felt like a caged bird all my days! Only wait, mamma; only wait and see!"

Mrs. Legrange, the beautiful English actress, had the rare perceptions belonging to her sex. Among all the "subs" she saw and noticed the dark-eyed girl with the square brow, and the red, mobile mouth.

"That girl has the making of an artist in her," said she; "bring her to me."

And the upshot of the matter was, that when Mrs. Legrange went back to London, Kate Brewster and her mother went, too.

Years afterwards the denizens of her native town never knew that Katherine Bruce, the brilliant young tragedienne, who was nightly playing to such full houses, was the Kate Brewster who had once been a schoolmistress in their midst.

* * * * *

"George Germond! ill and in trouble? I used to know a George Germond!"

Miss Bruce spoke impetuously. A circle of literary and dramatic connoisseurs were sitting in her private sitting-room at the Valentia Hotel. Mrs. Brewster, in black satin and valenciennes lace, presided at the tea urn, and looked with admiring eyes at the royally-beautiful woman into which her young daughter had blossomed during the last ten years.

Kate herself, in a deep blue silk, with draperies of black lace and a diamond cross sparkling at her throat stood by the marble mantel in an attitude unconsciously graceful.

"He's managed his business affairs poorly," said Mrs. Rosser. "Everything has gone wrong, and his wife, a poor, little helpless thing, with no merit on earth but a pretty face, has helped to drag him down. They say he is nearly wild, threatens to commit suicide, and all that sort of thing!"

"Oh, he mustn't do that," said Kate. "I'll go to see him."

"You, dearest?" remonstrated her mother.

"Yes, mamma; why shouldn't I? Old friends ought to be the first to help one another, and I've long ago given up those silly scruples which draw so impassable a barrier between a girl and her old lover. I'll go to-morrow."

* * * * *

"A lady to see me! I don't want to see anyone! Tell her so."

George Germond spoke hoarsely, and in the same instant he pushed a loaded revolver under the folds of the table-cover, but the visitor followed too closely on the footsteps of the scared little servant-maid to admit of the message of denial being delivered.

She was tall and regal in her mien, but a close black veil concealed her face as she walked directly to the table, and taking up the insufficiently-hidden pistol, flung it out of the window into a cluster of leafless bushes in the garden.

"It is only a coward, George Germond," said she, "who would run away from the troubles of this world rather than face and conquer them."

"Kate Brewster!" he exclaimed.

"Yes," said she, laughing, "Kate Brewster, or rather Katherine Bruce, as they call me now."

"Are you, then, Katherine Bruce, the successful actress—the queen of the modern stage? Oh, Kate, I never dreamt of this!"

"But I didn't come here to talk about myself," she said, independently. "It is you that I am interested in. Are you really ruined?"

"Yes." He set his teeth gloomily. "Past help—past recall."

"Will a loan of a thousand pounds help you to regain the lost position?"

"Where am I to get a thousand pounds?"

"I will lend it to you. I have it to spare. I was going to take my lawyer's advice and invest it in mines, but I'm not particular as to its destination. You can have it to-morrow. Now let's see the wife and babies. Don't thank me—thanks are a nuisance. I shall expect fair interest and good security."

Mrs. Germond, a little pallid, fair-haired creature, in the last stages of consumption, lay on a sofa within. She looked up anxiously as Kate swept in.

"If you are another of my husband's creditors—" she began in a trembling voice.

"I am not, but I'm going to be," said Kate. "May I kiss you, my dear? I am a very old friend of your husband's."

So the young actress brought comfort and blessing to the home of poor George Germond. She never told his wife of the pistol, nor did Germond himself ever afterwards allude to it.

Mrs. Germond died in the spring—the burial roses were glowing on her cheeks when Kate first saw her. And according to the rule and plummet of romance, the old lovers ought to have got married when a decent period of mourning had expired.

But they didn't.

Mr. Germond would have been more than pleased with such an arrangement, but Miss Brewster calmly shook her head.

"No," said she, "I shall never marry."

George Germond said nothing, but he thought of how magnificently Kate's life had blossomed and rounded itself out—of how wretched a failure his own had been. And it was in no wise a consolatory reflection that it had been his own fault.

Perhaps, after all, it was as well that George Germond and Kate Brewster never were married. A man does not like to feel that his wife is superior to him, neither is it altogether a pleasant position for a woman to occupy. Fate often arranges things better than we can do.

THE SNOW-WHITE MARE.

In the valley, about six miles above the forks of the Teton River, in Northern Montana, is the Blackfoot Indian Agency. A high stockade of split logs standing on end, deeply sunk in the earth, incloses about two acres of ground. Heavy gates, opening outward, sway harshly on great iron hinges. A well is in the centre of the inclosure. Low log buildings, covered with earth, are scattered along the stockade.

A couple of sandhill cranes stood expectantly at the well, waiting patiently for a thirsty man to draw water. A white-tailed deer, with a broad blue ribbon on her neck, walked daintily around. Her cool black muzzle, studded with drops of dew, brilliant in the slanting rays of the rising sun, was slyly thrust into my hand, giving me a slight shock of surprise.

By the stables stood a cow moose, standing so awkwardly with crooked legs and humped back, and the pendulous lip which Mark Twain calls "the Hapsburg," that her very ugliness excited my pity. A moose calf —her miniature in ugliness—stood stupidly at her side.

Standing at the well, facing the great Rocky Mountain range, I drew a bucketful of water. Drinking deeply, repulsing the while the advances of the female crane with my moccasined foot, I got the reward of all men who reject the advances of the tender sex, and was soon engaged in repelling a furious advance on me by the long-legged twain. The attack was fierce. Their long hard bills clashed viciously as they scornfully scolded me, and I was on the point of beating a disgraceful retreat, when I heard:

"Ho, Frank; come, have a mouthful of whisky?"

Recognising the voice, I gladly left the cranes in undisputed possession of the water bucket, and walked across the parade to the store of the fur company.

Bidding Burr "Good morning," I declined the whisky on grounds unnecessary to state; yet the barrel had a yellow head, and—and—well, I knew the tap. I sat and talked to Burr, who was in charge of this extensive store, and before breakfast he went over it with me. A curious stock. Everything you could not find in an Eastern country store was here. As we walked he explained the business to me. Alluring? Not at all. He, looking at his watch, said:

"We have yet time before breakfast to look at my mare."

The sudden change in the expression of the voice, the softening of the eyes, as this hard Indian trader spoke of his horse, excited my curiosity, and I went with him. He took me to a low log stable, the chinks carefully mudded, the open shutter and door well made and carefully fitted, so as to exclude the buffalo gnats in season. A few short, heavy chains, stretching from post to post, kept the horse in and the other animals out. With breast pushing against the topmost chain, with her handsome broad head thrust out, and alert ears cocked forward, stood a snow-white mare. She was looking at the moose with a surprised expression on her face, as much as to say: "Well, you have not grown handsomer during the night."

Burr whistled and with a joyful neigh the mare turned her head towards him and bade him welcome. The greeting between man and animal was almost tender. The mare rubbed her nose gently against his breast, and the man stood softly stroking her delicate neck. Unlocking the chains, they dropped. Burr walked towards the well. The mare, with dainty steps, arched neck, and flecking tail, followed him behind, or, caressingly advancing to his side, rubbed her body against his, as though the mere contact with the man was grateful to her. His arm instinctively lifted and dropped across her neck.

The two walked on together, unconscious of any incongruity. A bucket of water stood at the well. The high-bred creature smelt of it, and detecting my previous presence, disdainfully refused to drink after me. Emptying the bucket Burr drew another, and of this the mare drank slowly, her white face gradually sinking into the shallow vessel.

All across the parade, on the return to the stable, the love scene was re-enacted. As they passed me, the mare showed her aversion to a stranger by laying back her ears and thrusting out her white-toothed muzzle towards me in a vicious manner, causing me to step back hastily. They passed into the darkness of the stable. Burr comes out with a bucket, puts up the topmost chain, and goes after barley. The mare, with outstretched head, looks after him with kind eyes. Again she saw me, and, with wide-open mouth, reached the post to pay me the attentions of her dislike. Returning to the stable with a full bucket of barley, Burr passed in. I heard him pour the grain into the feed-box; I heard him speak to the mare as his "dear girl," and I heard him—kiss her.

A singular gentleness had come over this hard man, steeled to human suffering and woe, whose business it was to impoverish Indians, to destroy their morals, to brutify them with the fiend, alcohol. He sat at the breakfast table, silently thinking, with his antelope steaks and trout untasted before him. Watching the softened face, I wondered what was the story. So I said:

"Burr, why do you love that white mare?"

He looked kindly at me; and, with a sad smile, replied: "To-night, after the men are in bed, I will tell you the story." Then briskly: "Frank, this is not business. Eat, my boy, then clear out and fish or hunt. You will find some prairie hens in the big willow thicket about five miles below here. I saw them the other day. Shoot some. To-night we will have a feast, and I will open my last two bottles of sherry, and we will talk." His face hardened. The cold, deadly look returned to the grey eyes, and our breakfast was soon finished.

Shouldering my rifle, I stepped out of the stockade and slowly walked down the valley. On the distant hillsides antelope grazed; down the valley before me I could see a few deer running for cover to the willows by the stream. Now and then a grouse rose before me and flew rapidly away. Resisting all temptations to shoot at anything, I walked steadily on.

Climbing a hill, I sat on a rock and musingly gazed at the vast plains to the north-east, at the foothills of the range, and at the rugged, rocky range beyond. I love the Rocky Mountains, and never tire of their face. I wasted hours in looking, and in thinking of the many tales I had heard of the range. When the sun was high above me, I started for the willows. There I neatly shot the heads off six grouse. Then, jointing a light trout pole, I whipped the clear pools of the south fork of the Teton, and was soon rewarded by a string of fine half-pound trout.

Then came the pleasant walk back through the cool, dry air, and over the crisp grass of the north. What a luxury life was in the valley of the Teton. I turned my spoils over to the smiling Indian woman who acted as cook for Burr. The rest of the day I spent on horseback, running antelope with a lot of half-blood Indians. At eight o'clock supper was eaten. The sherry was brought out, and I scattered on the table a handful, my last, of Rosa Conchas, that had never paid duty, and, as we sat smoking, Burr told me this story:

"In the autumn of '88 I thought it might be profitable to start a trading-post in the Yellowstone Valley. Learning from the Blackfeet that the Sioux were camped on the south side of the river, I determined to ride over and see what arrangements I could make with them. I crossed the Belt Mountains, and, riding down the valley, was soon at their camp, I on the north side of the river, they on the south.

"I sat on my horse and hailed the camp. No answer. I could see plenty of Indians walking about, and again I hailed. No answer. I shouted myself hoarse, and the only notice taken of me was by an old buck, who walked to the river bank, looked at me, made an insulting gesture, and slowly walked off. I went there to trade, and, having got angry at the treatment, though I well knew that I ought to leave the valley at once, I, like a fool, resolved to cross the stream and brave the danger, so I forded and rode into the camp. I spoke to no one; no one spoke to me. The sullen braves turned their backs on me as I rode up the street. The young girls looked curiously at me. Riding slowly along I cooled rapidly. I saw that I was not wanted, and I at last fully realised that I was in danger. I did not dare to ride to the south, out of the camp, nor did I have courage enough to attempt to recross the river.

"Before me stood a great tent made of buffalo skins. It was the largest I had ever seen. I halted, dismounted, and stood silently at my horse's head. No one noticed me. Indians went past me, apparently not seeing me. At last a young woman came and stood before me.

"Looking straight into my eyes, she said: 'What do you want?' I looked her coldly in the face and made no reply. Smiling, she asked, 'What brings you here?' Steadily I gazed into her eyes and was voiceless. She left me and disappeared into the great lodge.

"Soon an Indian warrior in full paint, with bow and strung arrow in his hands, came to me. Speaking Blackfoot, he said: 'Why are you in this camp?' To him I replied: 'I wish to trade with you.' More men came. They took my horse, and seizing hold of my arm they led me into the great lodge. Here I was seated and a council was held. I sat and listened to them talk of what was best to do with such a presumptuous white man. Some were in favour of trading. The large majority of the Indians were in favour of torturing me.

"It was soon decided that I should be tortured; and they sat and discussed the many methods. After a two days' talk it was decided to burn me. I was in a strange condition mentally. I would listen to a plan of torture as though it was some other man they were talking about; and I would comment to myself on that plan as giving the chap but little chance of life. But when the dusky brave, who talked Blackfoot, told me that I was to die by fire the next day, I understood perfectly well that I was the man they had been talking about, and replied: 'I know it.' Clustering round me they asked if I had understood all the talk. 'Yes, I had.' 'Then why not answer the maiden when she spoke to you?' 'I came, not to talk to squaws, but to trade with men.' No use, I could do nothing by soft talk, and, having played my hand, finally resigned myself to my fate.

"I noticed that the girl who had first spoken to me in front of the lodge was watching me. She would quickly glance at me, and then drop her eyes on the buckskin shirt she was embroidering with Crow hair. Several times I noticed this, and once I replied with a smile. The lodge emptied. All were gone except the girl. She came quickly to my side, apparently to refold some buffalo robes, and in a whisper said: 'You are to die to-morrow. To-night I will have the best horse in the camp saddled and standing on the outside of the lodge. I will have the tent cut from the outside. You jump through, mount, and ride for your life. You may escape. You will burn if you stay.' Then, with a smile: 'The mare is mine. She is the fastest animal in the valley of Yellowstone. I give her to you.' She left me, and quickly resumed her work.

"As she wove the hair of many Crow scalp-locks into the shirt, I sat looking thankfully at her. She never looked at me again. As I saw a chance for my life my heart beat so loudly that I thought it would be heard. I calmed my face and waited. I ate fairly of supper. I smoked a pipe. All were very kind and attentive to me. Night was passing away, and still the Indians lingered, looking at the man they were to burn on the morrow. I leant back against the tent to rest myself, when I felt a hand gently pushing me forward. Sitting whistling, I felt the point of a knife come through and strike my neck. I did not flinch. I could feel the blood trickle down my back. I could feel the knife drawn carefully down until it hit the ground. Still whistling, I waited, my heart thumping, my blood on fire—waited a minute to give whoever cut the tent time to escape. Then grasping my heart and nerves for an instant, I gathered myself together, and turned backward through the opening.

"Instantly jumping to my feet, I vaulted into the saddle that was on the back of a white horse that stood there, and in the midst of yells, of rifle shots, of a pack of howling dogs, we rushed out of the camp. It seemed to me as though a thousand horsemen were in pursuit of me instantly. We galloped up the river to a bend I had seen. Dashing in, we forded it under a fire that made the water boil around us, and were out of water, and on the level land to the north of the river, before any of the Sioux were halfway across. Striking the trail to the Bozeman Pass, I took it, and knowing it, pushed boldly on, and though hotly pursued, my horse outlasted theirs, and I escaped. I never drew rein until I dismounted to the west of the pass.

"The girl saved me. With any other horse I should have been recaptured and burnt. I have not got the girl. The love I have for her the mare has instead. I returned to my post, and made no trade in the Yellowstone that year.

"Again. Last winter the snow was on the ground in January, and for three days I had been hunting for running antelope. The sun was very bright, and my eyes hurt me. I saw specks floating about; little chains with small links were constantly before me. My eyes burnt smartly when I returned to the agency. Daily, while hunting, I had seen the low, black clouds in the north that indicate the formation or marshalling of the winds of the frozen north. Daily the south wind swept them beyond the northern horizon; but the next morning found them looming portentously in the northern sky. On my return to the agency I found a runner had just got in from Belly River, in British America, with important news for me. It was necessary that I should go up at once. I started the next morning. My eyes hurt dreadfully.

"I always go to the Belly River, when the snow is on the ground, by the way of the Sweet Grass Hills, and there I camp one night. One side of the hills is always bare of snow, and there is a spring of good water on the northern side of the centre hill. A strong south wind was blowing when I started, but by noon I saw clouds to the north suddenly rise up. I knew that the marshalling of the north winds was completed, and they were eager for the assault on the soft south wind. On came the black cloud. The south wind still blew fiercely, but it could not stem the assault from the arctic region. Birds flew south before the storm; antelope and deer were running for shelter. I had reached my camping ground, and stood looking far off to the north, seeing the landmarks disappear one by one as the head of the 'blizzard' reached them and shrouded them in its icy breath. A calm. Then, with a mighty rush and a loud noise, the head of the 'blizzard' swept past me.

"The air was filled with particles of ice that cut through almost horizontally, and seemed as if they would never fall. Colder, ever colder, grew the wind, and denser the air as the ice particles thickened. I sought shelter in the rocks. Buckling the clothing on the mare I turned her loose, knowing that she would not leave me. Then I lay down in my blankets, and wrapping my beaver cloak around me, I tried to sleep. I began thinking, and could not sleep. The buffalo had not come south that winter, and the wolves were gaunt and hungry. As they follow a horseman over the plains in the summer, so they do in the winter, only more of them, and those great, gaunt, famine-breeders, the grey and black ones, go in largely increased numbers. I had a pack of them at my heels all day, and now they cropped up in my thoughts.

"Finally I slept. When I awoke it was dark. Holding up my naked hand, I felt the icy sweat of the blizzard strike sharply against it. The roar of the wind still continued. I waited, it seemed to me, for hours, when suddenly I felt my mare paw my breast. I spoke kindly to her, saying she had made a mistake. Soon she pawed me again, and I arose to find that all was dark; that I could not see the white mare. Alarmed, I struck a match under my cloak and looked down to see the blaze. I saw nothing, but the match burnt my fingers. With a desolating despondency I realised the fact that the glare of the snow encountered for the past few days had made me snow-blind; that I was fifty miles from the nearest house, and unable to see; that a furious storm was raging.

"Stupid, almost wild with horror, I thought I could hear the snuffing of the wolves, and the soft patter of their feet below the wild shriek of the arctic winds. I was simply benumbed with terror. The mare recalled me to myself by rubbing her cold muzzle against my face. She saw that something was wrong with me, but what she could not comprehend. I resolved to saddle her, to feed her, and, after she ate, to mount and let her take her own course. So I fed her the remaining measure of barley, and waited for her to eat.

"Then I saddled up, and without bridling, mounted, and, wrapping my cloak round me, sat steadily in the saddle, awaiting the frisky action of the high-strung animal. She stood trembling until I told her to go. Then I felt her turn until the ice drops struck obliquely on my right side and back, and she rapidly walked off. Not a motion or movement did she make to discompose my seat. Wrapped in my cloak, with hood drawn over my face, warm and encouraged with hope, I patiently sat on the horse. I could now hear the snarling of the wolves, and my only fear was that they, rendered desperate by hunger, might attack the mare. I dismissed the thought—would not think of it. If they did attack us, we were lost; if they did not, I thought we were safe.

"All day the 'blizzard' raged and tore icily around and on us. The mare walked rapidly or cantered slowly on. It seemed to me that we had been travelling for days, for weeks even, when the mare stopped and neighed loudly. Reaching forward, I felt the rough stockade; dismounting, I felt the hinges of the gate. Loudly I called. Then I took my rifle from the saddle, and rapidly I handled cartridges into it. At last a sleepy voice from the inside called: 'Who is there?' I answered 'Burr; and I am snow-blind. Come to me.' They came, and I was saved—saved for the second time by the white mare. Do you wonder that I, not having the Sioux maiden, love her mare?"

I sat by the bright fire, with my feet high upon the stool, and did not answer—simply sat and smoked, and thought of the girl, of the man, of the mare.

A WOMAN OF THIRTY-FIVE.

"MARION, I love you!"

There is a touch of intreaty in the ardent tones, something of eagerness in the boyish voice, a suggestion of the real fervour which is the accompaniment of a man's first passion for a woman.

She sat on a stile and smiled deprecatingly at the young man from whom this original observation issued.

She had heard the words so often from his lips that they failed to touch her imagination afresh. They called for no comment. It was not the fact but the position created thereby which concerned her most. His voice for the moment seemed to come from a distance. In a desultory sort of way she was thinking of many things. The thought which came uppermost was perhaps the most trivial, and therefore claimed immediate attention. It occurred to her that at her age—she was thirty-five—sitting on a high stile even to an audience of one was not an attitude in which she appeared to advantage; she decided to get down.

"Rupert, give me your hand," she said.

"I was asking you to bestow yours upon me," he murmured, when she stood beside him.

"What a beautiful sunset!" she said inconsequently.

"Thank you, the solar system can wait. Marion, will you not promise to marry me?"

That was the very question she was asking herself. She found it hard to say "Yes," and more difficult to to say "No." She would try to temporise.

"Why not let things remain as they are, Rupert? We have been very happy."

"Marion, I want you to marry me, to feel sure of you. Give me your answer."

She had tried to keep their relations in the platonic stage, but he would have none of it. He was clearly a young man of some impetuosity. He was twenty-four, the son of a local solicitor, who had dallied with the law, and then given it up for painting. His friends predicted that he would do great things. It is the sort of remark which may be said of any young man of that age. If you are twenty-four and have good health everything is possible. Rupert Barrett had not yet found himself out. He felt sure that he loved Marion Cross. It was the one thing of which this rather nice boy with the affectionate brown eyes was certain.

"Rupert, I cannot marry you."

Marion Cross was not wholly unsophisticated. The only daughter of a country banker of the old-fashioned type, everybody knew and liked her. Rupert was the first man who had told her that she was loved. She was thirty-five, remember. Not old for her age by any means. Tall and slim, she had the fair hair and complexion, and the blue eyes which will carry a woman from youth into the confines of middle age, and still leave some of the fragrance of youth with her. She had not lost all her illusions. But she knew that to marry a man ten years her junior would be an unpardonable sin.

"No, Rupert," she said, "I will not marry you, and I will tell you why. You think you love me——"

"Marion, how can you be so cruel?"

"I am not cruel. I mean to be kind to you."

"Be a little more kin to me and a little less kind."

"Rupert, I am ten years older than you."

"Is that all. I thought you were going to say something new. You were ten years older two years ago. You will always be ten years older."

"That is just it, Rupert. I shall always be," she said sadly. "I shall become an old woman while you are still a young man."

It was a hard thing for a woman to confess, but she did it. She must have loved him dearly.

"Besides, you have your career to think of. You ought not to think of marrying for years. Go and make a name for yourself."

"Let me share my name with you?" he pleaded; "with you for my wife I feel that I could indeed do something that would make you proud of me. Say that you will. You know how much I love you. And you do care a little for me, Marion?"

"Yes, yes; and it is——"

"Then you do love me, Marion? And you will be my wife?"

"Don't ask me."

"But I will," he urged. "I don't understand you, Marion. One moment you admit that you care for me, and yet you refuse to marry me. I cannot understand."

"I would not try dear, if I were you. You know women are supposed to be an enigma."

"Do not trifle with me," pleaded the boy's voice. "You cannot love me!"

"Indeed," she cried, "I love you better than you know!"

And she allowed him to take her in his arms. Poor Marion! She smiled bravely, and sent him home happy when they parted, but she was rather tempted to despise herself.

Rupert's happiness was very short lived. For a whole week he really imagined that Marion Cross would become his wife. For the same period she had a fear that she might be tempted to do this thing.

Then Rupert read a little paragraph in the Willington Gazette.

"Much interest has been occasioned by the announcement that a marriage has been arranged between the Rev. Ambrose Godley and Miss Cross, the daughter of our old and esteemed resident, Mr. Montagu Cross."

When he read this Rupert felt that the sun had suddenly grown cold and dead.

He could not credit such duplicity on the part of the woman he had loved.

The news was true, however. His father referred to it at dinner that evening.

"Have you heard the news, Rupert?" he said casually. "The Vicar is going to marry Marion Cross."

Rupert's mother had died years ago, and the father and son had never quite understood each other. Mr. Barratt, senior, in his professional capacity, was the repository of many secrets, but he had never won his son's confidence. He had some suspicion as to the state of affairs between Rupert and Marion Cross, but they had never spoken on the subject.

"I am glad," he thought, "that that nonsense is put an end to."

In his own mind he had little doubt that this middle-aged spinster had kept his son's mind unsettled. He regretted that Rupert had not taken kindly to the law, but he now resolved that Rupert should go to London and work out his own destiny.

The next day Rupert received the following letter:

"MY DEAR RUPERT,—

"You will have heard the news that I am about to marry the vicar, and are no doubt thinking hard things of me. I should like to see you once more. Will you meet me at the old place on Thursday afternoon?

"Your affectionate friend, MARION CROSS."

Rupert, who thought that the world ought to cease to rotate on its axis, was in no mood to forgive Marion Cross the part she had played in wrecking his happiness. He decided that he would not see her again, but would write. After composing and destroying quite a dozen letters, he managed to arrive at the following:—

"MY DEAR MARION,—

"I was one of the last persons to hear of your good fortune. But if my congratulations are tardy they are none the less sincere. I do not see that any good can come of our meeting again. With the fervent hope that your career of duplicity is now at an end, and wishing you all the happiness you deserve,

"I am, yours affectionately,

"RUPERT BARRETT."

The satisfaction with which the writer regarded this letter was some balm to his outraged feelings. Poor Marion was distressed when she received it. She had acted for what she thought were the best interests of this young man. She was fearful that she might succumb to the temptation to marry him, and when the Vicar, who was a widower of forty-five, asked her to be his wife she clutched at the opportunity with the spirit of despair.

She could not say she had any affection for the Vicar, but she respected him. She had been in grave danger of ceasing to respect herself. So Marion Cross married a man who had a nicely adjusted affection for her, and who felt the social need of a wife, for he was a man who had distinct chances of preferment. He was a high churchman at a time when that party was beginning to to be paramount in the Church of England, and he had a natural gift of oratory which he had assiduously cultivated. With good luck and no inconvenient scruples, he might yet wear the mitre.

A week before the marriage Rupert took his departure for London with the professed purpose of studying painting and the arts.

It must be confessed that what Rupert lacked was ballast. He wrote to his father regularly; dutiful letters, in which he said very little about himself. At the studios he gave the impression of having ability but little application. He soon began to drift instead of living with a purpose. Then one day came a letter to Mr. Barrett, senior, that Rupert had been rash enough to marry without consulting his father, and that he was bringing his wife home.

Rupert will never forget the evening they arrived. Neither will his father. Rupert's wife was the only person who was happy—sublimely, ignorantly happy.

Mr. Barrett saw seated opposite him a young woman of rather florid appearance and with obviously dyed golden hair. He put her age down at twenty-seven, and she was already slightly passé.

"You know I used to sit for Rupert," she said, in one of her early attempts at conversation during dinner.

"Sit for him!" exclaimed the old gentleman, realising for the first time that this aggressive young person had been a painters' model.

Both Rupert and his father were glad when the meal had come to an end.

There were awful silences between the trio, and still more dreadful moments of confidence on the part of the young bride. She had a terrible intrepidity of talk. When the fish was served, Mr. Barrett was merely of opinion that his son had married an empty-headed creature; by the time dinner was at an end he realised that she was simply impossible.

Presently the two men were alone.

"Rupert," said his father gravely, "perhaps you will now tell me why you have presumed to marry without my consent. You have no means whereby to support a wife."

"Father, I know all that you feel. I have been an awful fool. Forgive me!"

"Never!" said the old man bitterly. "But I have decided what I will do. Your allowance of £200 a year will be continued, and I trust when this visit is at an end I shall see but little of you and the woman you have made your wife."

Rupert said no more. He knew his father to be a stern man, and he was too ashamed of his own folly to attempt to offer any excuses.

Things were so strained in his father's house that Rupert spent much of his time out of doors alone. On the third day after his return he met Marion on the high road outside the town. She stopped to speak to him.

"I must congratulate you, Rupert, on your marriage, and I hope I shall have the pleasure of meeting your wife."

"Marion," said Rupert, his old love for her surging up again at this meeting, "why did you treat me so badly?"

"You must not talk of that. You have got to be very happy with your wife."

"Happy! Oh Heaven!" he broke in bitterly. "I am the most miserable thing on earth. Marion, if you had only married me!"

If she only had. How often latterly had the thought come to Marion herself. Six months of married life had sufficed to find the Vicar out. The Reverend Ambrose Godley passed in the world as a man of high aims and true religion. Marion had come to know that his life was a sham, that he disbelieved the things he preached, and that the mainspring of his character was insincerity. His one idea was self-advancement; he was an opportunist of the meanest type. Marion had never pretended to love him. Now she had ceased to respect him.

"Rupert," she said finally, "good-bye. What is past is past. Blame me if you will; I acted for the best, but I have lately thought that I ought indeed to have married you."

"Then you did care for me, Marion?"

"Rupert, I shall always love you."

"Then it is not too late!" he cried eagerly. "Let us go——"

"And add sin to folly. No dear. It is too late! We must live our lives. Whatever might have been, your wife and my husband stand between us now."

* * * * *

The Reverend Ambrose Godley realised his ambition and became a Bishop; Marion threw herself into the social duties of her position, and in time came to pity her husband. She was denied the consolation of motherhood. Rupert paints pot-boilers, has four untidy children, and a wife who is said to drink.

By RAFAEL SABATINI.

SUMMARY.

ANDREA DE MANCINI, a nephew of Cardinal Mazarin, is found one day by the latter in the Palais Royal, Paris, in a state of intoxication. Gaston de Luynes, the narrator of this story, and fencing-master to de Mancini, is blamed by the Cardinal for allowing his nephew to get into such a condition, and is removed from his position of fencing-master.

Eugène de Canaples insults de Mancini and a duel is arranged, but the Cardinal hears of it and tells de Luynes that it must not take place. De Luynes realises that if he does not prevent it the Cardinal has power to do him great harm, and accordingly raises a quarrel with de Canaples which ends in a fight, de Canaples being severely wounded. The onlookers are enraged with de Luynes because he indiscreetly lets fall the fact that he raised this quarrel so as to prevent a duel between de Mancini and de Canaples, and he has to flee for his life. To escape his pursuers he springs on the step of a passing carriage, and the ladies inside let him shelter there for a time, but when he says that he has wounded de Canaples they order him to alight.

De Luynes then accompanies de Mancini to the home of Eugène de Canaples, whose sister, Yvonne, Cardinal Mazarin wishes de Mancini to marry. The Chevalier de Canaples receives de Luynes and de Mancini very cordially at his château. Yvonne, however, is not at all gracious to de Luynes, because she knows of the duel which he fought with her brother, as she and her sister Geneviève were the two ladies who befriended him. De Mancini falls in love with Geneviève.

De Luynes does not stay at the Château de Canaples, but at an inn in Blois, the Lys de France. One morning he is visited there by the Marquis de St. Auban, who himself wants to marry Yvonne—for her money. After insulting each other a duel is arranged for the following morning, but the time is afterwards altered to the evening of the day of the insult. St. Auban tells de Luynes that Cardinal Mazarin has issued a warrant for his arrest.

As de Luynes is riding to Canaples after his encounter with St. Auban, he is met by Malpertuis, an officer who had been in the train of St. Auban, and by him he is told that a plot is on foot to kidnap Yvonne. De Luynes warns the lady, but she takes no heed and falls into the trap set for her. De Luynes starts out to her assistance, and succeeds in effecting a rescue after a severe struggle.

While returning with Yvonne to Canaples the carriage is stopped and de Luynes arrested by M. de Montrésor on a warrant from Cardinal Mazarin.

CHAPTER XIV.

Of what Befel at Reaux.

AT my captor's bidding I mounted the horse which they had untethered from the carriage, and we started off along the road which the coach itself had disappeared upon a moment before. But we travelled at a gentle trot which after that evening's furious riding was welcome to me.

With bitterness I reflected, as I rode, that the very moment at which Mademoiselle de Canaples had brought herself to think better of me was like to prove the last we should spend together. Yet not altogether bitter was that reflection; for with it came also the consolation, whereof I had told her, that I had not been taken before she had had cause to change her mind concerning me.

That she should care for me was too preposterous an idea to be nourished, and indeed it was better—much better—that M. de Montrésor had come before, grown sanguine, as lovers will, I had again earned her scorn by showing her what my heart contained. Much better was it that I should pass forever out of her life—as indeed methought I was like to pass out of all life—whilst I could leave in her mind a kind remembrance and a grateful regret free from the stain that a subsequent possible presumption of mine might have cast o'er it.

Then my thoughts shifted to Andrea. St. Auban would hear of my removal, and I cared not to think of what profit he might derive from it. To Yvonne also his presence must hereafter be a menace, and in that wherein to-night he had failed, he might, again, succeed. It was at this juncture of my reverie that M. de Montrésor's pleasant young voice aroused me.

"You appear downcast, M. de Luynes."

"I downcast!" I echoed, throwing back my head, and laughing. "Nay, I was but thinking."

"Believe me, M. de Luynes," he said kindly, "when I tell you that it grieves me to be charged with this matter. I have done my best to capture you; that was my duty. But I should have rejoiced had I failed, with the consciousness of having done all in my power."

"Thanks, Montrésor," I murmured, and silence followed.

"I have been thinking, Monsieur," he went on presently, "that possibly the absence of your sword causes you discomfort."

"Eh? Discomfort? It does, right truly!"

"Give me your word of honour that you will attempt no escape, and not only shall your sword be returned to you, but you shall travel to Paris with all comfort and dignity."

Now so amazed was I, that I paused to stare at the officer who was young enough to make such a proposal to a man of my reputation. He turned his face towards me, and in the moonlight I could make out his questioning glance.

"Well, Monsieur?"

"I am more than grateful to you, M. de Montrésor," I replied, "and I freely give you my word of honour to seek no means of eluding you, nor to avail myself of any that may be presented to me."

I said this loud enough for those behind to hear, so that no surprise was evinced when the lieutenant bade the man who bore my sword return it to me.

If he who may chance to read these simple pages shall have gathered aught of my character from their perusal, he will marvel perchance that I should give the lieutenant my word of honour, instead rather of watching for an opportunity to at least attempt an escape. Preeminent in my thoughts, however, stood at that moment the necessity to remove St. Auban, and methought that by acting as I did, I saw a way by which haply I might accomplish this. What might thereafter befall me seemed of little moment.

"M. de Montrésor," I said presently, "your kindness impels me to set a further tax upon your generosity."

"That is, Monsieur?"

"Bid your men fall back a little, and I will tell you."

He made a sign to his troopers, and when the distance between us had been sufficiently widened, I began:

"There is a man at present across the river yonder who has done me no little injury, and with him I have an appointment at nine o'clock to-night at St. Sulpice des Reaux, where our swords are to determine the difference between us. I crave, Monsieur, your permission to keep that appointment."

"Impossible," he answered curtly.

I took a deep breath, like a man who is about to jump an obstacle in his path.

"Why impossible, Monsieur?"

"Because you are a prisoner, and therefore no longer under obligation to keep appointments."

"How would you feel, Montrésor, if burning to be avenged upon a man who had done you irreparable wrong, you were arrested an hour before the time at which you were to meet this man, sword in hand, and your captor—whose leave you craved to keep the assignation—answered you with the word 'impossible'?"

"Yes, yes, Monsieur," he replied impatiently. "But you forget my position. Let us suppose that I allow you to go to St. Sulpice des Reaux! What if you do not return?"

"You mistrust me?" I exclaimed, my hopes melting.

"You misapprehend me. I mean, what if you are killed?"

"I do not think that I shall be?."

"Ah! But what if you are What shall I say to my Lord Cardinal?"

"Oh, tell him that I am dead, and that he is saved the trouble of hanging me. The most he can want of me is my life. Let us suppose that you had come an hour later. You would have been forced to wait until after the encounter, and did I fall, matters would be no different."

The young man fell to thinking, but I, knowing that it is not well to let the young ponder overlong if you would bend them to your wishes, broke in upon his reflections.

"Yes, Montrésor, yonder are the lights of Blois; by eight o'clock we shall be in the town. Come, grant me leave to cross the Loire, and by ten o'clock, or half-past at the latest, I shall return to sup with you, or I shall be dead. I swear it."

"Were I in your position," he answered musingly, "I know how I would be treated, and, by Heaven, come what may, I shall deal with you accordingly. You may go to your assignation, M. de Luynes, and may God prosper you!"

And thus it came to pass that shortly after eight o'clock, albeit a prisoner, I rode into the courtyard of the Lys de France, and alighting, I stepped across the threshold of the inn, and strode up to a table at which I had espied Michelot. He sat nursing a huge measure of wine, into the depths of which he was gazing pensively, with an expression so glum upon his weatherbeaten countenance that it defies depiction. So deep was he in his meditations, that albeit I stood by the table surveying him for a full minute, he took no heed of me.

"Come, Michelot!" I said at length. "Wake up."

He started up with a cry of amazement; surprise chased away the grief that had been on his face, and a moment later joy unfeigned and good to see took the place of surprise.

"You have escaped, Monsieur!" he cried and albeit caution made him utter the words beneath his breath, a shout seemed to lurk somewhere in the whisper.

Pressing his hand, I sat down and briefly told him how matters stood, and how I came to be for the moment free. And when I had done I bade him, since his wound had not proved serious, to get his hat and cloak and go with me to find a boat.

He obeyed me and a quarter of an hour after we had quitted the hostelry he was rowing me across the stream, whilst wrapped in my cloak I sat in the stern, thinking of Yvonne.

"Monsieur," said Michelot, "observe how swift is the stream. If I were to let the boat drift we should be at Tours to-morrow, and from there it would be easy to defy pursuit. We have enough money to reach Spain. What say you, Monsieur?"

"Say, you rascal? Why, bend your back to the work, and set me ashore by St. Sulpice in a quarter of an hour, or I'll forget that you have been my friend. Would you see me dishonoured?"

"Sooner than see you dead," he grumbled, as he resumed his task. Thereafter, whilst he rowed, Michelot entertained me with some quaint ideas touching that which fine gentlemen call honour, and to what sorry passes it was wont to bring them, concluding by thanking God that he was no gentleman and had no honour to lead him into mischief.

At last, howbeit, our journey came to an end, and I sprang ashore at some five hundred paces from the little chapel, and almost exactly opposite the Château de Canaples. I stood for a moment gazing across the water at the lighted windows of the Château, wondering which of those eyes that looked out upon the night might be that of Yvonne's chamber.

Then, bidding Michelot await me, or follow did I not return in half-an-hour, I turned and moved away towards the chapel.

There is a clearing in front of the little white edifice which, rather than a temple, is but a monument to the martyr who is said to have perished on that spot in the days before Clovis. As I advanced into the centre of this open patch of ground, and stood clear of the black silhouettes of the trees, cast about me by the moon, two men appeared to detach themselves from the side wall of the chapel and advanced to meet me.

Albeit they were wrapped in their cloaks, up-tilted behind by their protruding scabbards, it was not difficult to tell the tall figure and stately bearing of St. Auban and the mincing gait of Vilmorin.

I doffed my hat in a grave salutation, which was courteously returned.

"I trust, Messieurs, that I have not kept you waiting?"

"I was on the point of expressing that very hope, Monsieur," returned St. Auban. "We have but arrived. Do you come alone?"

"As you perceive."

"Hum! M. le Vicomte then will act for both of us."

I bowed in token of my satisfaction, and without more ado cast aside my cloak, pleased to see that the affair was to be conducted with decency and politeness, as such matters should ever be conducted, albeit that impoliteness may have marked their origin.

The Marquis having followed my example, and divested himself of his cloak and hat, unsheathed his rapier and delivered it to Vilmorin, who came across with it to where I stood. When he was close to me, I saw that he was deadly pale, his teeth chattered, and the hand that held the weapon shook as with the palsy.

"M-Monsieur," he stammered, "will it please you to lend me your sword, that I m-measure it?"

"What formalities!" I exclaimed, with an amused smile as I complied with his request. "I am afraid you have caught a chill, Vicomte. The night air is little suited to health so delicate."

He answered me with a baleful glance, as silently he took my sword and set it, point to hilt, with St. Auban's. He appeared to have found some slight difference in the length, for he took two steps away from me, holding the weapons well in the light, where for a moment he surveyed them attentively. His hand shook so, that the blades clattered one against the other the while. But, of a sudden, taking both rapiers by the hilt, he struck the blades together with a ringing clash, then flung them both behind him as far as he could contrive, leaving me thunderstruck with amazement and marvelling whether fear had robbed him of his wits.

Not until I perceived that the trees around me appeared to spring into life did it occur to me that the clashing of blades was a signal, and that I was trapped. With the realisation of it I was upon Vilmorin in a bound, and with both hands I had caught the dog by the throat before he thought of flight. The violence of my onslaught bore him to the ground, and I, not to release my choking grip, went with him.

For a moment we lay together where we had fallen, his slender body twisting and writhing under me, his swelling face upturned, and his protruding eyes horror-stricken gazing into mine, that were fierce and pitiless. Voices rang above me; some one stooped and strove to pluck me from my victim; then below the left shoulder I felt a sting of pain, first cold then hot, and I knew that I had been stabbed. Again I felt the blade thrust in, lower down and driven deeper; then as the knife was for the second time withdrawn, and my flesh sucked at the steel, the pain of it sent a shudder through me, the instinct of preservation overcame the sweet lust to strangle Vilmorin. I let him go, and staggering to my feet, I turned to face those murderers who struck a defenceless man behind.

Swords gleamed around me; one, two, three, four, five, six I counted, and stood weak and dazed from loss of blood, gazing stupidly at the white blades. Had I but had my sword I should have laid about me, and gone down beneath their blows as befits a soldier. But the absence of that trusty friend left me limp and helpless, cowed for the first time since I had borne arms.

Of a sudden I became aware that St. Auban stood opposite me, hand on hip, surveying me with a malicious leer. As our eyes met, "So, master meddler," quoth he mockingly, "you crow less lustily than is your wont."

My arms were gripped from behind, and in my spent condition I was held there powerless at the Marquis' mercy.

"Hound!" I gasped, choking with rage. "If you are a man—if there be a spark of pride or honour left in your lying, cowardly soul, order your assassins to give me my sword, and wounded though I be, I'll fight with you this duel that you lured me here to fight."

He laughed harshly.

"I told you but this morning, Master de Luynes, that a St. Auban does not fight a man of your stamp. You forced this affair upon me; you shall reap the consequences."

Despite the weakness arising from loss of blood, I sprang towards him, beside my self with fury. But ere I had covered half the distance that lay betwixt us, my arms were gripped from behind, and in my spent condition I was held there, powerless, at the Marquis' mercy. He came slowly forward until we were but some two feet apart. For a second he stood leering at me, then raising his hand, he struck me—struck a man whose arms another held—full upon the face. Passion for the moment lent me strength, and in that moment I had wrenched my right arm free and returned his blow with interest.

With an oath he got out a dagger that hung from his baldrick.

"Take that, you dog!" he snarled, burying the blade in my breast as he spoke.

"Oh, Heaven! You are murdering me!" I gasped.

"Have you discovered it? What penetration!" he retorted, and those about him laughed at his indecent jest.

He made a sign, and the man who had held me withdrew his hands. I staggered forward, deprived of his support, then a crashing blow took me across the head.

I swayed for an instant, and with arms upheld I clutched at the air, as if I sought, by hanging to it, to save myself from falling; then the moon appeared to go dark, a noise as of the sea beating upon its shore filled my ears, and I seemed to be falling, falling, falling.

A voice that buzzed and vibrated oddly, growing more distant at each word, reached me as I sank. "Come," it said, "fling that carrion into the river."

Then nothingness engulfed me.

CHAPTER XV.

Of My Resurrection.

EVEN as the blow which had plunged me into senselessness had imparted to me the sinking sensation which I have feebly endeavoured to depict, so did the first dim ray of returning consciousness bring with it the feeling that I was again being buoyed upwards through the thick waters that had enveloped me, to their surface, where intelligence and wakefulness awaited.

And as I felt myself borne up and up in that effortless ascension—my senses awake and my reason half-dormant—an exquisite sense of langour pervaded my whole being. Presently methought that the surface was gained at last, and an instinct impelled me to open my eyes upon the light, of which through closed lids I had become conscious.

I beheld a fair-sized room superbly furnished, and flooded with amber sunlight, suggestive in itself of warmth and luxury, and the vision of which heightened the delicious torpor that held me in thrall. The bed I lay upon was such, I told myself, as would not have disgraced a royal sleeper. It was upheld by great pillars of black oak, carved with a score of fantastic figures, and all around it, descending from the dome above, hung curtains of rich damask, drawn back at the side that looked upon the window. Near at hand stood a table laden with vials and such utensils as one sees by the bedside of the wealthy sick. All this I beheld in a languid, unreasoning fashion through my half-open lids, and albeit the luxury of the room and the fine linen of my bed told me that this was neither my Paris lodging in the Rue St. Antoine, nor yet my chamber at the hostelry of the Lys de France, still I taxed not my brain with any questions touching my whereabouts.

I closed me eyes, and I must have slept again, for when next I opened them a burly figure stood in the deep bay of the latticed window, looking out through the leaded panes. I recognised the stalwart frame of Michelot, and at last I asked myself where I might be. It did not occur to me that I had but to call him to receive an answer to that question. Instead, I closed my eyes again, and essayed to think. But just then there came a gentle scratching at the door, and I could hear Michelot tiptoeing across the room; next he and the one he had admitted tip-toed back towards my bedside, and as they came I caught a whisper in a voice that seemed to drag me to full consciousness.

"How fares the poor invalid this morning?"

"The fever is gone, Mademoiselle, and he may wake at any moment, indeed, it is strange that he should sleep so long."

"He will be the better for it when he does awaken. I will remain here while you rest, Michelot. My poor fellow, you are almost as worn out with your vigils as he is with the fever."

"Pooh, I am strong enough, Mademoiselle," he answered. "I will get a mouthful of food, and return, for I would be by when he wakes."

Then their voices sank so low that as they withdrew I caught not what was said. The door closed softly, and for a space there was silence, broken at last by a sigh above my head. With an answering sigh I opened wide my eyes, and feasted them upon the lovely face of Yvonne de Canaples, as she bent over me with a look of tenderness and pity that at once recalled to me our parting when I was arrested.

But suddenly meeting the stare of my gaze, she drew back with a half-stifled cry, whose meaning my dull wits sought not to interpret; but methought I caught from her lips the words, "Thank God!"

"Where am I, Mademoiselle?" I inquired, and the faintness of my voice amazed me.

"You know me!" she exclaimed, as though the thing were a miracle. Then coming forward again, and setting her cool, sweet hand upon my forehead, "Hush," she murmured, in the accents one might use to soothe a child. "You are at Canaples, among friends. Now sleep."

"At Canaples!" I echoed. "How came I here? I am a prisoner, am I not?"

"A prisoner!" she exclaimed. "No, no, you are not a prisoner. You are among friends."

"Did I then but dream that Montrésor arrested me yesterday on the road to Meung? Ah! I recollect! M. de Montrésor gave me leave on my word of honour to go to Reaux."

Then, like an avalanche, remembrance swept down upon me, and my memory drew a vivid picture of the happenings at St. Sulpice.

"Good Heavens!" I cried. "Am I not dead, then?" And I sought to struggle up into a sitting posture, but that gentle hand upon my forehead restrained, and robbed me of all will that was not hers.

"Hush, Monsieur," she said softly. "Lie still. By a miracle and the faithfulness of Michelot you live. Be thankful, be content, and sleep."

"But my wounds, Mademoiselle?" I inquired feebly.

"They are healed."

"Healed?" quoth I, and in my amazement my voice sounded louder than it had yet done since my awakening. "Healed? Three such wounds as I took last night, to say naught of a broken head, healed?"

"'Twas not last night, Monsieur."

"Not last night? Was it not last night that I went to Reaux?"

"It is nearly a month since that took place," she answered, with a smile. "For nearly a month have you lain unconscious upon that bed, with the angel of Death at your pillow. You have fought and won a silent battle. Now sleep, Monsieur, and ask no more questions until next you awaken, when Michelot shall tell you all that took place."

She held a glass to my lips, from which I drank gratefully, then, with the submissiveness of a babe, I obeyed her and slept.

As she had promised, it was Michelot who greeted me when next I opened my eyes, on the following day. There were tears in his eyes—eyes that had looked grim and unmoved upon the horrors of the battle-field.

From him I learnt how, after they had flung me into the river, deeming me dead already, St. Auban and his men had made off. The swift stream swirled me along towards the spot where, in the boat, Michelot awaited my return, all unconscious of what was taking place. He had heard the splash, and had suddenly stood up, on the point of going ashore, when my body rose within a few feet of him. He spoke of the agony of mind wherewith he had suddenly stretched forth and clutched me by my doublet, fearing that I was indeed dead. He had lifted me into the boat to find that my heart still beat, and that the blood flowed from my wounds. These he had there and then bound up in the only rude fashion he was master of, and forthwith, thinking of Andrea and the Chevalier de Canaples, who were my friends, and of Mademoiselle who was my debtor, also seeing that the Château was the nearest place, he had rowed straight across to Canaples, and there I had lain during the four weeks that had elapsed, nursed by Mademoiselle, Andrea, and himself, and thus won back to life.

Ah, Heaven! How good it was to know that some one there was still who cared for worthless Gaston de Luynes a little—enough to watch beside him and withhold his soul from the grim claws of Death.

"What of M. de St. Auban?" I inquired presently.

"He has not been seen since that night. Probably he feared that did he come to Blois, the Chevalier would find means of punishing him for the attempted abduction of Mademoiselle."

"Ah, then Andrea is safe?"

As if in answer to my question, the lad entered at that moment, and upon seeing me sitting up, talking to Michelot, he uttered an exclamation of joy, and hurried forward to my bedside.

"Gaston, dear friend!" he cried, as he took my hand—and a thin withered hand it was.

We talked long together, we three, and anon we were joined by the Chevalier de Canaples, who offered me also, in his hesitating manner, his felicitations. And with me they lingered until Yvonne came to drive them with protestations from my bedside.

Such, in brief, was the manner of my resurrection. For a week or so I still kept my chamber; then, one day, towards the middle of April, the weather being warm and the sun bright, Michelot assisted me to don my clothes, which hung strangely empty upon my gaunt, emaciated frame, and leaning heavily upon my faithful henchman, I made my way below.

In the salon I found the Chevalier de Canaples with Mesdemoiselles and Andrea awaiting me, and the kindness wherewith they overwhelmed me as I sat propped up with pillows was such that I asked myself again and again if indeed I was that same Gaston de Luynes who, but a little while ago, had held himself as destitute of friends as he was of fortune. I was the pampered hero of the hour, and even little Geneviève had a sunny smile and a kind word for me.

Thereafter my recovery progressed with great strides, and gradually, day by day, I felt more like my vigorous old self. They were happy days, for Mademoiselle was often at my side, and ever kind to me; so kind was she, that presently, as my strength grew, there fell a great cloud athwart my happiness—the thought that soon I must leave Canaples, never to return there; leave Mademoiselle's presence, never to come into it again.

I was Monsieur de Montrésor's prisoner. I had learnt that in common with all others, save those at Canaples, he deemed me dead, and that, informed of it by a message from St.

Auban, he had returned to Paris on the day following that of my journey to Reaux. Nevertheless, since I lived, he had my word of honour, and it was my duty, so soon as I had regained sufficient strength, to journey to Paris, and deliver myself into his hands.

On the last day of April I essayed a fencing bout with Andrea, and so strong and supple did I prove myself that I was forced to realise that the time was come.

As I was on the point of returning indoors, with the foils under my arm, Andrea called me back.

"Gaston, I have something of importance to say to you. Will you take a turn with me down yonder by the river."

There was a serious, almost nervous look on his comely face, which arrested my attention. I dropped the foils, and taking his arm, I went with him as he bid me. We seated ourselves on the grass, by the edge of the gurgling waters, and he began:

"It is now two months since we came to Blois—I to pay my court to the wealthy Mademoiselle de Canaples; you to watch over and protect me—nay, you need not interrupt me. Michelot has told me what St. Auban sought here, and the true motives of your journey to St. Sulpice. Never shall I be able to sufficiently prove my gratitude to you, my poor Gaston. But tell me, dear friend, you who from the outset saw how matters stood, why did you not inform St. Auban that he had no cause to hunt me down since I intended not to come betwixt him and Yvonne?"

"Merciful Heavens!" I exclaimed, "that little fair-haired coquette has——"

"Gaston," he interrupted, "You go too fast. I love Geneviève de Canaples. I have loved her, I think, since the moment I beheld her in the inn at Choisy, and what is more, she loves me."

"So that?" I asked with an ill-repressed sneer.

"We have plighted our troth, and with her father's sanction, or without it, she will do me the honour to become my wife."

"Admirable!" I exclaimed. "And my Lord Cardinal?"

"May hang himself on his stole for aught I care."

"Ah! Truly a dutiful expression for a nephew who has thwarted his uncle's plans."

"My uncle's plans are like himself, cold and selfish in their ambition."

"Andrea, Andrea! Whatever your uncle may be, to those of your blood, at least, he was never selfish."

"Not selfish!" he cried. "Think you that he is enriching and contracting great alliances for us because he loves us? No, no, our uncle seeks to gain our support, and with it the support of those noble houses to which he is allying us. The nobility opposes him, therefore he seeks to find relatives among noblemen, so that he may weather the storm of which his far-seeing eyes have already detected the first dim clouds. What to him are my feelings, my inclinations, my affections? Things of no moment, to be sacrificed so that I may serve him in the manner that will bring him the most profit. Yet you call him not selfish! Were he not selfish I should go to him and say, 'I love Geneviève de Canaples. Create me Duke, as you would do did I wed her sister, and the Chevalier de Canaples will not withstand our union.' What think you would be his answer?"

"I have a shrewd idea what his answer would be," I replied slowly. "Also I have a shrewd idea of what he will say when he learns in what manner you have defied his wishes."

"He can but order me away from Court, or, at most, banish me from France."

"And then what will become of you—of you and your wife?"

"What is to become of us," he cried, in a tone that was almost of anger. "Think you that I am a pauper dependent upon my uncle's bounty? I have an estate near Palermo, which for all that it does not yield riches, is yet sufficient to enable us to live with dignity and comfort."

"Well, well," said I. "If you are resolved upon it, it is ended."

He appeared to meditate for a moment, then:

"We have decided to be married by the Curé of St. Innocent on the day after to-morrow."

"My faith!" I answered, with a whistle, "you have wasted no time in determining your plans. Does Yvonne know of it?"

"We have dared tell nobody," he replied, and a moment later he added, hesitatingly, "you, I know, will not betray us."

"Do you know me so little that you doubt me on that score? Have no fear, Andrea, I shall not speak. Besides, to-morrow or the next day at latest, I leave Canaples."

"You do not mean that you are returning to the Lys de France?"

"No. I am going farther than that. I am going to Paris."

"To Paris?"

"To Paris, to deliver myself up to M. de Montrésor, who gave me leave to go to Reaux some seven weeks ago."

"But it is madness, Gaston!" he ejaculated.

"All virtue is madness in a world so sinful; nevertheless, I go. In a measure I am glad that things have fallen out with you as they have done; for when the news goes abroad that you have married Geneviève de Canaples, and left the heiress free, your enemies will vanish, and you will have no further need of me."

He sat in silence, casting pebbles into the stream, and watching the ripples they made upon the surface of the waters.

"Now sleep, Monsieur, and ask no more questions until next you awaken."

"Have you told Mademoiselle?" he asked at length.

"Not yet. I shall tell her to-day. You also, Andrea, must take her into your confidence touching your approaching marriage. That she will prove a good friend to you, I am assured."

"But what reason shall I give for my secrecy?" he inquired.

"Give no reason," I answered. "Let Geneviève tell her of what you contemplate, and if a reason she must have, let Geneviève bid her come to me. This much will I do for you in the matter; indeed, Andrea, it is the last service I am like to render you."

"Sh! Here comes the Chevalier. She shall be told to-day."

Mr. Wilson's Experiences as a Tree Trimmer.

"WHAT are you going to do with that saw, Henry?" asked Mrs. Wilson of her husband, who was walking round the yard looking up at the top of the trees and whistling.

"Well, Mrs. Wilson, I am thinking seriously of trimming these trees," he replied, as he slapped his leg with the saw, and, turning his head to one side, he gazed steadfastly at the top of a tree, at the same time gleefully raising the tone of his whistle a few notes higher.

"You will do wonders, trimming trees. How will you get up there?" she sneeringly observed.

"Madam, I am no boy to shin up there, and not being endowed with wings, I expect to use an ordinary ladder," he meditatively replied.

"You will break your neck—that is what you will do," she asserted.

"Madam, it's my neck, my tree, my ladder, and my climb. If I kill myself it will not cost you anything. All I ask of you is to go into the house and stay there. When I want any of your advice I will call on you for it," he loftily remarked.

"You are altogether too high-flown, Mr. Wilson. You may want some assistance before you finish this job. If you do you need not call on me for it," and the door slammed as she went into the house.

In a few minutes she came out and looked up at Wilson, who had just got himself into position and was sawing off a limb.

"Henry Wilson, do you know that you are standing with one foot on the piece that will drop to the ground? You will break your neck. Stop sawing this instant," she commanded.

"Mrs. Wilson, who is doing this sawing?" he asked, straightening up and giving his wife a withering look.

As he turned to resume his work the limb broke off with a crash. He caught a branch, and hung dangling, his feet about ten feet from the ground.

"Just as I expected," she cried, as she ran to the tree. "Shall I get a quilt for you to fall on, Henry?"

"No! Get a sheet of paper; or perhaps you might catch me in your apron," he sarcastically rejoined.

"If I had a clothes-prop I might push you over, so that you could reach the ladder. What will you do?" she inquired.

"Do you suppose I am going to hang here like a smoked ham, and let you punch me with a clothes-prop? If you were capable of making two moves in half a day, you might get the ladder round here in time for me to eat breakfast to-morrow morning!" he yelled.

"Hold on, Henry! I will think of something."

"Mrs. Wilson, are you going to do anything to help me down, or must I hang here till the wind changes, so that it will blow me over to the ladder? If you had stayed in the house and minded your own business, I would have been all right; but you cannot get along without interfering with someone. If you will bring the ladder round here, I will try to come down," he panted.

"I ought to go straight into the house and leave you, as a punishment for trying to lay the blame of this on to me," she indignantly replied.

"Great Scott, woman! are you going to stand there all day and make remarks? I am no monkey to hold on to this limb for a week. Get that ladder round here quick or I shall be on the ground," he shrieked.

She grasped the ladder, and struggled to drag it to where he was. It was all she could do to end it up, and as she was trying to ease it down by his side it slipped from her hands and fell against him. There was a smothered groan, a struggle on his part, and down came Wilson and ladder in a heap on the grass.

"Murdered! At last I'm done for!" came in agonised tones from under the ladder.

"Are you hurt, Henry?" she anxiously inquired.

"Hurt? No! It does not hurt to be knocked off a five-storey house, and then have the house on you! Oh, no I am not hurt!" and he groaned as he poked his head out between the rounds of the ladder.

"Are either of your legs or arms broken?" she asked as she attempted to remove the ladder, but only succeeded in striking his head with one of the side pieces.

"That is right, madam! Pound me over the head. Get the axe and finish me! I might live long enough to tell my friends how I met my death, and have my slayer brought to the bar of justice. Finish your job, madam. There is no one present to witness the consummation of your work!" he roared.

"If I were not a good Christian I would leave your home before the sun went down to-night. It does not seem as if I could endure your cruel taunts another day. So there," she snapped.

"Oh, ho! You are a Christian, are you? I would never have dreamed it. Do Christians knock their husbands out of trees with ladders? If they do, then you are a Christian. Is it the aim of your species of Christians to always be on the alert to murder their husbands? If that is the case, then you are a shining light in the society," he said, as he kicked the ladder off from himself, causing it to fall on Mrs. Wilson's feet.

"Oh, mercy, my feet! Henry Wilson, you did that on purpose! You dare not strike me, and you took that cowardly way for revenge! I will go home to ma! I will never live another day with you," and she began to sob.

"Now, madam, if you feel better, I wish you would step to the house and bring me my crutch and the liniment bottle, and I will try to get indoors," he remarked.

"If you sit there until I wait on you it will be quite late in the evening. If your leg is well enough to kick a ladder on to my feet, it is well enough to wait on yourself," she said, as she limped to the house and he limped away to the barn.

THE GREAT SHAH SYNDICATE.

ITS OBJECT—ITS DOINGS—ITS END.

CHAPTER I.

Its Object.

"THEN that's settled!" said the lean man, otherwise Mortimer Fitchett.

"Settled? Yes!" replied the stout man, known in his world as "Captain" Montague. "We're only waiting for the third man of the firm."

"Well—I've found him!"

"Found him! Where?"

"He'll be here in five minutes." (The speaker looked at his watch.) "That's good enough."

"You're a clever one, Fitchett!" said the "Captain." "But where did you pick him up? and—who is he?"

"I've never seen him. As to who he is, Heaven only knows. I don't!"

"You've given our game away to a stranger!" blurted out the other, his face white with apprehension of the strictly self-preservative sort.

"Is Mort. Fitchett a dog that he should do this thing? No! Listen! You know Garraway—'Uncle' Ben—who we badly wanted for a third, but who wouldn't? Well, I met him two days ago in the 'Shamrock,' Jermyn Street."

"You didn't tell me."

"Didn't think it necessary. Garraway said that though he wasn't touching the thing himself, he knew a man—a safe man—who, if I liked, would, he thought, be willing to join the board."

"And you?"

"Well; I did like. 'Uncle' put me on the telephone, at Maiden Lane, in talk with this Lester Wylde (he's a Yank, by the way); and in less than ten minutes, by means of the 'code'—which shows he knows us—we came to terms; he finally agreeing to come here at noon sharp to—— Ah, here he is!"

There had been no audible footsteps on the stairs; no knocking at the room door; no self-announcement. Quietly, silently as a shadow, an uprightly-tall, hatchet-faced, well-dressed man opened the door and noiselessly shut it again.

Then, taking a seat at the table, he, without removing his hat, deliberately lit a cigar and blew a long dense cloud of tobacco-smoke.

"Time?"

He uttered this one word below his breath almost; a faint, and almost enigmatical smile playing about the corners of his firm, thin-lipped mouth.

"Mr. Wylde?" said Fitchett, interrogatively.

"Quite right!"

"Well, my name is Fitchett, and——"

"Your friend is Montague—I beg his pardon—'Captain' Montague."

"How do you know that?" queried Fitchett with suspicious quickness; while the "Captain"—who always played second to his lean acquaintance—regarded the visitor with uneasy bewilderment.

"Gentlemen," said Lester Wylde, "this is child's play. Both of you, I can assure you, are too well-known in our circle, to be unfamiliar by name and reputation to me. Please let us to business, for I have a matter of importance to attend to in an hour from now."

"Well, it's like this, Mr. Wylde," said Fitchett, "Ben Garraway has told us that you're a 'square' member, and one who would be likely to go in with us—with the 'Captain' and myself, that is—in a little thing we've got on here just now. All we want is a chap that knows a bit about the East, and can palaver with the natives of——"

"Persia, for instance; yes, I see."

"Persia! Who said Persia?"

"You did—or at least you were going to."

"The dickens!" muttered the "Captain" under his breath, and kicking Fitchett's foot under the table.

"Perhaps you know a little more, as you know so much?" said Fitchett.

"Perhaps I do. But it isn't at all wonderful that I do, seeing that 'Uncle' Ben gave me the outline of your scheme this morning."

"Ah! very good! Ha! ha!" laughed the "Captain"; but a keen observer would have certainly detected an air of disquietude about the gallant gentleman, spite his assumption of hilarity.

"Look here!" said Fitchett, smartly smiting the table with his open palm. "Whether you know it or not, I'll tell you what we propose doing, and leave it to you to join us or not, as you like."

"That's fair!" remarked Wylde.

"You've heard, then," said the lean man, "that the Shah of Persia is, financially, at present in a very bad way?"

"Yes, I've heard that."

"Well, it seems that money is so scarce with him that he's hard put to it to find the cash to buy even a new suit of clothes. Not a shopkeeper in Teheran will trust him; while, to make matters worse for him, his ministers not only keep him a prisoner in his own palace, but do all they can to incite the feelings of his subjects against him."

"Yes. All this is common talk at home and abroad; come to the cream of your ideas."

"It's this. The Shah has belonging to him, as head of the State, something approaching to thirty millions' worth or more of diamonds, and other precious stones and things. We know, the 'Captain' and I, from a Persian, who was lately in the Sailors' Home for Asiatics, but who is now dead, exactly where these jewels are kept, and how they might be transferred to our hands, and brought away to Europe."

"Ah! and what plan do you propose by which to effect this?"

Digitized by Google

"This: We are for the time a Financial Syndicate, having for its object the helping of the Shah out of his pecuniary troubles. One of us—you, if you join us, as you are acquainted with that part of the world—journeys to Teheran, obtains audience of the Shah, and proffers the assistance of the Syndicate. Once inside the Palace, and on terms of intimacy with the monarch, we believe, with the knowledge I have referred to, that the thing could be done."

"—'m—perhaps it could. Up to the present, however, I fail to see what part you two gentlemen are to play in the matter?"

"Why," said Montague, a trifle irritably, "we find the money, and accompany you to India, waiting for you in the Ameer's capital."

"Then, as I understand it, you leave the details of the actual acquisition of the treasure to me. Is that so?"

"Well, yes in a way," said Fitchett. "Ben Garraway declares that there is no other man living who could better carry the thing through."

"Much obliged, I'm sure, to 'Uncle', and I shall certainly do my best to deserve his commendation. Now, as to terms, what do you offer?"

"A third of the profits," replied Fitchett. "The sum of two thousand pounds to be paid to you on leaving us at Calcutta, from which point you will journey alone to the Persian capital. This sum will be for travelling and other expenses besides for the necessary 'golden keys' after your arrival at Teheran."

"I see. Well—I accept. When do we start?"

"A week to-morrow," said the "Captain." "You will meet us at Southampton. We shall be at the 'Neptune' hotel, in the names of Doctor Marwick and Professor Hall, scientists proceeding to India. You will join us as our secretary, and play that rôle till we part at Calcutta. We shall expect you at noon of that day."

"Good! I will be there," said Lester Wylde, rising. "Good morning, my dear partners!"

"Wait!" said the "Captain," as he touched the electric-bell knob.

"Waiter, a bottle of 'extra dry'!"

In another minute it was brought, opened, and debottled.

"Gentlemen," said the "Captain," raising his glass, "Success to the Great Shah Syndicate!"

Each man drained his glass; five minutes later the three, descended the steps of the private hotel in Bishopsgate Street Within, that had been the scene of the meeting; the lean man and his stout comrade turning to go towards Liverpool Street, while Lester Wylde, hailing a hansom, drove rapidly away in the opposite direction.

"Paulton Square, Chelsea, Number seventeen," he had called to the driver through the trap; and as he bowled along westwards, he more than once exultantly exclaimed amid the roar of the traffic:

"Now, Edie, my girl! here's your chance; and it won't be your fault, I know, if you don't make the most of it!"

CHAPTER II.

Its Doings.

AT the railway terminus in Calcutta, three men stood on the departure platform at the open door of a first-class carriage attached to the Northern Mail.

Two of them were talking earnestly to the third member of the group, who, beyond an occasional interjection, appeared to be utterly indifferent to everything and everybody.

"Now, look here, Wylde," said the leanest of the three, "we don't want to waste more time over this business than can be helped, so we shall look to see you on the date agreed upon at Jung Rao, the money-changer's house in Cabool, on the stroke of noon."

Lester Wylde removed the cigar from his lips.

"At noon of that day," he said, quietly rolling the "weed" with his thumb and forefinger, "you will see me—if alive; if anything should happen to me—well—you shall still hear of me."

"Captain" Montague shivered perceptibly at this latter suggestion.

"You won't fail! You can't fail!" he hurriedly remarked. "You've as much at stake as we have, barring preliminaries, so if it's only for your own sake you'll do your best for your own skin, and to bring off the deal."

"There!" said Fitchett querulously, "of course he will! Don't be a fool, Monty!"

No one of them save Wylde, had observed a young English girl of attractive personality—dark, piquant, petite, sitting, surrounded with feminine impedimenta, in a far corner of the carriage, and in the shadow of the darkened "jalousies."

Could the lean man and the stout but have witnessed the greeting of Wylde by the lady, as the train steamed out of the station, it would certainly have been an eye-opener for the precious pair.

"My dear," said Lester, "you have managed beautifully all through. Our two very clever friends have no more idea that the charming young lady, their fellow-passenger, and table acquaintance on board the Syria, was the little wife of Philip Lester, alias Lester Wylde, than that—well—that I am not that which I profess to be."

"Now, tell me," said the girl (she was barely twenty), "as we are alone, what you wish of me."

"It's very simple, Edie. On our arrival at Teheran—if we ever get there—I shall carry out so much of our friends' programme as relates to my character of confidential agent of the Syndicate, and as will be sufficient to gain me an entry into his Imperial Majesty's domestic preserves. You, then, at the proper moment will appear on the scene as an English lady doctor, who is desirous of establishing herself in the Shah's capital. This will, I think, as it did in the case of the late Ameer of Afghanistan, be more than agreeable to him—for English 'medicine' and its professors, are valued the world over."

"Yes—and then?"

"Then—it will be for you to create a feeling in the monarch's mind that he is suffering from some chronic malady or other; dose him well, and so on; but, above all, keep about him, and—well—worm out of him all you can relative to his treasures."

"I see. It's risky, Phil; but what about the other two—and—and you?"

"That's a secret, my dear—for the present. For myself, I shall always be within call of you, and at the precise moment when you signify that you have got the "Open Sesame" I shall be ready to avail myself of the opportunity, and to bring you off with what we have come for!"

* * * * *

For once, things worked themselves out just as Wylde had planned.

Arrived at Teheran, he sought the good offices (backing his efforts with a vigorous twist of the "golden key") of one of the Shah's most influential ministers, the Deputy Grand Vizier.

There was evidently some connection between this individual and Jung Tao of Cabool, for the latter's name mentioned, as per Fitchett's instructions, the Persian official was not only amenable, but deferential.

The next day but one after his interview with the Deputy, Wylde was admitted to an audience with the successor of Darius.

What actually took place on the occasion has never transpired.

The one important result was, however, the Royal command for the attendance, at an early date, of Doctor Edith Wells, at the Palace.

Things moved rapidly after this, in somewhat inverse ratio to the usual course of Eastern procedure, which is generally slow, and never sure.

Just three weeks after the instalment at Court of "Doctor" Wells as Lady Physician Extraordinary, Wylde, who, through his new friend the Deputy Vizier, had been in daily communication with his wife, received an intimation, through the same source that the "Open Sesame" was in her possession, and that if he would be at midnight on the outside of the garden gate leading into the private pavilion assigned to her for a residence, he would be conducted to her by a black deaf mute.

She would then give him such information as would enable him to remove without hindrance the bulk of the Imperial treasure.

Wylde, disguised in a "kaftan" and long native robe, his skin darkened to the necessary shade, at midnight stood in the shadow of the gate embrasure.

When the door cautiously opened a black hand and arm dragged him inside, and within three minutes he was in Edie's presence.

Then she told him how that a long underground tunnel led from the Shah's private apartment to the treasure-room immediately under the pavilion where they then were.

She had accidentally discovered this while attending upon his Majesty.

She had also, as accidentally, found out that an outlet to this tunnel existed, by means of a cunningly devised trap-door, in one of the rooms of the pavilion itself.

What followed is now matter of Persian history, although the main facts did not come out till many months after the event.

* * * * *

The caravan route through Bagdad and Damascus to Aleppo, is a roundabout way from Persia to Europe, and, more than that, a way full of ruts and pitfalls.

It is not often that Europeans travel by it, so that the spectacle of an Englishman and his wife, with five camel-loads of baggage, doing the journey as part and parcel of the ordinary caravan, was not only unusual but curious.

Between Aleppo and Marseilles there is an intermittent steamboat service, principally for mails.

By one of the boats of this line the Englishman and his wife travelled from Apello to the French port.

It is known that—staying in the city for a couple of days—the pair sailed, by a Messagerie Maritimes steamer, for New York.

There all traces of them were lost.

Six months later, one Cyrus Hoffman, and his beautiful young wife, established themselves in the City of the Golden Horn as social leaders of wealth beyond calculation.

Cyrus Hoffman is credited with having made his money in "Oil"; certainly he holds "Standard" oil shares to an amount equal almost to that possessed by another well-known American millionaire.

Mrs. Hoffman is celebrated for her diamonds, which exceed in beauty, brilliancy, number and value, anything ever before or nowadays seen throughout the American continent

CHAPTER III.

Its End.

MORTIMER FITCHETT and "Captain" Montague are sitting, one on either side the table, in the self-same private room at the hotel in Bishopsgate Street Within, where we first saw them.

They had been silent for some time.

On the table lay a letter, and it was easy to see, by the disgusted glances each man every now and then cast at it, that it was the prime cause of their depressed and miserable state of spirits.

"Monty," said Fitchett at last, "it's no use crying over it now it's done. We must make the best of it."

"Make the best of it!" retorted the other savagely. "It was you who introduced this Wylde into the scheme; it's you, therefore, that's responsible for its upset!"

"I know! I know! But how could I tell that Garraway was mistaken in his man? Well, he wasn't mistaken, in a way, for he went one better than us—that's all."

"All! Just think of us two fools, waiting, lamblike, in Cabool for a man and millions that were travelling as fast as money could take them in the very opposite direction. It's enough to make one commit suicide!"

"Well, you can do as you like. I'm just as mad as you are; and I've lost just as much as you, too; but, who knows, some day we may come across Mr. Lester Wylde, and—well, then it won't be good for him, I think—at least, speaking for myself, it won't!"

Here Fitchett took up the letter, and read it again.

The post-mark on the letter had been "Southampton," but in addition there were certain other marks notifying that the letter had been collected by the mail at sea.

It ran:—

"MY DEAR PARTNER —

"I have not very much to say, beyond thanking you very much for your kind furnishing of the means which have enabled me to successfully carry out the little Persian scheme, which I, myself, had had in mind for at least a year before you yourselves woke to the possibilities of it.

"I do not propose to return you your generous contribution to the sinews of war, as I am of opinion that a little 'backwater' of this sort will be a lesson to you, and a warning to you to be more careful in the future when taking in a 'third partner.'

"My wife, the lady next to whom 'Captain' you sat at table on board the Syria, joins with me in wishing you both all the future business success you undoubtedly deserve, only advising you, for your own sakes, and if you desire to retain your heads upon your shoulders, to strike out Persia from any list you may be forming of possible fields of operation.

"We shall often think of you, and at festival times drink many a bumper to the 'long life' and 'prosperity' of 'The Great ——— Syndicate'!

A Question - - - - of Guilt.

I.—Smoke.

On a certain wet February afternoon, not many years ago, Richard Monk, M.D., ascended the steps of the house in which lived his eccentric aunt, Miss Selina Rookwood, and rang the bell. The doctor's visit was in response to a note which he had received but a few hours previously, requesting him to call as soon as possible. When the young physician was ushered into his aunt's presence, that lady was just giving her companion certain shopping directions. He could not avoid overhearing the conclusion of her remarks, to the effect that "from the milliner's you go to the chemist's and ask him to make me up my medicine; while he is doing that go to the post-office and post the letters and buy me some stamps; from there go back to the chemist's, where the medicine will probably be ready; then stop at the railway station and see if those two parcels have arrived for me, and then come back at once—now, do you think that you can remember all that?" Upon receiving an affirmative reply, Kate Clare was told to go, and the old lady turned her attention to her nephew.

It has already been stated that Miss Selina Rookwood was eccentric; it should now be added that she was also very wealthy, and that her only near relation was her nephew. She was a tall, thin woman, with a nose resembling a beak and a voice that was remarkable for its shrillness. As she had never been able to secure a husband, she devoted her entire attention to entomological research, and the walls of her rooms were lined with glass cases in which reposed all classes of coleoptera and hymenoptera, with pins and needles stuck through their bodies. So extensive was her collection that she had been elected an honorary member of various entomological societies, and although scientists frequently paid her visits to examine her rare specimens of African and South American beetles and butterflies, she was without honour among the unappreciative townspeople, who irreverently styled her "the insect collector."

Miss Selina, moreover, had a very disagreeable way of letting her nephew know that her fortune, or at least the greater part of it, might be left to some museum or scientific body if he did not accede to her whims in every respect.

"So you have come at last," she snapped out; "you needn't take off your coat, for what I have to say will take but a very few moments, and it is probably the very last time that I shall ever care to see you or speak to you." Then, noticing a surprised look on her nephew's face, she continued: "Is all this true that I have heard, that you are engaged to be married to Prof. Strang's daughter? Didn't you think it worth your while to consult me first?"

"But, my dear aunt," he began.

"Don't 'dear aunt' me," she replied, and she worked herself into a passion that turned her face scarlet; "do you think that I would allow you to marry the daughter of that man? That man who ridicules my collections, and——"

"Really, Aunt Selina, won't you allow me to explain——"

"I want no explanation from you. Answer me, are you engaged to her or not?"

"My dear aunt, you should not excite yourself so, I——"

"Will you answer my question? Yes or no?"

"Yes, I am engaged to——"

"Then go!" she fairly screamed, and pointed with her long finger to the door. "Go, I say, and to-morrow I shall send for my lawyer, and have my will altered. What? Are you still here? Go! Go! I say!"

And Mr. Richard Monk, seeing what a passion she was in, and thinking that his presence would only excite her more, rapidly walked out of the house into the street.

II.—Sparks.

The afternoon had not advanced very far, and the doctor meditated as to where he should go next; he walked slowly down the street towards that portion of the town which was occupied chiefly by the shopkeepers. He was pale and nervous, irritated and undecided. His hands were in the pockets of his overcoat, and were both tightly clenched. Mechanically, he repeated his aunt's last words: "She said, 'to-morrow I shall send for my lawyer and have my will altered,' then there must be a will now, and I am evidently handsomely remembered. The new will which she intends to execute to-morrow will probably leave all or at least the greater part of her fortune to those butterfly-chasers and insect collectors. But if she shouldn't make a will then I——"

Glancing ahead he saw Kate Clare, his aunt's maid, entering the chemist's door. He waited patiently till she came out, and then approached the door and looked in.

Kate by this time had disappeared round the corner. Nobody was inside but the old chemist; he was a personal friend of the young doctor, and compounded nearly all of the latter's prescriptions. Doctor Monk went in, and sauntered to the back of the shop; he said good-afternoon to the proprietor.

The elder man noticed the pale appearance of the younger one, and remarked:

"Well, well, whatever is the matter? You look terribly shaken up. Better fix up something for yourself."

Monk replied to the effect that nothing was the matter with himself, and as the chemist was just beginning to compound the tonic for Miss Rookwood, he stood by his side and watched him. The prescription was written by a physician from a neighbouring town; it was dated some time previously, and was pasted in a large old-fashioned scrap-book. Monk could not avoid reading some of the ingredients—"Acid Tannic gr. i., Syr. Yerba Santo oz., iii, sulph. quin. gr. xliv."

The chemist had begun, and every few seconds he held his graduated glass above his head to see that the proportions were properly observed. Both men were hidden from view by a row of shelves on which reposed bottles, pots, and small jars. The younger man was now reading the titles, and could his thoughts have been photographed or printed, they would look something like this:

"Pretty good collection for such a small place—Yes, that solution is better than the other—ah, he didn't have that the other day—I must recommend him to get—hello; sulph. morph. and sulph. quin. side by side on the shelf—wouldn't do that—look exactly alike, too—if I—no, no, it's too horrible to think about——"

Why did the front door open at that moment and a customer enter? Why did the chemist hasten to the front of the shop to attend to him, leaving the prescription half-finished in the graded phial?

Dr. Monk's hands trembled violently as he helped himself to a glass of port wine, and when he left the shop a few minutes later, the chemist muttered:

"Well, he looked pretty badly shaken up when he came in, but now he looks like Robinson Crusoe did when he saw the footprints of the savages."

But then the old chemist did not know that his unfinished prescription had four grains of morphine added to it since he saw it last.

III.—Flame.

AT eight o'clock the next morning Dr. Monk received a message from Kate Clare informing him of the death of his aunt. He hastily dressed himself, and proceeded at once to her residence, where he found that a messenger had been dispatched for the coroner. Going to his aunt's room, he saw the old lady in her bed, white and rigid, and his professional knowledge told him that she had evidently been dead some hours.

On the table by her bedside stood a clock, a glass of water, some spoons, and several bottles of medicine. One of these he recognised by the label and date as coming from the local chemist. It was uncorked, and about a tablespoonful of the contents was missing. The Doctor carefully recorked it, and then slipped it into his inner overcoat pocket.

An inquest was held at ten o'clock the following morning.

The doctor was the first witness called. He described in detail the interview he had with his aunt on the preceding afternoon but one. To various queries he replied that he had repeatedly warned the deceased of the danger of rupturing a blood-vessel during one of her periods of uncontrollable temper; deceased could get into a rage about trifles; witness was not her family physician, and had never been consulted by her in a professional capacity; took no interest in entomological research himself, but had been the means on three or four occasions of enabling his aunt to add to her collections; did not know exactly how much money she had, but supposed it was considerable; had not seen her will, and could not state what disposition she intended to make of her property.

A juryman then asked:

"Now, doctor, when you left there on the afternoon preceding your aunt's death, did you seriously think that she would carry her threat of disinheriting you you into execution?"

"I seriously thought that if I stayed away for a week or ten days, and she heard nothing of my movements, she would probably relent to some extent; at least, I think she would have sent for me and made some concessions."

The coroner then asked:

"When was your marriage to Miss Fanny Strang to take place?"

"The exact date has not yet been fixed. This affair will, of course, postpone it for at least a year."

This ended the doctor's testimony, and several neighbours were next called upon to give their versions as to the habits and characteristics of the deceased. They all concurred that deceased had ungovernable outbursts of passion; in other respects she was an educated, well-bred woman.

The last witness summoned was Miss Kate Clare, and, in reply to queries, she stated that she was housekeeper, companion, and general maid-of-all-work to the deceased; did not know what passed between aunt and nephew that afternoon, as she had been sent into the town to do some shopping; scarcely a day passed that deceased had not scolded her for negligence or inattention, and sometimes for the merest trifles; deceased had not told her what passed when the doctor called; had called on her mistress shortly before she went to bed, and was ordered to leave the room at once, as it would be necessary for her to be up very early; deceased paid her wages promptly, and had frequently remarked that she would leave witness something; witness had weak lungs; physicians had informed her that consumption might develop.

The testimony closed here and the jury retired to the room where the dead woman lay. Neither the doctor nor Miss Clare had made any reference to the medicine which Miss Rookwood was accustomed to take. The last witness, in describing her movements that afternoon, did not think it necessary to inform the jurymen that she had called upon the chemist. Doctor Monk seemed surprised, when he heard her statement, but thought it best to say nothing. "Does she suspect me, and is she trying to shield me?" he asked himself.

The jury returned in about fifteen minutes, and brought in a verdict that "deceased had come to her death through heart disease, caused by undue excitement."

After Miss Selina Rookwood was buried, her will was produced by her lawyer, and when this document was read, it was discovered that with the exception of her entomological collections (which were bequeathed to some scientific institution), and a handsome legacy to Miss Clare, her entire possessions passed into the hands of her nephew. The latter sold the house, and by the advice of a fellow-physician, he went into Switzerland to repair his constitution.

IV.—Embers.

ABOUT four months after the events just narrated, Herr Andreas Fussli, the proprietor of Der Rothe Ochse, one of the smaller hotels situated on the single narrow street which the village of Zermatt possesses, was busily engaged in copying extracts from an "Improved Letter-Writer for Polite Correspondence." He found it a difficult matter to convey the information he desired to impart, as he was compelled to take portions of several letters in the book before him and fit them together. When, therefore, his writing was finished, it read as follows:

"Zermatt, June 26th, 19—.

"To the Hochwohlgeborone Fraulein Fanny Strang:

"Be prepared, my dear Fraulein, to receive information of a most unpleasant nature. Remember, as the Scriptures have it, that man is born to die and to be born again. It is with feelings consisting of an admixture of sorrow and commiseration that I must impart to you the news of the untimely demise of a certain Doctor Richard Monk, whose earthly remains now lie in my back parlour awaiting interment in the English cemetery. The doctor was brought here late last night, suffering from internal injuries, which he had received when he slipped from the steps cut in the snow-slope at the shoulder of the Matterhorn. A physician was immediately summoned, but the sufferer died shortly afterwards. He murmured your name several times, as well as the words 'ant' and 'morphine.' (Nota Bene.—It is too cold for ants in this place, and the physician would not give him any morphine.) Letters from you and a considerable sum of money were found in his clothes. I await your further instructions in this painful affair, and sign myself, your obedient servant.

"ANDREAS FUSSLI."

"Post Scriptum.—Pardon, if you please, any grammatical inaccuracies which in my epistle following may occur. My letter-writer did not possess any example to fit, and I alone, with my French-English Dictionnaire, did make him fit.

"P.S. Number 2.—I wish to say there is due to me the sum of francs 460. Shall I take this from Mr. Monk's trousers?

"P.S. Number 3.—Some of my cards I inclose if you should visit Zermatt. My prices are very reasonable, and I have a chef who was waiter in a London hotel once formerly."

V.—Ashes.

THE summer had gone and the death of Doctor Monk was no longer the subject which engaged the minds of the townspeople. The clergyman had briefly alluded to the affair in one of his sermons; Miss Strang was still mourning for her lover, and the property and money of Miss Selina Rookwood's nephew passed into the hands of some distant relative. The matter was pretty well forgotten, when it was as suddenly revived—this time once more through the medium of a letter which the chemist received. It was not only a letter but a confession of guilt from the conscience-stricken Miss Clare. This document was dated from Melbourne, and, after stating that the writer had seen the death of Doctor Monk, and that she herself was a victim of consumption, it concluded as follows:—

"Now that I know that I have not much longer to live, it is only fair that I make known to you a dreadful secret which weighs upon my mind. Miss Rookwood was always good to me and even remembered me in her will; otherwise I would be absolutely penniless to-day. I did not deserve such kindness, for I was the means of causing her death. She often scolded me for my negligence and disorderly methods, and on that fatal night she was the victim of my carelessness.

"On seeing her in bed that evening she was very excited and talked bitterly about her nephew; I attempted to quiet her, but she would listen to nothing from me, and finally ordered me to leave the room and go to bed as she would want me early in the morning. I did so, but omitted to give her the medicine which the doctor had strictly enjoined me to do, and which I had brought home with me in the afternoon. You know the rest; the next morning she was dead, and if she had taken her customary tonic, perhaps she would be alive to-day.

"The coroner's jury stated that she had expired from some apoplectic stroke caused by her outbursts of rage and her excited condition. But I know better. I was the first one to enter that room of death in the morning, and I saw the bottle of medicine there untouched and unopened. Thinking that I might be questioned at the inquest, I took out the cork, filled the tablespoon, and scattered the medicine on the floor. I left the nearly filled bottle and the spoon on the table. Afterwards both were missing, but I do not know who took them."

The writer then reiterated her sorrow, and the letter concluded with a wish that she hoped to be forgiven.

The chemist exonerated her from all blame, and when he showed the letter to the clergyman, he remarked:

"Poor girl, she should not have taken the matter so seriously. The fact that Miss Rookwood did not receive her usual tonic that night could scarcely have caused her death. By the way, do you know that that medicine was the cause of my losing my best graduated glass? Miss Clare came to me that afternoon, and I began to mix the ingredients for the prescription; I was called away for a few minutes, and when I resumed my work my graduated glass was standing close to the edge of the counter.

"Doctor Monk was there at the time, and he may have moved it. I reached above my head, somewhat in front of me, and took down the sulphate of quinine. As I did so my elbow struck the glass and knocked it on the floor. My finest glass was broken, the contents spilt all over, and I was compelled to make that prescription again—a thing that rarely happens to me."

HOW I USED MY INDIAN CLUBS.

THOUGH of a timid nature, I am proud of my muscular development, which I seek to increase by the regular use of Indian clubs.

On one memorable night, and one only, have I found it necessary to use one of those formidable weapons which habit has rendered familiar to my hand.

The grey of morning had just begun to steal into our bedchamber when Mrs. B. ejaculated with unusual vigour:

"Henry, Henry, they are in the drawing-room, and they have just knocked down the screen."

"My love," I was about to observe, "your imaginative powers have now arrived at the pitch of clairvoyance," when a noise from the room beneath us, as if all the fire-irons had gone off together with a bang, compelled me to acknowledge to myself that there was something in Mrs. B.'s alarms at last.

I trod downstairs as noiselessly as I could, and in almost utter darkness. The drawing-room door was ajar, and through the crevice I could distinguish, despite the gloom, as many as three muffled figures. They were all of them in black clothing, and each wore over his face a mask of crepe, fitting quite closely to his features.

I had never been confronted by anything so dreadful before. Mrs. B. had cried "Wolf!" so often, that I had almost ceased to believe in wolves of this description at all.

Unused to personal combat, and embarrassed by the novel circumstances under which I found myself, I was standing undecided on the landing, when I heard the well-known whispers of "Henry, Henry," from the upper storey. The burglars caught it also. They desisted from their occupation of examining the articles of value upon the chimney-piece, while their fiendish countenances relaxed into a hideous grin.

One of them stole cautiously towards the door where I was standing. I heard his burglarious feet, I heard the "Henry, Henry!" still going on from above stairs; I heard my own heart go pit-a-pat, pit-a-pat within me. It was one of those moments in which one lives a life.

The head of the creped marauder was projected cautiously round the door as if to listen. I poised my weapon, and brought it down with unerring aim upon his skull. He fell like a bullock beneath the axe, and I sped up to my bedchamber with all the noiselessness and celerity of a bird. It was I who locked the door this time, and pulled the washhand-stand, two boxes, and a chair against it with the speed of lightning.

Was Mrs. B. out of her mind with terror that, at such an hour as that, she should indulge in a paroxysm of mirth?

"Good gracious," I cried, "be calm my love; there are burglars in the house at last."

"My dear Henry," she answered, laughing so that the tears quite stood in her eyes, "I am very sorry; I tried to call you back. But, when I sent you downstairs, I quite forgot that this was the morning upon which I had ordered the sweeps!"

One of those gentlemen was at that moment lying underneath with his skull fractured, and it cost me £15 to get it mended.

Millionaire Carnegie's Opinion of Happiness.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie was interviewed the other day by a representative of the Church Family Newspaper. The conversation turned on the secret of happiness.

"Then the secret of happiness," queried the reporter, "is, in your opinion——"

"A good conscience and a good digestion," came the ready reply. Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness will ensure the latter, and by so doing have restored happiness in hundreds of cases, where disorder of the digestive system and liver, weakness, and Summer-end fag have rendered it impossible. All sufferers from digestive troubles and that used-up sensation known as Summer-end fag will find a forcible illustration of the curative power of Bile Beans in the following case: Miss May Musson lives at 26 Breach Road, Marlpool, Derbyshire. To-day she is enjoying splendid health, but she says—to use her own words to a Derbyshire Advertiser reporter:—"A short time back I was in a most deplorable condition. I was a sufferer from indigestion, anæmia, and debility. I did not have these ailments in small measure either! No matter what I ate, the pains after it were terrible. Indeed, I became so bad that I could not take a morsel of solid food.

"To such an extent did my strength fail, that if I walked a short distance I was thoroughly exhausted. Every little effort fagged me terribly, and caused me great distress. I had a severe pain in my left side which hurt me whenever I moved; and, what with one thing and another, I was far more like an old woman nearing the end of her days than a woman of 22 years. I was told that I had enlarged liver. Whatever it was which occasioned the pain I suffered, it seemed as if nothing I took would remove it. One day I saw Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness advertised in the newspapers, and made up my mind to give them a trial. When I had finished the first box I felt better and got more. Each box of Beans made me better and better until the neighbours began to notice how vastly I was improving. First one and then another would say, "You do look different now." Whatever I looked, I know I felt different; and in the end I was completely cured. Never in all my life have I felt so well as I do at the present moment. I am sure I owe my life to Charles Forde's Bile Beans and I do all I can to let others know of them." It is by effecting such cures as the above that Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness have made their world-wide reputation. They are without doubt superior to all known medicines for indigestion, anæmia, debility, summer-end fag, dizziness, liver and kidney disorders, constipation, piles, palpitation, headache, nervousness, all female ailments, blood impurities, rheumatism and sleeplessness. All chemists stock them or you may obtain direct from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, London, E.C., by sending price one and three half-pence or two and ninepence.

Short Stories That . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 27th. Postcards only, please.

Mother Knew.

TEACHER: "Willie, does your mother know that the buttons are off your coat?" Willie: "Yes'm, and she knows where they are, too." Teacher: "Where are they?" Willie: "They are on father's trousers."

Too Literal.

SCENE: A Coffee Room. Customer (who has been long waiting): "I say, waiter, how long will my chop be?" Waiter: "About four inches and a 'arf, sir!" (Customer is comforted.)

Outrageous.

"WHAT'S the matter, Brush? You look sad." "I am sad. I decorated a set of soup plates for Mrs. Hoodelle, and what do you suppose she did with them?" "Give it up. What?" "Used them for soup!"

A Musical Cupboard.

A LITTLE boy, on coming home from church where he had seen a person work the bellows of the organ, said to his mother, "Oh, mamma, I wish you had been at church to-day. Such fun! A man pumped music out of an old cupboard!"

Papa was a Coal Merchant.

"DOES it not throw a shade of bitterness into your heart," she said, "to see the trees all leafless, and to hear the wind sighing for ever in mournful monotony? Does it not make you feel that there is too much that is bleak in the world?" "No," he answered, "it weally does not." "Why?" "Because my papa is in the coal business."

A Good Advertisement.

"WHY do they not put up some protection, a rail, anything, in a dangerous spot like this?" inquired the personally conducted tourist on a mountain side in Switzerland. "Well," replied the guide; "there has been some talk about it; but the commune thought it would do harm to the neighbourhood. You see, an accident or two every season gets the place talked about."

Obeying the Priest.

AN Irishman made a sudden rush into a doctor's house, took from his pocket a soda-water bottle, filled to the brim with some pure liquid, and handing it across the counter, exclaimed: "There, doctor, sniff that, will you?" The doctor did as he was directed, and pronounced the liquid to be genuine whisky. "Thank you, doctor," said the Irishman. "Hand it to me again, if you please." The doctor again did as directed, and asked what he meant. "Och, thin," said Pat, "if you will have it, the priest told me not to drink any of this unless I got it from the doctor. So here's your health and the priest's health."

Could Tell the Difference Now.

VISITOR: "So your brother is taking lessons on the violin. Is he making progress?" Little Girl: "Yes, he's got so far now we can tell whether he is tuning or playing."

An "Up" One.

HE (who on her recommendation has sent her to choose her own birthday present): "Good gracious, six pounds for a bonnet! Why, you told me you could get one for ten shillings." She: "Yes, ten shillings and up. This is an 'up.'"

Natural Conclusion.

MR. SOFTLEIGH: "Tommy, do you really think your sister likes to see me better than she does Mr. Biggs?" Tommy: "I'm sure of it, for in the evenings when he's in the parlour she turns the light down so low she can't see him at all."

Paddy Had Him.

"OCH, now, an' pwhat are iggs to-day, Mister Doolan?" asked Paddy, entering the grocer's shop. "Eggs are eggs to-day," replied the shopman, looking triumphantly at two or three lady customers, who smiled sweetly. "Sure, an' I'm moighty glad to hear it. The last 'iggs I had from here were nearly chickens."

Too Industrious.

A SERVANT girl returned to the employment agency and said she had been discharged from her place because she was too industrious. "Why, how can that be? What did you do?" "Why, they told me to clean the house. I cleaned all upstairs, and then went down into the cellar and dusted and washed all the bottles in the wine cellar, and they discharged me!"

Sufficient Reason.

MAN (to acquaintance): "Hello, Grinsley, how are you getting on?" Grinsley: "So, so, only." Man: "Are you still running that woman's rights paper?" Grinsley: "No; I have given that up." Man: "Didn't pay, eh?" Grinsley: "Oh, yes; it paid very well." Man: "Why didn't you continue to run it?" Grinsley: "I got married."

Not His Heart.

THEY were sitting in the moonlight on the rocks. "Angelina," whispered Ernest. "you know I love you! Will you be mine?" "Alas, Ernest, I fear it cannot be!" "Ah," gasped Ernest, placing his hands on his breast, "broken at last!" "What?" screamed the girl, throwing her arms about his neck, and her breath coming in great panting sobs. "I did not mean it, Ernest! Oh, speak! Tell me what is broken! Is it your heart?" "No, my darling; only my collar-stud. I felt it slip."

They were Used to It.

THEY approached each other from opposite directions. One was pale as a ghost, the other red as fire. Presently they met, and, careless of the fact that dozens of eyes were upon them, they kissed each other. The meeting seemed to bring them perfect peace. But, alas and alack! they had been together scarcely twenty seconds when up came a man with a stick. He struck a sharp, quick blow, and the pale one was sent spinning several feet away. The other neither screamed nor fainted; there was no tear-shedding, no heart-breaking, no resentment, not even a murmur. Billiard-balls are used to that sort of thing.

IN CONFIDENCE.

Conducted by Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, care of the Editor of Short Stories.—MADGE MORRIS.]

"S. P. T."—Yours is certainly a difficult position. A girl who is always running after a man, and giving him presents, is quite sure to prove her own enemy, and defeat her own ends. As you really feel that you have no love to offer her, I should tell her so frankly, unpleasant though the task will be. Make your parents understand that she is not the sort of girl you could ever care for, and they will most probably cease to encourage her.

"Polly."—If both you and your lover are wishing to be friends again, and both feel diffident about saying so, I should advise you to write and tell him that you have come to the conclusion that it was very silly to quarrel over such a trifle as his younger brother seeing you home, and that you are willing to forgive and forget it if he is.

"Which is the best time to marry?" asks Ena. ——Whenever things seem opportune, my dear Ena. Few girls are inclined to sit down and ask themselves this question in cold blood. I should imagine that you are not engaged, or if so, have entered into the thing in a very philosophical spirit. Generally speaking, early spring is the best. Then you have all the external joys of Nature to accompany your realisation of love's dream. With all the outdoor recreations to share with each other, such as cycling, walking, driving, boating, the possibilities of any disturbance of that dream are less than if accompanied by the fog, cold, and damp of winter. And we all know how important it is to get over the early stages of marriage without a "tiff." Then when winter does come, you will have accustomed yourself to each other, and will take to fireside pleasures and winter enjoyments and responsibilities as a natural sequence and pleasant variant. But a marriage in winter, when all is drear and dark, when fog chokes one, when microbes are getting active, and household expenses and bothers are greater than in summer, may be the prelude to ill temper and perhaps divergence which joyous spring drives away. So, if your man did really pop the question under the mistletoe a week or so back, and you have an active interest in this question, I advise you to wait till Easter, when the new year will be old and pleasant enough to beam on you.

"Ethel" wants to know if a country girl is not more precluded from the chanced of meeting eligible suitors than a town girl?——Do not be despondent. Your case appears very much worse than it is. Living in the country is not necessarily prejudicial to a girl's meeting eligible suitors. In fact, I think the reverse is the case. You will find that the proportion of old maids in the country is less than in towns. Sooner or later the right man turns up, so don't be worried. Perhaps you do not meet so many men as a London girl, but perhaps you are all the better for that. Meeting a lot of men does not necessarily lead to marriage. I myself know a family of three girls who have all their lives lived in the remotest country districts. Now all are well and happily married. Had they lived in town they might have had many flirtations and become experts at that pastime, but is it not better to meet few men and true than many and unreliable? In the case of my friends, visits from men were few and far between, yet, somehow or other, when they did appear, they turned out to be, from a girl's point of view, worth a dozen of the town butterflies a London girl encounters.

You say "Maud H.," that you are engaged to a man who has been abroad for over four years, and yet you have allowed another man to make love to you and kiss you and have promised to marry him. How girls can be so deceitful, is beyond me! If you love him really better than the man you are engaged to, your only honourable course is to write and tell him that you are tired of waiting for him, and have decided to return all his gifts and letters, asking him to forgive the pain you have caused him. Think well, however, before doing this, as a man who persistently makes love to a girl, knowing her to be engaged to another, is guilty of such underhand conduct as proves him to be the sort of man not greatly to be trusted. No wonder you feel dissatisfied at what you have done.

"J. E. C." passed a young lady who bowed to him, without noticing her. It afterwards occurred to him that she was none other than a girl he loved when a boy. How can he remedy his apparent slight?——I should advise you to send a line to the lady on general subjects, wishing her a happy New Year, and mention incidentally that it only occurred to you after she had passed the other day that the young lady who smiled so sweetly was none other than herself, your early love, and attribute it to your short-sightedness. If you word it very nicely, she may overlook your offence, and perhaps ask you to tea, in which case you will be able to resume the love-making operations you had to break off previously.

IN these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium, No. 25—30," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, February 3rd, 1902.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

MAN'S INFLUENCE OVER MAN.

Remarkable Words on Personal Magnetism from an Eminent Divine.

No subject has excited so much interest or awakened so much discussion among thinking people of late as that of Personal Magnetism. It is worthy of note that clergymen, doctors, college presidents, and men of science everywhere are giving it deep thought. Many of them have openly certified to its wonderful powers. The outspoken words of the Rev. Paul Weller of Gorham, N.Y., in this connection will call forth no little additional comment.

REV. PAUL WELLER.

In answer to a personal letter from an intimate friend, asking if it were true that he (Rev. Mr. Weller) had become a firm believer in Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism Rev. Weller wrote:

"The facts are: The subject of Personal Magnetism or Hypnotism, to which I have devoted many years of study, was recently more forcibly than ever called to my attention through reading a scientific work on the subject, now being circulated by the New York Institute of Science of Rochester, N.Y.

"I am a minister of the Gospel, but I do not hesitate to say that the reading of that book and the subsequent study of its contents have worked an all-powerful, important and good influence over me. My recommendation of Personal Magnetism, a subject every man and woman may study with profit, is made after thorough investigation and with complete knowledge of its great value. I make this statement deliberately. The study of Personal Magnetism, as set forth in the admirable books I have mentioned above, should be next to the study of the Holy Bible.

"Personal Magnetism embodies all the laws governing man's influence over man. It is the power that makes men mould the minds of men. It turns life's failures into successes. It develops the latent powers of the will and makes one capable of the accomplishment of great deeds. I have received many letters on the subject, and to all writers I have answered: 'Write to the New York Institute of Science, Rochester, N.Y., asking for their scientific work on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism. It will be sent to you free of charge. If its perusal does as much for you as it did for me you will thank me the longest day you live for having called your attention to the book.'—Yours truly, (Rev.) PAUL WELLER."

It will only be necessary for you to send your request to the New York Institute of Science, Dept. V A 9, Rochester, N.Y., U.S.A., and you will receive the volume Rev. Paul Weller recommends by return mail. IT IS FREE. A penny postal card will bring it.

SHORT STORIES

No. 683.] For the Week Ending February 1st, 1902. [One Penny.

Apat, the Faithful.

A True and Exciting Story of the Malay States.

My husband, whom I will call Mr. Rose, had the misfortune to be employed in a certain anomalous branch of the British Government service called the Malay Native States Service.

We did not think it a misfortune when he first obtained an entry into the service—on the contrary, we were very much pleased; but that was only from ignorance of what awaited us.

The first station to which we were sent was bad enough; the second, of which I am going to speak, was worse. It was at Durian Sabatang, a wretched Chinese village, built on a flat mud swamp, about forty miles up the Perak river.

Our first sight of Durian Sabatang filled us with dismay. The Residency, or Government Bungalow, in which we were expected to live, was an ancient shed made of palm leaves, propped up on about fifty tottering legs made of the stems of palms. The shed was in so dilapidated a condition that no respectable English farmer would have put a respectable English cow into it. There was a ladder at the back and another at the front, by which the shed could be entered.

The so-called "garden" attached to this charming abode consisted of a flat strip of flower-border on each side of a straight, flat strip of road, about fifty yards in length, which led up to the house. These borders were planted with what were meant to be flowering shrubs, which, not being protected by any fence, were nibbled to mere stumps by stray goats. There was, however, a bit of swampy turf at the back of the residential shed, on which we eventually managed to play lawn-tennis under difficulties.

On entering the shed we were at once struck by the numerous gaps in the thatch. A storm of rain generally occurs once in twenty-four hours in the Straits Settlements, consequently it was not long before we had an opportunity of experiencing all the discomforts attendant on a leaky roof. There appeared to be about twelve permanent leaks; but, besides these, every now and then the wind would lift up a large piece of thatch bodily, while the rain poured as if from buckets through the temporary openings thus made. There were no ceilings to the rooms, the bedrooms were only formed by palm-leaf fences about eight feet high, something like the wattles used in Kent for inclosing sheep. The skeleton framework of poles, on which the thatch rested, was not veiled or disguised in any way.

All rights reserved.]

High up on these poles where they converged, among cobwebs so black and solid from age that they looked like pieces of cloth waving in the wind, sat rats of all sizes, eating, playing, and enjoying themselves thoroughly. I think they were the only creatures that did enjoy themselves thoroughly at Durian Sabatang. The cat gazed fiercely at them with glittering eyes from below; but not being gifted, like a sloth, with the power of hanging by her claws from the under side of a pole, she could not reach them. At first we used to amuse ourselves by throwing all sorts of missiles at the rats; but we never hit them, and only further damaged the frail roof, so we had to give that up.

The use of the shed's fifty legs soon became apparent. The first morning after our arrival, on looking out of the window-hole (windows there are none, of course, in so hot a climate), I saw the whole country was under water, and one of my poor hens, which I had brought with me from a former station, was floating past the house on the flood with all her new-born chickens. This flood was the result of a high tide from the sea, from which Durian Sabatang is not very distant as the crow flies. We had many such floods during my stay in this delectable swamp. The Kling gardener delighted in them, as they gave him an unfailing excuse for doing nothing. When asked why there were neither flowers nor vegetables in the garden, he always laid the blame on the floods.

It was, however, vexatious not to be able to grow vegetables at home, as none fit to eat were to be had in the squalid Chinese shops. As for fresh beef or mutton that was, of course, quite hopeless. Such a thing as a cow or a sheep had never been seen in Durian Sabatang. We lived, therefore, almost entirely on tinned meats, which were always much damaged by the climate before they reached us. We got so sick of them at last that often we let them go away from the table untouched, and preferred to starve. These tins had, most probably, been for many months in the Singapore shops, and a month in the tropics is more damaging than a year at home. A Singapore shopkeeper, unless he is greatly belied, looks on an order from a "junglewallah" as a Heaven-sent opportunity of getting rid of his unsaleable goods. He knows that the freight to the jungle is so heavy that the wretched victim will think twice before sending anything back.

Whene'er we took our walk abroad—for there was only one road in Durian Sabatang, and that only half-a-mile in length—we saw many hideous, nine-tenths-naked Chinese coolies, almost all with repulsive skin-diseases, and all without exception owning the most villainous countenances; they scowled at us with dulled looks, being opium-eaters to a man.

A large proportion of the Chinese population was generally in prison for some crime or other, and gangs of them might be seen walking about with chains on their legs, each gang under the charge of a small Malay policeman with a loaded gun. These convicts were generally considered by the British and Malays to be the flower of the Chinese community, the argument being that all Chinese are scoundrels deserving of prison, and that those who elude prison are merely more practised scoundrels than the rest.

Thus the convicts were much run after as washermen, and on one occasion, the superintendent of the police, being obliged to leave suddenly, put his house and all its contents under the charge of his pet convict, as being one of the few comparatively honest men in the place. The consequence was that this convict might be seen any day in the superintendent's verandah, lounging comfortably in a long chair, with his legs, iron chains and all, stuck up on the table, and a cigarette in his mouth. I believe, however, that the superintendent had no reason to regret his choice of a caretaker.

For society we had a fluctuating company of three at the most, all British. There was, I need scarcely say, no doctor among them. If any of the three fell ill and wished for medical advice, he had to send a boat up the river to ask leave of the Resident to go to Penang. The boat took about five days to go up the river, as it was against the stream, and about three to come back; so, even in case of the Resident's happening to be at home, and replying at once, there must still be eight days' delay at the very least before the invalid could get permission to go to Penang, and after that, possibly a whole fortnight might intervene before the steamer could arrive to take him. The diseases most common to Britishers in the tropics are fever, cholera, and sunstroke, any one of which may carry off a strong man in a few hours; but in this Government service it was looked upon as a crime for any officer, even though feeling himself at the point of death, to leave his post without the proper official eight days of delay. The theory in high official circles was that "an officer worth anything would always rather die at his post than leave it without permission."

As there was no doctor within reach, so also was there no Christian church in Durian Sabatang. The nearest church was at Penang, which was practically as far off as if it had been at Timbuctoo.

A trading steamer used to come once a fortnight, except when she broke down or went into dock. One or other of these misfortunes happened pretty frequently, and oh, the straining of the eyes down the river on the days when the steamer was expected, and the heartsick disappointment when she did not come; or, on the other hand, the wild tumult of delight when her whistle, faint and far off, but still unmistakable, was heard! It was not surprising that we felt so much excitement about her coming, as the whole of our comfort for a month depended on that single uncertain thread; she had a horrid way of going into dock without giving us poor dwellers in jungles the slightest warning, and when that was the case, we were literally half-starved until she came out again.

It is quite impossible in the tropics to keep a large stock of eatables and drinkables, as everything goes bad with the most frightful rapidity. The resources of Durian Sabatang itself, in the way of food, consisted of skinny fowls that had gained their livelihood by acting as scavengers in the streets; of river-fish, with a strong muddy flavour; and occasionally, as a great treat, of a piece of fresh pork, "butchered to make a Chinese holiday."

Besides stores, the steamer brought us letters and newspapers, and was our only means of communication with the outside world. The rest of the fortnight, when we had devoured our newspapers, was weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable, our lives being a burden to us through heat, ennui, and mosquitoes, of which last, of course, there were millions.

After we had vegetated in this miserable place for some months, we were electrified one night by hearing the whistle of a steamer. Who could it be? Mr. Rose looked out, saw the fiery eye of a small steam-launch gleaming in the blackness of the river, and went to meet the new arrival. It proved to be a young Englishman, slightly known to us, who had a thrilling tale to tell. The Chinese coolies at Lumut, to the number of many hundreds, were in open mutiny, he said, against the British, and he himself had fled for his life by night. Lumut, it should be mentioned, was a sugar estate at some distance, the owner of which had lately become bankrupt. Mr. Rose felt at first inclined to pooh-pooh the danger, though he thought it quite probable the coolies were justly irritated at not having their wages paid.

He, however, started with the young Englishman next morning for Lumut, taking with him a few Sikh police under a legalised ruffian of the name of Subadar Deen Mahomed, much valued by the Government officials on account of his strength of "character," i.e., his utter unscrupulousness as to the means which he employed for the attainment of their desires.

When Mr. Rose arrived at Lumut he found there was a good deal of truth in the young Englishman's report. The Chinese, though they could hardly as yet be called in open mutiny, were evidently ripe for it; in fact, in the very first words which Mr. Rose exchanged with their headman, the latter openly threatened his—the magistrate's—life, and that of all the Britishers in the State.

The words were hardly out of his mouth when the audacious Chinaman measured his length on the floor, Deen Mahomed having, with the speed of lightning, twisted his hand into the man's pigtail and laid him low without waiting for orders. Mr. Rose could hardly forbear a smile at the neat way in which it was done; but, after allowing the man to lie there for a minute or two as a lesson, he desired Deen Mahomed to let him get up, and then addressed the coolies through him as interpreter.

He told them he could not allow them to remain at Lumut, as, the estate being bankrupt, there was no longer work for them there; but that he would give all a free passage, with food, to Penang, and would report their case to the authorities in Penang, who, he had no doubt, would soon find them suitable employment and wages.

The men appeared satisfied with this programme, translated for them into Chinese by the headman, whose pigtail was still in the grasp of Deen Mahomed, and whose manners wonderfully softened and improved. Mr. Rose saw the coolies all off by the next steamer, paying another visit to Lumut for the purpose.

On his way back from Lumut, Mr. Rose called, in his magisterial capacity, on the superintendent of the neighbouring island of Pangkor. Happening to mention that I was very unwell—a not surprising result of the discomforts of Durian Sabatang—the superintendent and his wife kindly suggested that a visit of two or three days to them at the seaside might benefit me. I had never seen either of them, but that was of no consequence in a country where English are so rare that all are to a certain extent brothers. So, on receiving a note from Mrs. Lee, I accepted the invitation without scruple, and a few days more saw me on board a steam launch on my way to Pangkor. Mr. Rose was, of course, unable to accompany me, as he was tied to his office work in Durian Sabatang.

When I arrived at the Lee's, the first thing they told me was that all their men servants had absconded the day before, immediately after receiving their wages. I was not much surprised at this, as I had often heard of such things happening to other people. We ourselves had never had any experience of this kind, but we attributed this to our having brought two trustworthy servants with us from Sarawak, where the servants are, as a rule, far better than those to be had in the Malay peninsula. In fact, the latter are always said to be the refuse of China, and those who take situations in isolated jungles are the refuse of that refuse—men who have made the towns too hot to hold them, and are glad to be in hiding for a time. I felt very sorry for my hostess, who did not look strong, and had three small children, the youngest only six months old. She had been obliged to get in some Kling servants from the village at a moment's notice—one to act as house-boy, the other as under-nurse—but they appeared to be ignorant savages. There was also a Chinese ayah.

I had luckily brought with me an old Chinaman called Apat, as my attendant. He went by the nickname of the "Faithful," because a sort of canine fidelity appeared to be his strongest characteristic. As soon as he discovered the state of affairs, he both cooked the dinner and waited on us at table, also doing what he could to help in the housework.

Next day we went for a walk on the island, ending with a call on the Penghulu, or Malay headman of the district. Our reception was not particularly cordial, and on our way home I was told the cause of this. Mrs. Lee had been ill, and the Penghulu's womenkind had come to call on her and inquire after her health. They thought it due to themselves, Malay fashion, to come in a troop of thirty, tailing off into a rabble of dirty unclad little slave boys and girls; they forced their way into her bedroom, where she was lying down with a bad headache, and intrusive and obtuse like all Malay women, began to ask foolish and impertinent questions, to touch Mrs. Lee's face and dress with their dirty hands, and to beg for everything they saw, which, in their code of manners, is considered a delicate compliment to the owner.

They did not mean any harm; on the contrary, they doubtless thought they were showing themselves extremely kind and neighbourly; but the not unnatural result of their attentions was that on Captain Lee's coming in, Mrs. Lee begged him to send them away, and he cleared the room without ceremony. The women went home and complained to the Penghulu that the superintendent had been uncivil, no doubt greatly exaggerating his actions; and since that day the Penghulu and he had been barely on speaking terms.

On the following day (Thursday) we paid a visit to the deserted sugar estate of Lumut, which was on the mainland close by. Here we visited the hut of the Eurasian superintendent, who was remaining there almost alone until all the affairs of the estate should be wound up. He evidently wished to make himself extremely agreeable, and busied himself in preparing tea for us. As we steamed back in the launch to Pangkor I asked Captain Lee how it was that this man, who was doubtless looked on as a white man by the Chinese coolies, had been able to stay on in no danger from them, although the two other white men on the estate had both fled. He replied that this man was believed to belong to the same Chinese Hoey, or secret society, as the coolies.

In Mrs. Lee's room were two Chinamen smashing open a box with hatchets.

The evening passed without anything eventful occurring, and as the mosquitoes were maddening, we separated for the night soon after nine.

I had been asleep some two hours, perhaps, when I was suddenly awakened by a great shouting and a great light overhead. The house was, like ours at Durian Sabatang, subdivided by partitions only about eight feet in height, so that a light in any one room lit up the whole roof, which was visible from all parts of the house. Besides the shouting and the glare, I heard several shots fired. "A Chinese festival, no doubt," thought I; and I felt no alarm, but only surprise that Captain Lee should allow Chinese to come into his house making such a disturbance at midnight. After the noise had gone on for a few seconds, I began to think it strange that I did not hear Captain Lee's voice, and then to think that the sounds were almost too loud and confused even for a Chinese feast. I did not feel inclined to go out of my room, as my dress was hardly the thing for a mixed company, but compromised matters by jumping on a small table that stood near, and peeping over the wall. Then I saw a sight that convinced me that all was not right.

In the doorway just opposite me, which I knew was that of Mrs. Lee's room, were two Chinamen smashing open a box with hatchets. Yet I was far from guessing what was the fact—namely, that my host had been murdered a few minutes before, and that he and his wife were now lying weltering in their blood, just inside that doorway! I cried out loudly, "Captain Lee! Mrs. Lee! What is all this? What is the matter?"

There was no answer; but one of the Chinamen looked up, saw me, and, with his hatchet still in his hand, made for the door of my bedroom. I dashed down and held the door in the insane hope of keeping him out; but, alas! it was only made, like the rest of the house, of palm leaves lashed together with rattan, and in another moment the Chinaman had forced it open, and stood before me. Even then I did not understand that he intended to murder me. I was ignorant of the tragedy that had just taken place, and it never occurred to me as possible that the Lee's were not alive and well somewhere about the house.

The Chinaman marched into the middle of the room, I retreating before him, and saying in Malay, "What are you doing here? What do you want? Get out!" He made no answer, but held the hatchet up in front of him, grasping the handle with both hands, and, without the smallest change of expression in his countenance, made cuts, as I then thought, ineffectually, at my head. I raised my hand to parry the blows, and, as I felt absolutely no pain, fancied I had succeeded, but I must have fallen down insensible, as I remember nothing more. The doctor, on afterwards examining my head, found three trifling cuts and one severe one upon it, the latter about four inches long, and tolerably deep.

I do not know how long I lay unconscious, but my next recollection is of being roused by the sound of many excited Malay voices in the room. On first coming to myself I was by no means clear in my head or memory, and tried in vain to recollect where I was and what had happened.

I found myself lying under a bed, among boxes and lumber that were all strange to me. I listened eagerly to the noise going on in the room, but as about twenty Malays were all talking at once, even a better Malay scholar than myself might have been puzzled. I gathered, however, from a stray sentence, that Captain Lee was dead.

This filled me with great horror, which increased when I heard them talking about a Chinaman that was dead, and then I listened in vain for the voices of Mrs. Lee or the children. The silence of the latter seemed indeed ominous, as during my short acquaintance with them I had never before known them all to be quiet simultaneously. The poor little things had kept up a constant wailing night and day, from not being accustomed to their new nurse; so that now, when there was so much additional cause for their crying, their silence seemed most unnatural. I would have given a great deal at that moment to have heard again the pitiful wailing that had kept me awake on the first night of my arrival.

Presently I heard one of the Malays inquiring after me, and another replied in a cheerful voice:

"Doubtless she is dead, and her body thrown into the sea."

This did not seem to convince the questioner, who called out:

"Mem Perak! Mem Perak! Where are you? Do not fear; we are your friends. Come out!"

I felt so sure by this time that I was the only survivor from a general massacre of the British and their followers—for I had made up my mind that the dead Chinaman of whom they spoke was Apat, my servant—that I resisted without difficulty this polite invitation to come and be murdered, as I considered it. In fact, the more the Malays called me, the less inclined I felt to come; and when one of them presently lifted up the draperies of the bed and peered under it, I held my breath and lay as still as possible. He did not see me, as there was very little light, and the boxes concealed me.

The Malays continued to chatter, and I to listen. I heard one of them giving orders, and others deferentially replying, "Yes, sir, certainly, Tuan Penghulu." I immediately jumped to the conclusion, from what I had known of the quarrel between Captain Lee and the Penghulu, that the latter had planned the murder.

Shortly afterwards I heard the Penghulu dictating a letter, apparently to Mr. Rose, urging him to come at once and to bring plenty of police. This produced quite a revolution in my opinions; it was quite incompatible with my theory that the Penghulu was a murderous rebel, as the police in question were Sikhs and Pathans under the notorious Deen Mahomed; in short, they were formidable fellows, and the very last men whom a rebellious Malay would wish to meet.

My doubts of the Penghulu were dispelled by my hearing the well-known tones of my servant Apat, who came in saying he had hunted everywhere for and could not find me. This determined me to come out and show myself, and I did so. I must confess that the moment of my emerging from my retreat was an exciting one, for I could not really tell for certain whether I had heard aright—whether, in fact, I should be welcomed or murdered.

But I was not long left in doubt. After a general exclamation of "Wah!" from everybody they rushed up to me, Apat foremost. In delight at seeing me again, he seized both my hands, grinning from ear to ear, and expressing his joy at my being alive. I then had to tell the assembled company all that I knew of my own adventures, and they, in return, took up the tale where I left off.

They told me that, in the middle of the night, they had heard shots at the Residency, and had looked out and seen a great blaze of light in the direction of the house. They immediately armed themselves, and came out to find what was going on, arriving in time to see a quantity of boats full of Chinamen putting off from the shore. As they had no means at hand of pursuing them, they went into the house, where they found Captain Lee dead, Mrs. Lee apparently dying, the furniture all wrecked, and the bedclothes and other draperies just bursting into flames, the Chinese having set light to them with torches, no doubt in hopes of obliterating all traces of their crime. The Malays extinguished the flames, and did what they could for the dying.

The Penghulu was on the point of sending a report of the affair to Mr. Rose, mentioning, among other items, that from what I had heard whilst in hiding I saw no reason to doubt it. The Penghulu then showed me Captain Lee's body, which was on the floor, reverently covered with a sheet, and the seemingly lifeless form of Mrs. Lee on the very bed from under which I had just come out. Her eyes were closed, and her face deathly pale, except where it was covered with blood, or black from the bruises of the hammers with which the fiendish ruffians had not scrupled to strike her.

I asked the Penghulu whether he thought she was alive. He said "Yes," but he did not think she could possibly recover. I suggested that "while there was life there was hope," and that we ought to do all we could to get her British medical assistance; and, after discussing what was possible to be done, it was proposed that I should go in the steam-launch, which was just about to set off for Durian Sabatang, and fetch with all speed the trading steamer, now probably somewhere on the Perak river.

I felt some doubt as to whether I had not better remain with Mrs. Lee, in case of her becoming conscious; but the Penghulu assured me that, from his experience of such cases, she would certainly not recover consciousness for hours, perhaps not for days; and that I might safely leave her in the charge of her Chinese ayah and of his own wife (who sat beside the bed fanning her), and be back again with the steamer before she could awake. Accordingly this was settled, and as the steam-launch was not yet quite ready, the Penghulu sat down to finish his letter, while I went to make some alterations in my dress. First, however, I inquired after the children, and, to my amazement, was told they were alive and unharmed. I walked into the nursery to see them for myself, and there they were, all placidly asleep in their little cribs. How they had contrived to sleep through all the disturbances was wonderful, unless, as was afterwards suggested, they had been drugged by the Chinese ayah.

The Malays now brought me a looking-glass to show me what my own appearance was like, and truly I was a ghastly object. My face, my hair, and my clothes were covered with not merely stains, but masses of clotted blood. I could not attempt to alter this, as I did not wish to keep the steam-launch waiting; so I merely added a hat and a long cloak to the clothes that I already wore, and started.

Once on board I had plenty of time, and tried to wash the blood from my face; but the skin was bruised and painful to the touch, and I desisted, under the impression that my face was cloven in half by a sword-cut—a mistaken impression, as it turned out, for I had no wounds except those on the top of my head.

The steam-launch was much longer in meeting the steamer than I had expected; but at last the welcome sight of her masts appeared, and I stopped her and told my story. I then sent on the steam-launch to Durian Sabatang, with Apat bearing a verbal message to Mr. Rose that he was not to be alarmed, as I felt quite well. This message Apat never delivered, but appeared before Mr. Rose with tears streaming down his face, and in such a state of fright at having to deliver bad news, that Mr. Rose could get hardly any news out of him at all. The Penghulu's letter was not much better, being, like all Malay letters, full of complimentary nothings, with the one piece of information crammed into half-a-line and placed in the middle of the letter, where it was as difficult to find as a needle in a haystack.

On our return to Pangkor, a coffin was hastily made for the body of Captain Lee, and it was carried on board to be taken to Penang. Mrs. Lee, still unconscious, and the children were also carried on board. I wished to remain behind to meet my husband, but was told that for several reasons it was advisable that I should also come to Penang; first, my testimony would be wanted at the inquest; secondly, my own wounds required medical attention; and thirdly, I might be of use in attending Mrs. Lee, as there was no European woman on board. To these representations I yielded, and, leaving a note to be delivered to Mr. Rose, I went on board.

We arrived at Penang at daybreak on Sunday. Our arrival caused, as may be supposed, a considerable sensation. Crowds of natives swarmed on to the wharf. The British authorities of Penang were soon in attendance, and an inquest was held on board; after which a discussion took place as to what was to be done with the survivors. The then Lieutenant-Governor of Penang and his wife, with their usual hospitality and warm-heartedness, wished to take in the whole party—children, ayahs, and all; but this was overruled by the doctor, who decided that Mrs. Lee was too ill to be moved to the Lieutenant-Governor's house.

In the end, Mrs. Lee and the children were taken in by a friend close at hand; while I went to the Lieutenant-Governor's house, where everything was done for me that could possibly be done in the way of kindness and attention. Before I left the steamer the doctor insisted on my having part of my head shaved. I have no doubt he was right; but the shaving, while the wounds were still fresh, hurt me terribly, whereas up to that moment I had felt no pain or discomfort from them.

I had barely arrived at the Lieutenant-Governor's house when Mr. Rose arrived from Durian Sabatang.

He had received the most garbled account of the affair—first from Apat, and then from the Penghulu at Pangkor, where he stopped for a few minutes on the way. He had had a most dangerous voyage himself, having come in a little steam-launch which was only fit for river use, and having encountered an awful storm at sea. As soon as he had satisfied himself that I was neither dead nor dying he went to interview the Lieutenant-Governor, who warned him that he would get into dire disgrace with his chief for having left his post without permission, as the excuse of a half-murdered wife was not admissible in official circles; and directed him to return at once to the scene of the murder, whither police, men-of-war, and all manner of defences were now being sent in hot haste, to "lock the stable door," and if possible to capture the murderers.

Investigations were meanwhile made in Penang, which resulted in the discovery that the murder had been done by a gang of Chinamen, composed partly of the ex-coolies of Lumut and partly of professional gang-robbers, who had hired a junk, and had been seen to start in the direction of Pangkor some days previously. It further came out that these coolies, indignant at being summarily disbanded from Lumut, and at not being at once provided with work by the Penang Government, had taken it into their foolish heads that Captain Lee was in some way to blame for their misfortunes, and that he was keeping back the money which ought to have been paid them in wages.

Just at that juncture arrived the three Chinese servants who had left Captain Lee's the day before my visit. They acted upon the discontented coolies like a spark upon gunpowder. The servants fancied they had themselves some grievance against Captain Lee, particularly the cook, who on one occasion had so far forgotten himself as to fling a plate at his master's head; and they easily persuaded the coolies that they would be doing what was only just and fair if they organised an expedition to recover their lawful wages, which, the servants declared, were kept by Captain Lee, to the extent of a thousand pounds, in a safe in his bedroom.

As a matter of fact, the money so kept was not the wages of the Lumut coolies; it was Government revenue, collected by Captain Lee, and kept in the safe until the proper day of forwarding it should arrive. However, the coolies swallowed the tale greedily, took some professional gang-robbers and the three servants with them, and carried out the expedition as we have seen. They found only two hundred in the safe, instead of the reported thousand; but they partly consoled themselves by carrying off all the watches, bracelets, and other valuables in the house. It was believed that at least sixty Chinamen had taken part in the affair.

After three weeks, when the country was again quiet, and Britons in Penang had ceased to look shudderingly under their beds at night for Chinese robbers, I returned to Durian Sabatang. I was twice summoned from there to go to Penang as a witness, and obeyed the first time; but as the hot voyage was very trying to my health, and my testimony was not in the least important, I ventured to disobey the second summons. In truth was so ill that my husband had determined to send me to Europe, and only waited to see if I should be wanted at the assizes before taking my passage.

I was not wanted at the assizes, of which I was glad on the whole, but, at the same time, I was not sorry to see and hear the end of an affair in which I took a deep interest. I never rightly heard all the details of the trial, but I believe that only three Chinamen were convicted, of whom one was hanged, and two were sentenced to penal servitude for life. Immediately after the sentences were pronounced, the man condemned to be hanged exclaimed, pointing to some of the prisoners who had just been let off, "Seven of those men whom you have let go are guilty!" No notice was, however, taken of this remark.

The one who was hanged declared from the first that he had committed all the murders, or would-be murders. He drew a plan of the house (a most curious specimen of drawing), to illustrate his confession, with little figures to represent the bodies lying in the different rooms as he had left them. Mine was lying in the middle of the room, just where I recollected the man striking at me; but how I came to be eventually in the other room hidden under the bed this man professed himself unable to say. Several theories were suggested to account for this curious fact, the most probable one being that after remaining absolutely unconscious for some time, I may have partly recovered, and have had sufficient instinct of self-preservation to wander away and hide myself.

It was elicited at the trial that the sixty brave Chinamen who set forth to murder one Englishman and some women and children did not dare to do so without first making sure that the Englishman had no revolver.

They had arranged to have it stolen from Mrs. Lee's bedroom on the afternoon before the murder. This service was probably rendered them by the Chinese ayah, who alone had access to the room, and who was proved to have been a great friend of the cook's, the leader of the expedition. That cook was, unfortunately, never caught. The revolver was found next day hidden in the jungle.

Mrs. Lee gave evidence that her husband, on hearing a noise, had gone to the front-door unarmed, and had almost immediately staggered back into the room, wounded, and gasping out, "Give me my revolver!" She flew to get it, and found the case, but it was empty! Then she recollected turning and seeing her husband surrounded by Chinamen; but after this she remembered no more, being, like myself, struck down and left for dead.

The Chinese ayah, who was believed to have stolen the revolver, and made everything ready for the murderers, got off scot free. So did the twelve Malay police, who were supposed to guard the Residency, but who fled like rabbits at the approach of danger. So did about fifty-seven of the murderers, if the estimate of their number at sixty, made independently by several witnesses, be correct. So did the Eurasian superintendent, who was believed to have been an accessory before the fact; but this could not be proved against him.

Poor Apat died soon after the assizes under very suspicious circumstances. Mr. Rose had asked some officers of a man-of-war to lunch at Durian Sabatang, and he was much annoyed at the remarkably bad luncheon that was set before himself and his guests. At last he spoke about it to the servant in waiting, saying "Tell Apat this is really too bad." The servant replied, "Apat, sir, is dead." "Dead!" exclaimed Mr. Rose, aghast; and the guests, overhearing, inquired, with horror, "What, is the man who cooked the food we have been eating dead?" The servant repeated his statement, whereat they all rose and went into the kitchen, but found that Apat's body had already been carried away by his friends. They followed, and a sort of post-mortem examination was held, when the conclusion was come to that the death might have occurred from his having himself taken too much opium, or, on the other hand, it might have resulted from some other poison.

A suspicious circumstance was that a Chinese scullery-man, lately hired by Mr. Rose, was missing, and never reappeared, and that Apat's wages, which had been paid him that morning, were also missing. It was suggested that the scullery-man was an emissary of the Penang Hoey, sent to murder Apat on account of the evidence he had given at the trial: but this seems improbable, as Apat had given no evidence that could convict anyone. He had been in his usual health up to the day of his death.

With the sad and mysterious death of Apat "the Faithful" ended the series of horrors which, I fear, I shall never be able to forget.

Trevor Bates.

THE door of Madame Mardi's little shop stood open. In passing one caught a delicious whiff of perfume—an exquisite subtle fragrance that hung in the soft, moist atmosphere. The afternoon had been wet. But although the rain had ceased, the trees and roofs of the houses were still dripping in a dismal melancholy fashion.

The exterior of the shop, facing the narrow street, which seemed to wind its way uphill almost perpendicularly, was gloomy and forbidding. The small window, from which one Venetian blind had been thrown back against the wall, wore a thick coating of dust. More than one pane was cracked or broken, and here and there a bundle of yellow rags had been thrust into the aperture to keep out the draught. And all the time the bountiful largess of scent came out from the half-closed entrance.

Two pedestrians were coming down the steep incline. Both were dressed in black.

"I have no right now to talk of marriage," the man was saying, "I have no right even to speak of love——" He broke off abruptly, and turned away. There was a ring of despair in his voice. He felt dejected and disheartened, and had not the good sense to keep it to himself.

In spite of herself the girl blushed. A dull pain began tugging at her heart and showed itself in the lines of her face. She caught her underlip savagely between her teeth. For a moment the humiliation of her own self-consciousness maddened her.

"No?" she said stupidly. It was meant as an interrogative—a polite effort to be interested in a friend's affairs. But the girl had never learnt to disguise her feelings, and it sounded a pitiful acquiescence to the inevitable.

"For a long time I have been hoping against hope," the man went on. "I deceived myself. I forced myself to believe that something would turn up—that it would all come right in the end."

They were opposite Madame Mardi's shop now, and both stopped instinctively. For years they had walked home from the factory together, and the parting, when it came, was always reluctant.

A light drizzle was beginning to fall, and the man opened his umbrella. It was an invitation to her to stop out a few minutes longer, and she accepted it.

"Why should you be so despondent?" she said presently. Her voice was low and tremulous, and the bright colour still burnt in her cheeks. She felt like a supplicant, and hated herself for the sensation. But it was her duty to comfort him. "They cannot go on reducing our wages," she continued, slipping her fingers through his arm, and looking up for the first time to his face. "We suffer when times are bad, but we benefit when times are better."

"Why should the working classes have the whole weight to bear?" the man retorted, his eyes flashing and his voice rising angrily. "How is it just or fair that we should be ground down to maintain an artificial scale of profits? We have a right to demand that the selling price of our produce is sufficiently high to yield something more than a mere pittance."

The girl shrugged her shoulders. It was an old point of discord between them.

"Intellect has the first right," she answered persuasively. "Might is always right—even the superiority of brain power over muscle. A living wage is all that the working classes can demand from the capitalist. Not always that. Supply and demand must regulate the labour market. No other system would be economically sound. Besides, we are engaged in the manufacture of a luxury. The price of flowers is sent up at one end by the cold; the price of every kind of scent falls at the other, because the public cannot afford to pay as much as it used when times were better. What are the perfumers to do? Why, reduce their expenses, of course. Retrench in the best way they can."

"In other words, by cutting down our wages. Let them be satisfied with less profits, that's what I say. You wait and watch them tighten the screw again, Miss Philosophy, on eight francs a week," and the man laughed mockingly, but with a touch of admiration that he could not conceal.

"I am not a philosopher," the girl answered quickly; "only I see both sides of the question. My mother is an employer. That makes a difference." She stopped, and pushed back the hair from her forehead. She wore no hat, and the wind that came rushing round the corner of the street had given her a wild and disorderly appearance.

"Why don't you set up for yourself?" she said suddenly.

The man laughed.

"Because I can't afford to, in the first place, and possibly I am wanting in intellect, you little pet saint."

"What you want is enterprise," the girl retorted, half-contemptuously. "When my mother opened her shop she knew less of the trade than you do, and all the capital she had was saved from a smaller salary than yours."

They had reached the bottom of the hill by this time, and began slowly to retrace their steps. The man accepted her rebuke in silence. A change came over his face.

"Your mother is a specialist," he responded. "There is all the difference between a specialist and a competitor in an overcrowded field. You know yourself that any perfumer in Grasse would give £1,000 for the secret of Madame Mardi's bouquet. She has created a demand, and no one else can supply it. Everyone cannot be so fortunate."

The girl smiled. There was a great deal of truth in what the man said. Her mother's scent was different from anything else in the world.

"If only I knew the recipe," the man continued, with a suppressed eagerness that he could not altogether disguise.

"If I. Well, what would you do?"

Something in her tone made him turn and look at her closely. Almost unconsciously he moved a step nearer.

"I should set up for myself to-morrow," he answered, with a sudden burst of enthusiasm. "I would begin in a small way, and when I had earned enough I would build a factory for myself, and then——"

"And then?"

"I would share my fortune with the only woman there is in the world for me."

Once more the blood came surging to the girl's white cheeks, and she turned away, vividly conscious of the other's stare.

"What a happy dream," she exclaimed. "If only the castles we build in the air would sometimes come true——" And she broke off with a sigh.

"Marguerite, if you chose——"

"Hush!" she interposed, struggling to release her hand that he had taken in his. "Remember what you said just now. We must not let dreams affect our lives."

He let her go and watched her sullenly as she pushed back the door of the little shop.

"Good night, Ivan."

"Good night, Marguerite," he answered. For a moment they stood looking at one another. Her heart was beating faster than usual. He turned away, but came back again the next instant as if he had forgotten something.

"Marguerite," he said, "I don't believe you love me at all, not even a little scrap." And the next moment he was gone.

She stood on the threshold watching his broad back disappear down the hill; there was a choking sensation in her throat, and her pretty eyes were filled with tears.

* * * * * *

No one was in the shop. The little counter was covered with preserved fruits and crystallised violets, for which Madame Mardi was famous. Marguerite hung up her cloak behind the door, and mounted the three wooden steps which faced her.

"Is that you, Marguerite, child?"

"Yes, mother."

There was a little exclamation of pleasure in the same low, musical voice. A moment later the key was turned in the lock, and Madame Mardi's arms were entwined round her daughter's neck.

The room which served the old lady as her factory was small and square. A little wooden table ran down the middle. On this stood a number of empty bottles and half-a-dozen large tins of pomade already packed and labelled.

In front of the chair from which she had risen to admit her daughter stood a pile of glass frames, evenly spread with cold cream, in which the petals of a thousand violets were embedded. The floor at one end of the apartment was covered with flowers, which on closer inspection proved to be standing in great shallow basins of earthenware. A strong perfume pervaded the whole room. It was a strange, uncommon fragrance, that seemed half-bewildering and half-intoxicating to the senses. The girl crossed over to the window and opened it wide.

"How can you work in such an atmosphere?" she exclaimed.

Madame Mardi had already resumed her work.

"I love it," she said simply.

Marguerite drew the only unoccupied chair to the window, and, propping her elbows on the sill, and her chin on her hands, she sat there looking out over the red-tiled roofs of the houses across which the rain was now sweeping in great clouds of mist.

Her head ached, and her mind seemed to be in a feverish whirl. Ivan had never spoken to her of his love. There never appeared any necessity for an outspoken declaration. It was an understood thing, somehow, that they were all in all to each other. And now he had practically come to her and said that there could never be anything more between them than there had been in the past. She caught her breath with a hissing sound, pressing her hand to her heart.

"I don't believe that you love me, Marguerite," he had said. "Not even a little scrap."

She knew exactly what was in his mind when he uttered those words. Ought she to despise him for them? she wondered. What in the world could have put such an idea into his head? The girl glanced across the room at her mother. The old lady was bending over her flowers. The thin, tapering fingers were tearing them to pieces petal by petal with a dexterity that seemed almost incredible.

"She must have saved a great deal by this time," the girl reflected. "It is selfish to keep the secret to herself any longer when other people are in want. Selfish and mean."

She put her hand out into the rain, and pressed it to her burning forehead.

"After all," she went on, "the secret is as much mine as mother's. If I wish I have a right to share it with someone else. Ivan's happiness and my happiness both depend upon it. Besides, there is no reason why she should ever know——"

She started at her own thoughts and coloured guiltily.

"How demoralised I have become all of a sudden," she mused.

She got up and crossed over to Madame Mardi's side.

"Mother," she said, leaning on the table and looking up at the white, pinched face. "Mother, I believe you love your work better than me."

The accusation was too foolish to be taken seriously.

"My child, how can you talk such nonsense. My whole life is centred upon you. Dearest, you are crying——"

And Madame Mardi pushed back her chair and drew the tall, slim figure down on to her knees to kiss.

"What is it, little one?" she asked caressingly.

Marguerite tried to speak. But the words refused to come.

"You are tired, dear child," the old lady murmured, brushing back the unruly curls with long steady sweeps of her hand. "You must not stay out so late. Of course I love you. Who is it puts these thoughts into your head? I love you better than life itself. There! there! dearest, do not cry. I love you, and I enjoy working among my flowers, too. I am proud of the strength God has given me. It may be wrong, but I cannot help it. It makes me feel young once more when I think that, poor, lone widow that I am, I can hold my own and defy them all. We must thank our Blessed Mother for her goodness."

Her eyes sparkled, and she threw back her head defiantly. Madame Mardi's spirit was inexhaustible; but down in her heart Marguerite feared She had not the courage to say that she loved Ivan D'Auville.

* * * * *

Why Marguerite worked in the factory with the other girls nobody knew. But Madame Mardi wished her to learn the perfumer's trade in detail.

"Who can tell?" she used to say. "Perhaps some day we will open a factory of our own which you can superintend."

* * * * *

It was evening again. The scented corridors of the factory were crowded with men and women hurrying home after their long day's work. Ivan had been in the laboratory blending the various perfumes; he went down to the basement and found Marguerite there.

"I am going away from Grasse," he said abruptly.

She looked at him with startled eyes, bending her brows with an evident effort to understand.

"Going away?" she repeated numbly.

"Yes. The present wages are not enough to keep body and soul together. Mother is ill, and so is the baby. We cannot afford a doctor."

"But where are you going to? What is the good of going?"

"We may do better somewhere else. We can't do worse. Good-bye, Marguerite. Good-bye——"

"But can nothing be done?"

"Nothing. It might have been different. The dream might have come true if you——" He turned away overcome by the force of his emotions, and buried his face in his hands.

She said something, he did not hear what, and a moment later his ears caught the tap, tap of her wooden shoes across the stone-flagged floor. He started up at the thought that she was going.

"Marguerite," he called. "For Heaven's sake, have pity on me. One word from you can save us from this trouble."

* * * * *

A month swept by. A change had come over Madame Mardi. Her hair had grown whiter; her face was thinner and paler than of yore. When Marguerite came in she saw that her mother had been crying.

The sight went to her heart.

"Dear mother, what is the matter?"

"Do you not know, then?"

A cold wave seemed to sweep over the girl. She stretched out one hand and leant heavily on the little counter for support.

"Tell me," she murmured.

The old lady was furious. She spoke so fast that it was almost impossible to follow her.

"Someone else is making my scent. That's what I'm crying about. At least, I'm not crying." Here she produced her handkerchief and began blowing her nose in a way that contradicted the assertion. "Day by day my orders have been dropping down. This week they are not large enough to pay expenses. It's breaking my heart, that's what it is. But I'm not going to cry. What's the use of crying. Marie, be brave, I say. If I could find the man who is robbing me——"

Marguerite shuddered.

"Mother, mother. Do not take it to heart like that. Perhaps it will all turn out best in the end."

But the old lady was not to be consoled. She shook her head mournfully from side to side.

"Look here," she said.

Marguerite followed the direction of her mother's finger. It was pointing out of the window over the housetops to the scaffold of a new building that was being erected behind the church.

"You see that?" she asked quietly.

The girl was puzzled.

"Yes, mother," she said.

"Well, that's mine. Mine and yours. Every penny I have in the world is invested in it. I have been saving all my life for that factory, and now——"

Marguerite closed her eyes and turned away. She could not bear the sight of her mother's grief. What was this thing that she had done?

* * * * *

Ivan D'Auville was rich and prosperous. He looked round for the factory that he had dreamt of. A big edifice had been begun behind the church and abandoned. The landlord agreed to finish it off for him.

"I have not seen Marguerite for some time," he thought. "I must tell her that I am converted to her views on the labour problem. The more you grind your workmen down, the more satisfaction they give you."

The man and the girl met once more in the little street. He noticed how white and pale she looked as they came nearer. Possibly his conscience pricked him. "After all," he reflected, "I owe everything to her. It was a noble sacrifice."

For nearly an hour they walked up and down talking. Her heart was aching; her thoughts were full of her mother's disappointment; but she managed to listen to all he had to say.

"A few days more, little one," he observed, "and I shall have a comfortable home to offer to the woman I love. It is built on the wreck of some other person's hopes; but that is the way of the world."

The blood mounted to the girl's cheeks. After all, no great damage had been done. Her mother could live with them; the secret would still be in the family.

"When are you thinking of settling down?" she asked.

"That must depend," he answered, taking a rose from his buttonhole and picking it to pieces. "Parbleu! That must depend on my cousin Barine. She wants time for her trousseau."

He looked at Marguerite. Her face was so white and drawn that he wondered what he could ever have found attractive in her.

The sun shone down brightly.

Two little sparrows on the gable above nodded their heads and laughed. They seemed to have found a jest.

The Fate of MacCallum Faa.

It was a wild winter night in the Peninsula. The British army under Sir John Moore was in full retreat upon Corunna. Private MacCallum Faa muttered a deep curse upon the weather as he bent his feather-plumed bonnet to the driving snowstorm, and drew his tattered greatcoat closer across his breast. Private Neil Macrae echoed the curse as he tramped along through the snow shoulder to shoulder to Faa, in the rear of their regiment, the 42nd Highlanders.

Suddenly Faa spoke:

"D'ye hear aught, Neil?" he asked.

"Hear aught?" repeated Macrae. "Why, I hear the skirlin' o' the blast. What the deil else can a body hear a nicht like this?"

"Ye dinna hear the skirlin' o' the pipes, Neil?" asked Faa.

Macrae listened a moment and then replied:

"Na, I dinna hear them. They're na skirlin' noo, or we'd surely hear them wi' the win' blawin' straight doon tae us frae the pipers."

For some time longer the two Highlanders marched on through the fast falling snow, then MacCallum Faa again spoke.

"D'ye hear the pipes noo, Neil?"

Again Neil Macrae listened, and again he replied:

"Na, I hear naught but the sough o' the win'."

"Listen again, Neil. Hear ye na 'We Return no More'?" anxiously inquired MacCallum Faa.

Neil Macrae stopped dead in his tracks and seized Faa by the arm.

"Dae ye hear 'We Return no More'?" he demanded, peering closely into his comrade's face.

"Aye, I've heard it twice the last hoor, Neil; an' it's been runnin' in ma heid a' the day," replied Faa.

"D'ye hear it noo?" questioned Macrae, still grasping Faa's arm.

Faa listened a moment and answered:

"Aye, I hear it comin' doon on the win' frae the front."

Macrae listened intently for a long time, then he let go his hold of Faa's arm and said:

"Deil take me but I believe ye're fey. Ma lugs are as shairp as ony man's i' the regiment, an' I'll swear the pipes haena' played the last twa hoors. An' o' a' the tunes i' the piper's buik, what for should they play 'We Return no More'? Answer me that, MacCallum Faa?"

Faa shook his head despondingly, and said:

"I'm on ma last mairch, Neil. I'll ne'er see anither sun rise. But let's gang on. We're ower far tae the rear."

The two Highlanders resumed their march, and Faa continued:

"Neil Macrae, I'm on ma last mairch. I'll na live tae see anither morn. Na, dinna tell me I'm a fule. Yer ain Hielan' heart tells ye I'm fey. Noo, Niel Macrae, hear me speak. Ye've been a guid comrade tae me an' a true ane, an' I ken weel ye'll be true tae me an' mine after I'm deid. Neil Macrae, wad it surprise ye tae be tauld that MacCallum Faa is a mon o' walth?"

Neil Macrae turned and stared at Faa.

"I see," continued the latter, "it does surprise ye. An' yet, Neil, Private MacCallum Faa, wha naebody thocht was worth a plack, carries beneath his torn doublet the ransom o' a king. Neil Macrae, I hae wi' me noo, as I gang by your side, twa hundred thoosand punds!"

Macrae stopped short and gazed pityingly at Faa, whom he verily believed to be "fey," that is, forewarned of his approaching death.

Moreover, he now began to think that his comrade was wandering in his mind as well. His bosom comrade, Private MacCallum Faa, worth two hundred thousand pounds, which he carried on his person at that instant! Surely the foreboding thoughts of impending death had turned Faa's brain.

Faa read his companion's thoughts aright.

"Ye think I'm daft as weel as fey, Neil," he said. "But ye're wrong. Look here!" And fumbling under his greatcoat for an instant he brought forth a leather case. "In this bit pooch, Neil," said he, "are jools worth twa hundred thoosand punds. It's nae use, in this mirk nicht, openin' the case, but ye can tak' ma word for it that I'm na addin' a bawbee tae the value o' them."

"An' whaur the deil did ye get them?" gasped Macrae.

"I'll tell ye," answered Faa. "It was at the crossin' o' the Esla. Durin' the skirmish I found this bit case on the field, clasped in the dead hand o' a French trooper, wha had dootless looted it frae some Spanish mansion. I picked it up, and that same nicht I shawed it tae Henry Wilks, the lang leggit Lunnon dragoon. Wilks had got his deith blaw, an' I ca'd in by the hospital tae see him. The loon was a bit fond o' me—I'd done him a guid turn at Vimiera when I was in the 91st—an' as I was biddin' him fareweel for the last time this side the grave, it cam ower me tae show him the jools, for I kent Wilks had been a jooler himsel' afore he 'listed."

"He was deein' fast, but he was well pluckit—thae Lunnon loons a'ways are when they come tae the wa'. Weel, he took the case an' lang he looked the jools ower an' ower. Then he said to me: 'Faa, ye blayguard, whaur the deil did ye snick this frae?' I tauld him quite angry that I was a Hielan' gentleman an' nae thief, an' that I'd found the bit case on the field an' took it as fair loot. I was a wee bit short wi' him for hintin' I had stole the jools an' I held oot ma haund for the case.

"'No sae fast, Faa,' says he, 'd'ye ken what these geegaws are worth?'

"'Na, I've nae idee,' says I. 'Hae ye?'

"'Hae I?' says Wilks, as prood o' his joolry knowledge as if he werena' within' an hoor o' his death. 'Hae I ony idee o' the value o' ony jools under the sun? I'll tell ye what, MacCallum Faa, ye're aboot the walthiest mon in the British Airmy the day. Ye're worth two hundred thoosand punds!"

"I thought Wilks was fulin' me an' I tauld him sae. 'MacCallum Faa,' says he, quite solemnly, 'ye ken, an' I ken it as weel, an' better, I'm near deith. In anither hoor,' says he, 'I'll be paradin' afore the Great Commander-in-Chief tae answer for ma manifold sins. Think ye then, I'm likely to add a fresh lee tae the lang list? What guid wad it do me, a deein' mon, tae pit a fause price on yer jools? For by the richts of war they belang tae ye. An', abune a' men in the warld, why should I fule ye, the mon that saved ma life at Vimiera? Na, na, Faa, auld comrade,' says Wilks, 'I'm na fulin ye. Tak' ma word for't, the word of a mon that kens the value to a penny piece of sic trinkets as are in this bit case; tak' ma word, these jools are worth fu' twa hundred thoosand punds. An' as they be yours by the richts o' loot in war, dinna ye pairt wi' them, Faa, for a penny less.' He gave me back the case an' I stayed by him till the last, an' it was I that closed the een o' Henry Wilks, the cavalrymon. An' I'm thinkin', Neil, it's yersel' that wull close the een o' MacCallum Faa afore morn."

"Na, na," retorted Macrae; "ye'll live tae tak' the jools hame tae Auld Scotlan' yet. But, ma certie, comrade, richt foot foremost, or we'll lose the regiment."

For during Faa's recital of his surprising story, he and Macrae had stood still in the fast falling snow. They hurried on after their regiment as fast as the deep snow would permit, and Faa continued:

"Gin aught happens tae me the nicht, Neil, ye'll find the case o' jools neist ma sark."

"Hoot, toot, mon!" retorted Macrae, endeavouring to cheer his despondent comrade; "ye'll live for many a lang day. Ye'll be a graund gentleman wi' the gowd the jools will bring ye."

Faa shook his head gloomily.

"I tell ye, Neil, I'll na see the morn. It's na use yer makin' bleeve ye think I will, I'm fey, Neil, an' the coronach is soundin' loud in ma lugs the noo. I'll be deid afore morn, an' that's why I tell't ye aboot the jools. An' noo, Neil, hear ma last will an' testament. Ye're a troo man, Neil, an' there's na need, forbye opportunity, tae pit it doon on paper. When the breith's oot o' me ye'll tak' the jools off me—I maun keep them whiles I'm alive—an' ye'll tak' them hame tae the auld countrie an' sell them for twa hundred thoosand punds. Ye'll gie hauf tae ma auld faither an' mither an' ma bonnie sister, Elsie, an' hauf ye'll keep yersel'; Neil—ye will I tell ye, it's ma deein' wish—tae raise yerself an' your kin in the warld. Sae let's hear nae mair, Neil. Ye'll dae as I hae wished ye. An' noo let's gang on."

Macrae was deeply affected by Faa's generosity and trust in him, but he obeyed his comrade's behest and tramped along in silence. It was a dark night, the now was driving in their faces and increasing in depth each moment. Suddenly, as they plodded along almost knee deep in snow, Faa stumbled over some obstruction hidden in the snow and fell heavily to the ground, with an audible snapping of bones and a deep groan. Macrae was quickly beside him and found that his comrade had fallen over a boulder and broken both legs. Macrae looked miserably about him into the wild winter night. The two Highlanders were alone. They had fallen far behind their comrades and it was useless shouting for help, for the wind was blowing fiercely down to them from the regiment.

"I maun gang after the lads, Faa," said Neil, "an' bring a pairty back for ye. There's naething else to be dune, an' the suner it's dune the better for ye, lad."

Faa groaned acquiescence. Macrae took his great-coat off, and regardless of Faa's feeble protests against the sacrifice, wrapped it round his unfortunate comrade. Then, having made him as comfortable as he could, he bade him cheer up and set out to overtake the regiment and return with help. A couple of hours later he returned with a squad of his comrades to the spot where he had left Faa, but the latter had vanished, leaving no trace in the thickly-falling snow. How he had gone and where, was a mystery. That was the last of Private MacCallum Faa of the 42nd Highlanders. He was posted in the regimental records as "missing" Only Neil Macrae knew of the jewels, and it was from him that I had this story. Neil is still alive, although it is now the year 1880. He is a prosperous Highland crofter, and was twenty-five years old when my great uncle, MacCallum Faa, so mysteriously disappeared that stormy winter night with two broken legs and two hundred thousand pounds' worth of jewels. Neil, at the age of ninty-six, is still hale, hearty, active and upright; and it is my greatest pleasure to hear him tell of the wild Peninsula days, and the strange disappearance of my lost relative, MacCallum Faa.

In the winter of 1880 I was travelling in northern Spain for orders for the firm by which I am employed. One afternoon I was walking from one small town in the province of Galicia to another a few miles distant. While still some miles from my destination in a wide stretch of open country, the snow, which had been threatening for days past, came down so fast and heavily that the air grew dark as night, and before an hour had passed I was completely out of my bearings.

Stumbling along in the blinding snowflakes, I came to the ruins of an old convent, and while looking about for some sheltered corner, I suddenly felt the ground give way beneath me, and, with a cry of alarm, I was precipitated into a black cavity. I had a box of matches, and striking one, discovered that I had fallen into a vault underneath the convent ruins.

The vault was empty save for a few dried faggots of wood, one of which I lighted and used as a torch. The hole through which I had fallen was fifteen feet above me, so I could not escape that way. In one wall of the vault was a yawning doorway, and approaching it, the torchlight revealed a long, dark, but perfectly dry passage. It was about three feet wide, and high enough for me to walk upright. I decided to enter.

For nearly a mile I traversed its narrow length, and then it terminated in a very narrow, steep, and winding staircase which appeared to be built in the thickness of a stone wall.

I mounted the stairs and had ascended some twenty of them when I came upon a ghastly object. Sprawling over half-a-dozen of the steps was the skeleton of a man. A rusty stiletto was firmly fixed in the breastbone, and the bones of both legs were broken. By the position in which it lay the skeleton appeared to have been thrown down the stairs from above many years before, when its whitened bones were still covered with flesh. Whether the legs had been broken in the fall or before it, none could say. The stiletto, however, pointed clearly to murder. I stepped gingerly over the grinning object and continued up the stairs. But a few steps further upward I again stopped.

At my feet lay a dust-covered cloth. Holding the torch close to it, I discovered to my amazement that it was a kilt of 42nd tartan, very old and worn and faded. On the steps immediately above I saw several other articles, and picking them up, found a goatskin sporran, a tattered greatcoat, a private soldier's scarlet tunic, an old Highland feather bonnet, and a pathetically thin-worn pair of hose and shoes, all of the pattern worn by the famous old 42nd Highlanders in the early part of last century.

The clothes, like the skeleton, appeared to have lain undisturbed where I found them for very many years. What bygone tragedy did they now bring to light? It was natural to suppose that the clothes had belonged to the man whose bones lay on the steps below, and in that case he had been a private soldier of the 42nd Highlanders. But how came a British soldier's remains to be found in an underground chamber of some Spanish building? I was aware that I was in the exact country through which the British force under Sir John Moore had retreated to Corunna, and in that force was the 42nd Foot, for had not my lost great-uncle MacCallum Faa belonged to that historic regiment?

MacCallum Faa! I reeled back against the steep stairs as a wild suspicion flashed into my mind. Seizing the tunic, I examined the inside. An exclamation of mingled astonishment, pity, and horror burst from my lips, for there, stamped plainly in black figures on the inside of the tunic was the number of the regiment to which the unfortunate soldier-wearer had belonged, together with his regimental number. The first was, of course, the 42nd Foot, and the latter I recognised instantly as the number which Neil Macrae had often told me had been borne by my great uncle, MacCallum Faa! I leant against the steep steps and gazed pityingly and reflectively at the clothing and skeleton.

This then, was the fate of MacCallum Faa! Stabbed to death, murdered, even when his poor legs were broken; stripped naked and flung, body and clothes, down the secret staircase of some Spanish building!

"But why was he murdered?" I asked myself. "For the jewels he bore when he was last seen," came the natural answer.

Who had murdered him, and what building was this, in the underground chambers of which I had discovered his remains? Where did these steps lead to? My torch began to flicker warningly, for it was nearly burnt out, so I recalled my thoughts from the mysterious past to the stern present and continued up the stairs.

Full thirty more of them I ascended, and then I was confronted by a stone wall in which was a broad, low panel of wood. "A secret door," I muttered. But a door which had not been opened for very many years, I judged, by its appearance. Fumbling over it by good luck I found the spring, for the panel moved noiselessly aside. Stepping through the opening thus revealed I found my face brushed by heavy draperies, and pushing this cautiously and slightly aside, a strange sight burst upon me.

I was in a large room, luxuriously furnished as a bedroom, and brilliantly lighted up by tall wax tapers, the walls being covered by tapestry. In a huge wooden bedstead lay an old man, a very old man, much older in appearance than Neil Macrae, and by the bedside was a priest. The old man was evidently dying fast and was confessing to the priest. I was at first on the point of making my presence known, as I had no desire to hear what was only intended for the priest's ears, but seeing that the dying man had but a few more minutes of life, I thought it better not to disturb those last minutes by intruding in so unexpected a manner. I had thus, perforce, to listen to his confession.

"Murder, brother!" the priest was saying in a tone of mild surprise, as though it were no uncommon crime for one of his flock to confess to.

"Yes, father," groaned the old man. "It was many, many years ago, seventy-one long years ago, when I was a young man of thirty. It was the night when the British forces under Moore passed through here, in the winter of 1809. Returning to this house from the town that night in a severe snowstorm, I came upon a soldier of a Scotch regiment lying by the roadside, which, as you know, father, is a mile from my house. He told me he had fallen and broken both his legs, and that his comrade had gone for help. My heart was full of pity for the helpless soldier, bad as I was, and I carried him that long, weary mile to this house and got the servants to put him in my own bed—in this bed. Under my directions they stripped him in order that I might set his broken limbs, for, as you know, father, I am a skilled surgeon. I was about to set to the task of binding up his limbs when I observed a case clasped in the soldier's hands. He had fainted with the pain of moving him, so I took the case from his unresisting fingers and opened it.

"It contained jewels, father; jewels of priceless worth, and the sight of them roused all my worst passions to the utmost. I was heavily in debt, and those jewels would not only clear me but make me rich for life. At once I made up my mind. No one was in the room with me but the unconscious victim. I drew my stiletto and plunged it into his breast with such force that I could not withdraw the weapon. There is a secret panel in the wall of this room, father, which opens on to a staircase built in the wall. This staircase leads to an underground passage connecting this house with the old convent a mile away. No one knew of this underground passage then but me, and no one knows of it now but me—and you, father.

"I dragged the body to the secret panel, which I opened, and flung the dead soldier and his uniform down the secret stairs. Then I shut the panel and it has not been opened since. I burnt the bloodstained bedclothes and told the servants next morning that the soldier's comrades had come and taken him away during the night. No one suspected but that was the truth. I sold the jewels, which enabled me to pay my debts and live in luxury ever since.

"Moreover, father, I have prospered exceedingly, despite the dreadful deed which laid the foundation of all my wealth; and in that box on the table you will find Bank of England notes to the value of £700,000, the value of the jewels which I stole from the man I murdered and interest on it at five per cent."

From my position behind the tapestry I saw the priest's eyes glisten, and he shot an eager glance towards the box on the table.

"Yes, brother," he said.

"Father," groaned the dying old murderer, "I wish you to seek out the relatives of the man I killed, and hand them over the £700,000. I remember well—only too well—his name and regiment, for he told me, when I was carrying him to this house, that his name was MacCallum Faa, that he was a private soldier of the 42nd Foot, and that his family hailed from the town of Inverness, in Scotland. Seek out the relatives of such a person who served under Moore in 1809, father, and give them the whole of the money in that box. In this way, father, I make what reparation I can for the dreadful crime committed by me so long ago. The remainder of my property, father, I leave to the Holy Church. And now, father, absolve me, for I shall not live many more minutes."

"Brother," said the priest softly, "have you, in your will, left that £700,000 to the surviving relatives of a long-dead and forgotten foreign heretic?"

"I have, father," feebly replied the repentant murderer.

"Then you must alter the will," said the priest determinedly. "You must leave all your property to the Holy Church."

"Mercy, father!" gasped the dying man. "I must——"

"Or I refuse you absolution!" thundered the priest his brow as black as night.

"Mercy!" shrieked the old man.

"Excommunico——" began the priest.

"I consent!" screamed the wretched old man.

The priest looked round the room for ink and paper.

I turned where I stood concealed by the tapestry and ran quickly, but noiselessly down the secret stairs. Hastily taking off my own clothes, I put on the faded kilt, tunic, bonnet, sporran, hose and shoes of my murdered relative, MacCallum Faa, and running up the stairs again, I peeped from behind the tapestry. The old man was just about to sign his name to the paper which the priest had drawn up, in which the former bequeathed all the property to the Catholic Church.

I parted the tapestry and stepped into the room. The priest had his back towards me, as he held the paper for the old man to sign. The latter raised his eyes for an instant in a last mute appeal to the remorseless face of the priest, and as he did so they fell upon me standing silently behind the father.

With one long, dreadful scream, that rings in my ears to this day, he dropped the pen, and pointing a long, shrunken forefinger at me, shrieked:

"The murdered Highlander!" and fell back dead, still, even in death, glaring and pointing.

At his cry and words the priest wheeled suddenly round, and as his horrified gaze fell upon the spirit of the murdered Highlander, as he thought, he fell upon his knees, his jaw dropped in speechless terror, he flung both hands out to ward me off, and with a great gasp, died, his body stiffening in that position.

I picked up the box on the table and made a hasty examination of its contents, which I found to consist of seven hundred £1,000 notes of the Bank of England. I thrust the box into a large, empty portmanteau which I found in a corner of the room. Then I returned to the secret stairs for my own clothes, put them on, and picking up the poor remains of MacCallum Faa, I carried them up to the bedroom and packed skeleton and uniform in the portmanteau with the cash box.

Taking up the portmanteau, I opened the bedroom door, and, after listening for a moment, closed it behind me, leaving the ghastly figures of the old man and the priest glaring and pointing horribly in the rigidity of death from fright.

By good luck I managed to make my way out of the house without seeing or being seen by any of the other inmates, whom I could hear talking and moving about. When I got outside I found the snow had ceased to fall and the stars were shining bright and clear. Without further mishap I made my way to the railway station of the nearest town, and travelled straight to Corunna, taking ship there for home, which I reached in due time.

The remains of my hapless great-uncle, which had lain for three score years and ten on the secret stairs of a Spanish mansion, I caused to be interred in his—and my—native village near Inverness.

Old Neil Macrae shed a stern, soldierly tear for his long-lost comrade of the wild days of Corunna, but he refused to take a penny of the £700,000, half of which I offered him. He says he is prosperous and content; but, nevertheless, I have made over £350,000 to his descendents "to raise them in the world," as the luckless but generous-hearted MacCallum Faa wished to be done.

Sister Was Careless.

LITTLE MISS: "I'm going to have a birthday party next week." Mr. Nicefellow: "The members of your family always celebrate their birthdays, I believe?" Little Miss: "Yes, all but sister. She's got so careless, she's beginnin' to skip hers."

The "No Medicine" Cure.

"YES," said the sober-faced man, "we tried everything for her. We had allcpaths and homeopaths, and water cures and movement cures, and they could do nothing for her. We finally gave up in despair, and——" "And she lingered along for a week or two, until death at last brought relief to her suffering," said the man who interrupts. "No, she got well immediately."

Result of the "Detective" Competition.

THE first prize of £5 has been awarded to Mr. Alec Malcolm, of Clifton Villa, Terenure, Dublin.

(10) The one who sat in the chair on the right of armchair.

THE LOVERS OF YVONNE

By RAFAEL SABATINI.

CHAPTER XVI.
The Way of Woman.

For all that I realised that this love of mine for Yvonne was as a child still-born—a thing that had no existence save in the heart that had begotten it—I rejoiced meanly at the thought that she was not destined to become Andrea's wife. For since I understood that this woman, who to me was like no other of her sex, was not for so poor a thing as Gaston de Luynes—like the dog in the fable I wished that no other might possess her. Inevitable it seemed that sooner or later one must come who would woo and win her. But ere that befell, my Lord Cardinal would have meted out justice to me—the justice of the rope methought—and I should not be by to gnash my teeth in jealousy.

That evening, when the Chevalier de Canaples had gone to pay a visit to his vineyard, the thing that next to himself he loved most in the world, and whilst Geneviève and Andrea were vowing a deathless love to each other in the rose-garden—their favourite haunt when the Chevalier was absent—I seized the opportunity for making my farewells to Yvonne.

We were leaning together upon the balustrade of the terrace, and our gazes were turned towards the river and the wooded shores beyond, a landscape this that was as alive and beautiful now as it had been dead and grey when first I came to Canaples two months ago.

Scarce were my first words spoken when she turned towards me, and methought—but I was mad I told myself—that there was a catch in her voice as she exclaimed, "You are leaving us, Monsieur?"

"To-morrow morning I shall crave Monsieur your father's permission to quit Canaples."

"But why, Monsieur? Have we not made you happy here?"

"So happy, Mademoiselle," I answered with fervour, "that at times it passes my belief that I am indeed Gaston de Luynes. But go I must. My honour demands of me this sacrifice."

And in answer to the look of astonishment that filled her wondrous eyes, I told her what I had told Andrea touching my word of honour to Montrésor, and the necessity of its redemption. As Andrea had done, she also dubbed it madness; but her glance was nevertheless so full of admiration that methought to have earned it was worth the immolation of liberty, of life perchance, who could say?

"Before I go, Mademoiselle," I pursued, looking straight before me as I spoke, and dimly conscious that her glance was bent upon my face. "Before I go, I fain would thank you for all that you have done for me here. Your care has saved my life, Mademoiselle; your kindness, methinks, has saved my soul. For it seems to me that I am no longer the same man whom Michelot fished out of the Loire that night two months ago. I would thank you, Mademoiselle, for the happiness that has been mine during the past few days—a happiness such as for years has not fallen to my lot. To another and worthier man the task of thanking you might be an easy one; but to me, who know myself to be so far beneath you, the obligation is so overwhelming that I know of no words to fitly express it."

"Monsieur, Monsieur, I beseech you. Already you have said overmuch."

"Nay, Mademoiselle, not half enough."

"Have you forgotten, then, what you did for me? Our trivial service to you is but unseemly recompense. What other man would have come to my rescue as you came, with such odds against you, and forgetting the affronting words wherewith that very day I had met your warning? Tell me, Monsieur, who would have done that?"

"Why, any man who deemed himself a gentleman, and who possessed such knowledge as I had."

She laughed a laugh of unbelief.

"You are mistaken, sir," she answered. "The deed was worthy of one of those valiant knights we read of, and I have never known but one man capable of accomplishing it."

Those words and the tone wherein they were uttered set my brain on fire. I turned towards her; our glances met and in her eyes—those eyes that but a while ago had never looked on me without avowing the disdain wherein she had held me—were now filled with a light of kindliness, of sympathy, of tenderness, that seemed more than I could endure.

Already my hand was thrust into the bosom of my doublet, and my fingers were about to drag forth that little shred of green velvet that I had found in the coppice on the day of her abduction, and that I had kept ever since as one keeps the relic of a departed saint. Another moment, and I should have poured out the story of the mad, hopeless passion that filled my heart to bursting, when of a sudden, "Yvonne! Yvonne!" came Geneviève's fresh voice from the other end of the terrace. The spell of that moment was broken.

Methought Mademoiselle made a little gesture of impatience as she answered her sister's call; then, with a word of apology, she left me.

Half-dazed by the emotions that had made sport of me, I leant over the balustrade, and with my elbows on the stone and my chin on my palms, I stared stupidly before me, thanking God for having sent Geneviève in time to save me from again earning Mademoiselle's scorn. For as I grew sober, I did not doubt but that with scorn she would have met the wild words that already trembled on my lips.

I laughed harshly. "Gaston, Gaston," I muttered, "at thirty-two you are more a fool than ever you were at twenty."

I told myself then that my fancy had vested her tone and look with a kindliness far beyond that which they contained, and as I thought of how I had deemed impatient the little gesture wherewith she had greeted Geneviève's interruption, I laughed again.

From the reverie into which naturally enough I lapsed, it was Mademoiselle who aroused me. She stood beside me, with an unrest of manner so unusual in her that straightway I guessed the substance of her talk with Geneviève.

"So, Mademoiselle," I said, without waiting for her to speak, "you have learnt what is afoot."

"I have," she answered. "That they love each other is no news to me. That they intend to wed does not surprise me. But that they should contemplate a secret marriage passes my comprehension."

I cleared my throat as men will when about to embark upon a parlous subject with no starting-point determined.

"It is time, Mademoiselle," I began, "that you should learn the true cause of M. de Mancini's presence at Canaples. It will enlighten you touching his motives for a secret wedding. Had things fallen out as was intended by those who planned his visit, Monsieur your father and my Lord Cardinal, it is improbable that you would ever have heard that which it now becomes necessary that I should tell you. I trust, Mademoiselle," I continued, "that you will hear me in a neutral spirit, without permitting your personal feelings to enter into your consideration of that which I shall unfold."

"So long a preface augurs anything but well," she interposed, looking monstrous serious.

"Not ill at least, I hope. Hear me, then. Your father and his Eminence are friends; the one has a daughter who is said to be very wealthy, and whom he, with fond ambition, desires to see wed to a man who can give her an illustrious name; the other possesses a nephew whom he can ennoble by the highest title that a man may bear who is not a prince of the blood—and borne indeed by few who are not—and whom he desires to see contract an alliance that will bring him enough of riches to enable him to bear his title with becoming dignity."

I glanced at Mademoiselle whose cheeks were growing an ominous red.

"Well, Mademoiselle," I continued, "your father and Monseigneur de Mazarin appear to have bared their hearts' desire to each other, and M. de Mancini was sent to Canaples to woo and win your father's elder daughter."

A long pause followed, during which she stood with face aflame, averted eyes, and heaving bosom, betraying the feelings that stormed within her at the disclosure of the bargain whereof she had been a part. At length, "Oh, Monsieur!" she exclaimed in a choking voice, and clenching her shapely hands, "to think——"

"I beseech you not to think, Mademoiselle," I interrupted, calmly; for having taken the first plunge, I was now master of myself. "The ironical little god, whom the ancients painted with bandaged eyes, has led M. de Mancini by the nose in this matter, and things have gone awry for the plotters. There, Mademoiselle, you have the reason for a clandestine union. Did Monsieur your father guess how Andrea's affections have—" I caught the word "miscarried" betimes, and substituted, "gone against his wishes, his opposition is not a thing to be doubted."

"Are you sure there is no mistake?" she inquired after a pause. "Is all this really true, Monsieur?"

"It is, indeed."

"But how comes it that my father has seen naught of what has been so plain to me—that M. de Mancini was ever at my sister's side?"

"Your father, Mademoiselle, is much engrossed in his vineyard. Moreover, when the Chevalier has been at hand, Andrea has been careful to show no greater regard for the one than for the other of you. I instructed him in this duplicity many weeks ago."

She looked at me for a moment.

"Oh, Monsieur," she cried passionately, "how deep is my humiliation! To think that I was made a part of so vile a bargain! Oh, I am glad that M. de Mancini has proved above the sordid task to which they set him, glad that he will dupe the Cardinal and my father."

"So am not I, Mademoiselle," I exclaimed.

She vouchsafed me a stare of ineffable surprise.

"How?"

"I am M. de Mancini's friend," I answered. "It was to shield him that I fought your brother; again, because of my attitude towards him was it that I went perilously near assassination at Reaux. Enemies sprang up about him when the Cardinal's matrimonial projects became known. Your brother picked a quarrel with him, and when I had dealt with your brother, St. Auban appeared, and after St. Auban there were others. When it is known that he has played this trick upon Uncle Giulio, his enemies will disappear; but, on the other hand, his prospects will all be blighted, and for that I am sorry."

"So that was the motive of your duel with Eugène?"

"At last you learn it."

"And," she added in a curious voice, "you would have been better pleased had M. de Mancini carried out his uncle's wishes?"

"It matters little what I would think, Mademoiselle," I answered guardedly, for I could not read that curious tone of hers.

"Nevertheless I am curious to hear your answer."

What answer could I make? The truth—that for all my fine talk I was at heart and in a sense right glad that she was not to become Andrea's wife—would have seemed ungallant. Moreover, I must have added the explanation that I desired to see her no man's wife, so that I might not seem to contradict myself. Therefore, "In truth, Mademoiselle," I answered, lying glibly, "it would have given me more pleasure had Andrea chosen to obey his Eminence."

Her manner froze upon the instant.

"In the consideration of your friend's advancement," she replied, half-contemptuously, "you forget, M. de Luynes, to consider me. Am I, then, a thing to be bartered into the hands of the first fortune-hunter who woos me because he has been bidden so to do, and who is to marry me for political purposes? Pshaw, M. de Luynes," she added, with a scornful laugh, "after all, I was a fool to expect aught else from——"

She checked herself abruptly, and in a sudden access of mercy left the stinging "you" unuttered. I stood by, dumb and sheepish, not understanding how the words that I had deemed gallant could have brought this tempest down upon my head. Before I could say aught that might have righted matters, or perchance made them worse, "Since you leave Canaples to-morrow," quoth she, "I will say farewell, Monsieur, for it is unlikely that we shall meet again."

With a slight inclination of her head, and withholding her hand intentionally, she moved away, whilst I stood, as only a fool or a statue would stand, and watched her go.

Once she paused, and indeed half-turned, whereupon hope knocked at my heart again; but before I had admitted it, she had resumed her walk towards the house. Hungrily I watched her lissom, graceful figure with my eyes until she had crossed the threshold. Then, with a dull ache in my breast, I flung myself upon a stone seat, and addressing myself to the setting sun for want of a better audience, I roundly reviled her sex for the knottiest puzzle that ever had plagued the mind of man in unravelling.

CHAPTER XVII.

Father and Son.

"GASTON," quoth Andrea, next morning, "you will remain at Canaples until to-morrow. You must; for to-morrow I am to be wed, and I would fain have your good wishes ere you go."

"Nice hands mine to seek a benediction at," I grumbled.

"But you will remain? Come, Gaston, we have been good friends, you and I, and who knows when next we shall meet? Believe me, I shall value your 'God speed' above all others."

"Likely enough, since it will be the only one you'll hear."

But for all my sneers he was not to be put off. He talked and coaxed so winningly that in the end, albeit I am not a man easily turned from the course he has set himself, the affectionate pleading in his fresh young voice and the affectionate look in his dark eyes won me to his way.

Forthwith I went in quest of the Chevalier, whom, at the indication of a lackey, I discovered in the room it pleased him to call his study, that same room into which we had been ushered on the day of our arrival at Canaples. I told him that on the morrow I must set out for Paris; and albeit he at first expressed a polite regret, yet when I had shown him how my honour was involved in my speedy return thither, he did not urge me to put off my departure.

"It grieves me, sir, that you must go, and I deeply regret the motive that is taking you. Yet I hope that his Eminence, in recognition of the services you have rendered his nephew, will see fit to forget what cause for resentment he may have against you, and render you your liberty. If you will give me leave, Monsieur, I will write to his Eminence in this strain, and you shall be the bearer of my letter."

I thanked him, with a smile of deprecation, as I thought of the true cause of Mazarin's resentment, which was precisely that upon the plea of which M. de Canaples sought to obtain for me my liberation.

"And now, Monsieur," he pursued nervously, "touching Andrea and his visit here, I would say a word to you, who are his friend, and may haply know something of his mind. It is over two months since he came here, and yet the—er—affair which we had hoped to bring about seems no nearer its conclusion than when first he came. Of late I have watched him, and I have watched Yvonne; they are certainly good friends, yet not even the frail barrier of formality appears overcome betwixt them, and I am beginning to fear that Andrea is not only lukewarm in this matter, but is forgetful of his uncle's wishes and selfishly indifferent to Monseigneur's projects and mine, which, as he well knows, are the reason of his sojourn at my Château. What think you of this, M. de Luynes?"

He shot a furtive glance at me as he spoke, and with his long, lean forefinger he combed his beard in a nervous fashion.

I gave a short laugh to cover my embarrassment at the question. "What do I think, Monsieur?" I echoed, to gain time. Then, thinking that a sententious answer would be the most fitting. "Love is as the spark that lies latent in flint and steel. For days and weeks these two may be as close together as you please, and naught will come of it; but one fine day a hand—the hand of chance—will strike the one against the other, and lo! the spark is born."

"You speak in parables, Monsieur," was his caustic comment.

"'Tis in parables that all religions are preached," I returned, "and love, methinks, is a great religion in this world."

"Love, sir, love!" he cried petulantly. "The word makes me sick. What has love to do with this union? Love, sir, is a pretty theme for poets, romancers, and fools. The imagination of such a sentiment—for it is a sentiment that does not live save in the imagination—may serve to draw peasants and other low-bred clods into wedlock. With such as we—with gentlemen—it has naught to do. So let that be, Monsieur. Andrea de Mancini came hither to wed my daughter."

"And I am certain, Monsieur," I answered stoutly, "that Andrea will wed your daughter."

"You speak with confidence."

"I know Andrea well. Signs that may be hidden to you are clear to me, and I have faith in my prophecy."

He looked at me and fell a victim to my confidence of manner. The petulancy died out of his face.

"Well, well! We will hope. My lord Cardinal is to create him duke, and he will assume as title his wife's estate, becoming known to history as Andrea de Mancini, Duke de Canaples. Thus shall a great house be founded that will bear our name. You see the importance of it?"

"Clearly."

"And how reasonable is my anxiety?"

"Assuredly."

"And you are in sympathy with me?"

"Doesn't it appear so? Why else did I go so near to killing your son?"

"True," he mused; then suddenly he added, "by the way, have you heard that Eugène has become one of the leaders of these frondeur madmen?"

"Ah! Then he is quite recovered?"

"Unfortunately!" he assented, with a grimace, and thus our interview ended.

That day wore slowly to its close. I wandered hither and thither in the château and the grounds, hungering throughout the long hours for a word with Mademoiselle—a glimpse of her, at least.

But all day long she kept her chamber, the pretext being that "Are you sure there is no mistake?" she inquired after a pause.

she was suffering from indisposition. By accident I came upon her that evening, at last, in the salon, yet my advent was the signal for her departure, and all the words she had for me were, "Still at Canaples, Monsieur? I thought you were to have left this morning." She looked paler than her wont, and her eyes were somewhat red.

"I am remaining until to-morrow," said I awkwardly.

"Indeed!" was all she answered, and she was gone.

Next morning the Chevalier and I breakfasted alone. Mademoiselle's indisposition was worse. Geneviève was nursing, so her maid brought word, whilst Andrea had gone out an hour before and was not returned.

The Chevalier shot me an apologetic glance across the board.

"'Tis a poor 'God speed' to you, M. de Luynes."

I made light of it, and turned the conversation into an indifferent channel, wherein it abided until, filling himself a bumper of Anjou, the Chevalier solemnly drank to my safe journey and good fortune in Paris.

At the moment Andrea entered by the door abutting on to the terrace balcony. He was flushed, and his eyes sparkled with a joyous fever. Profuse was he in his apologies, which, howbeit, were passing vague in character, and which he brought to a close by pledging me as the Chevalier had done already.

As we rose, Geneviève appeared with the news that Yvonne was somewhat better, adding that she had come to take leave of me. Her composure surprised me gladly; for albeit in her eyes there was also a tell-tale light, her lids, demurely downcast as was her wont, amply screened it from the vulgar gaze.

Andrea would tell his father-in-law of the marriage later in the day; and for all that I am not a chicken-hearted man, still I had no stomach to be at hand when the storm exploded.

The moment having come for my departure, and Michelot awaiting me already with the horses in the courtyard, M. de Canaples left us to seek the letter which I was to carry to his Eminence. So soon as the door had closed upon him, Andrea came forward, leading his bride by the hand, and asked me to wish them happiness.

"With all my heart," I answered; "and if happiness be accorded you in a measure with the fervency of my wishes then shall you indeed be happy. Each of you I congratulate upon the companion in life you have chosen. Cherish him, Mademoi—Madame, for he is loyal and true, and such are rare in this world."

It is possible that I might have said more in this benign and fatherly strain, for it seemed to me that this new rôle I had assumed suited me wondrous well, but a shadow that drew our eyes towards the nearest window interrupted me. And what we saw there drew a cry from Andrea, a shudder from Geneviève, and from me a gasp that was half-amazement, half-dismay. For leaning upon the sill, surveying us with a sardonic, evil grin, we beheld Eugène de Canaples, the man whom I had left with a sword thrust through his middle, behind the Hôtel Vendôme two months ago. Whence was he sprung, and why came he thus to his father's house?

He started as I faced him, for doubtless St. Auban had boasted to him that he had killed me in a duel. For a moment he remained at the window, then he disappeared, and we could hear the ring of his spurred heel as he walked along the balcony towards the door.

And simultaneously came the quick, hurrying steps of the Chevalier de Canaples as he crossed the hall, returning with the letter he had gone to fetch.

Geneviève shuddered again, and looked fearfully from one door to the other; Andrea drew a sharp breath like a man in pain, whilst I rapped out an oath to brace my nerves for the scene which we all three foresaw. Then in silence we waited, some subtle instinct warning us of the disaster that impended.

The steps on the balcony halted, and a second later those in the hall; and then, as though the thing had been rehearsed and timed so that the spectators might derive the utmost effect from it, the doors opened together, and on the opposing thresholds, with the width of the room betwixt them, stood father and son confronted.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Whilst a man might perchance count a dozen did those two remain motionless, the one eyeing the other. But their bearing was as widely different as their figures; Eugène's stalwart frame stood firm and erect, insolence in every line of it, reflected perchance from the smile that lurked about the corners of his thin-lipped mouth.

The hat, which he had not had the grace to doff, set jauntily upon his straight black hair; the jerkin of leather which he wore, and the stout sword which hung from the plainest of belts, all served to give him the air of a ruffler or tavern knight.

The Chevalier, on the other hand, stood as if turned to stone. From his enervated fingers the letter fluttered to the ground, and in his pale, thin face was to be read a displeasure mixed with fear.

At length, with an oath, the old man broke the silence.

"What seek you at Canaples?" he asked in a quivering voice, as he advanced into the room. "Are you so dead to shame that you dare present yourself with such effrontery? Off with your hat, sir," he blazed, stamping his foot, and going from pale to crimson. "Off with your hat, or by Heaven, I'll have you flung out of doors by my grooms."

This show of vehemence, as sudden as it was unexpected, drew from Eugène a meek obedience that I had not looked for. Nevertheless, the young man's lip curled as he uncovered.

"How fatherly is your greeting," he sneered.

The Chevalier's eyes flashed a glance that lacked no venom at his son.

"What manner of greeting did you look for?" he returned hotly. "Did you expect me to set a ring upon your finger and have the fattest calf killed in honour of your return? Good Heavens, sir! Have you come hither to show me how a father should welcome the profligate son who has dishonoured his name? Why are you here, unbidden? Answer me, sir."

A deep flush overspread Eugène's cheeks.

"I had thought when I crossed the threshold this was the Château de Canaples, or else that my name was Canaples, I know not which. Clearly I was mistaken, for here is a lady who has no word either of greeting or intercession for me, and who therefore cannot be my sister, and yonder a man whom I should never look to find in my father's house."

I took a step forward, a hot answer on my lips, when from the doorway at my back came Yvonne's sweet voice, "Eugène! You here?"

"As you see, sister. Though had you delayed your coming, 'tis probable you would no longer have found me; for your father welcomes me with oaths and threatens me with his grooms."

She cast a reproachful glance upon the Chevalier, 'neath which the anger seemed to die out of him; then she went forward with hands outstretched and a sad smile upon her lips.

"Yvonne!" The Chevalier's voice rang out sharp and sudden. "I forbid you approach that man!"

For a moment she appeared to hesitate, then leisurely pursuing her way, she set her hands upon her brother's shoulders and embraced him.

The Chevalier swore through set teeth, Geneviève trembled, Andrea looked askance, and I laughed softly at the Chevalier's discomfiture. Eugène flung his hat and cloak in a corner, and strode across the room to where his father stood.

"And now, Monsieur, since I have travelled all the way from Paris to save my house from a step that will bring it into the contempt of all France, I shall not go until you have heard me."

The Chevalier shrugged his shoulders, and made as if to turn away. Yvonne's greeting of her brother appeared to have quenched the spark of spirit that for a moment had glimmered in the little man's breast.

"Monsieur," cried Eugène, "believe me that what I have to say is of the utmost importance, and say it I will, whether before these strangers or in your private car shall be as you elect."

The old man glanced about him like one who seeks a way of escape. At last—"If say it you must," he growled, "say it here and now. And when you have said it, go."

Eugène scowled at me, and from me to Andrea. To pay him for that scowl I had it in my mind to stay; but overcoming the clownish thought I took Andrea by the arm.

"Come, Andrea," I said, "we will take a turn outside while these family matters are in discussion."

I had a shrewd idea what was the substance of Eugène's mission to Canaples—to expostulate with his father touching the proposed marriage of Yvonne to the Cardinal's nephew.

Nor was I wrong; for when, some moments later, the Chevalier recalled us from the terrace, where we were strolling, "What think you he has come hither to tell me?" he inquired as we entered. He pointed to his son as he spoke, and passion shook his slender frame as the breeze shakes a leaf. Mademoiselle and Geneviève sat hand in hand, Yvonne deadly pale, Geneviève weeping.

"What think you he has the effrontery to say? It seems that he has profited little by the lesson you read him in the horse-market about meddling in matters which concern him not. He has come hither to tell me that he will not permit his sister to wed the Cardinal's nephew; that he will not have the estates of Canaples pass into the hands of a foreign upstart. He forsooth—he! he! he!" And at each utterance of the pronoun he lunged with his forefinger in the direction of his son. "This is he not ashamed to utter before Yvonne herself."

"You compelled me to do so," cried Eugène angrily.

"I?" ejaculated the Chevalier. "Did I compel you to come hither with your 'I will' and 'I will not'? Who are you that you should give laws at Canaples? And he adds, sir," quoth the old knight excitedly, "that sooner than allow this marriage to take place he will kill M. de Mancini."

"I shall be happy to afford him the opportunity!" shouted Andrea, bounding forward.

Eugène looked up quickly and gave a short laugh. Thereupon followed a wild hubbub; everyone rushed forward and everyone talked, even little Geneviève—louder than all the rest.

"You shall not fight! You shall not fight!" she cried, and her voice was so laden with command that all others grew silent, and all eyes we returned upon her.

"What affair is this of yours, little one?" quoth Eugene.

"'Tis this," she answered panting, "that you need fear no marriage 'twixt my sister and Andrea."

In her eagerness she had cast caution to the winds of Heaven. Her father and brother stared askance at her; I gave an inward groan.

"Andrea!" echoed Eugène at last. "What is this man to you that you speak thus of him?"

The girl flung herself upon her father's breast.

"Father," she sobbed, "dear father, forgive!"

The Chevalier's brow grew dark; roughly he seized her by the arms, and, holding her at arms' length, scanned her face.

"What, must I forgive?" he inquired in a thick voice. "What is M. de Mancini to you?"

Some sinister note in her father's voice caused the girl to grow of a sudden calm and to assume a rigidity that reminded me of her sister.

"He is my husband," she answered, and there was a note of pride, almost of triumph, in her voice.

An awful silence followed the launching of that thunderbolt. Eugène stood with open mouth, staring now at Geneviève, now at his father. Andrea set his arm about his bride's waist, and her fair head was laid trustingly upon his shoulder. The Chevalier's eyes rolled ominously. At length he spoke in a dangerously calm voice.

"How long is it—how long have you been wed?"

"Out of my house—you and this wife of yours."

"We were wed in Blois an hour ago," answered Geneviève.

Something that was like a grunt escaped the Chevalier, then his eye fastened upon me, and his anger boiled up.

"You knew of this?" he asked, coming towards me.

"I knew of it."

"Then you lied to me yesterday."

I drew myself up, stiff as a broomstick.

"I do not understand," I answered coldly.

"Did you not give me your assurance that M. de Mancini would marry Yvonne?"

"I did not, Monsieur. I did but tell you that he would wed your daughter. And by Heaven, your daughter he has wed."

"You have fooled me, you knave!" he blazed forth. "You, who have been sheltered by—— "

"Father!" Yvonne interrupted, taking his arm, "M. de Luynes has behaved no worse than have I, or any one of us in this matter."

"No!" he cried, and pointed to Andrea. "'Tis you who have wrought this infamy. Eugène," he exclaimed, turning of a sudden to his son, "you have a sword; wipe out this shame."

"Shame!" echoed Geneviève. "Oh, father, where is the shame? If it were no shame for Andrea to marry Yvonne, surely—— "

"Silence!" he thundered. "Eugène!"

But Eugène answered him with a contemptuous laugh. "You are quick enough to call upon my sword now that things have not fallen out as you would have them. Where are your grooms now, Monsieur?"

"Insolent hound!" cried his father indignantly. Then, letting fall his arms with something that was near akin to a sob, "Is there no one left to do aught but mock me?" he groaned.

But this weakness was no more than momentary. "Out of my house, sir!" he blazed, turning upon Andrea, and for a moment methought he would have struck him. "Out of my house—you and this wife of yours."

"Father!" sobbed Geneviève, with hands outstretched in intreaty.

"Out of my house," he repeated, "and you, also, Master de Luynes. Away with you! Go with the master you have served so well." And turning on his heel, he strode towards the door.

"Father—dear father!" cried Geneviève, following him, He slammed the door in her face for answer.

With a moan she sank down upon her knees, her frail body shaken by convulsive sobs. Oh, Heaven! What a bridal morn was hers.

Andrea and Yvonne raised her and led her to a chair. Eugène watched them with a cynical eye, then laughed brutally, and gathering up his hat and cloak, he moved towards the balcony door and vanished.

"Is M. de Luynes still there?" quoth Geneviève presently.

"I am here, Mademoiselle."

"You had best set out, Monsieur," she said. "We shall follow soon—very soon."

I took Andrea aside and asked him whither it was his intention to take his wife. He replied that they would go to Chambord, where they would remain for some weeks in the hope that the Chevalier might relent sufficiently to forgive them. Thereafter it was his purpose to take his wife home to his Sicilian demesne.

Our farewells were soon spoken, yet none the less warm for all its brevity was my leave-taking of Andrea, and our wishes for each other's happiness were as fervent as the human heart can shape. We little thought that we were not destined to meet again for years.

Yvonne's farewell was cold and formal—so cold and formal that it seemed to rob the sunshine of its glory for me as I stepped out into the open air.

After all, what mattered it? I was a fool to have entertained a single tender thought concerning her.

The Man who Hated Children.

Be pleased to consider how small are the beginnings of things—big things. When he was yet a very young fellow, say seventeen or eighteen, and spending a sweltering August at a seaside resort, Stamford made the remark that little children bored him and that he hated them. This was more or less true, for a boy of eighteen hasn't the moral right to hate anybody, especially children. Young Stamford had made the remark for the sake of effect. Some girls were about and he wanted to astonish them.

Stamford didn't hate children at all; quite the contrary, as events proved. But once having made the remark, he had to live up to it. So he went about that resort saying, "I hate children, I hate children!" till he made people believe him, and ended by believing it himself. A lie never seems so true as when it has been crystallised into words.

Stamford had very arbitrarily chosen his hatred of children as his fad, and he wore this nasty fad conspicuously, as some African tribesman might wear a hideous ornament, until it grows into his flesh and becomes almost a part of him. Stamford's "pet aversion" became almost—I say almost—a part of him, and he nursed it and fostered it until it developed hugely, so that he actually believed that he could not stay in the same room with an active, noisy little child, boy or girl.

"I can't help it," he would say. "It's an instinct, like some people's aversion to cats. Let 'em be old enough to take care of themselves, and I don't mind; but a nasty, mewling, salmon-pink baby, all head and red dough— B-r-r!" Thus Stamford, with a shudder of horror that he believed was genuine. And all the while, way down in his heart of hearts he was a kindly, lovable fellow, with no more dislike for babies than you or I or the rest of us.

Three years after he was married his first baby was born—a girl.

Stamford loved his wife—no man better. They two had a delicious little house right out in the country. It was far enough removed from the end of the world of the nearest town, to be near enough to Heaven for all practical purposes, and for three years Stamford lived out the dearest period of his life there, wallowing in happiness, as one might say, fairly miring himself in the pure delight of being alive—and married, married to Mrs. Stamford. For she was a dear, beautiful girl, and the pair loved each other better than most people.

When the little girl was born Stamford said to me, across his smoking-table (we were in the billiard-room and the wheels of the doctor's trap were just grating off down the road), Stamford said, or rather whispered, because Mrs. Stamford's room was just above:

"I can't help it, Sturgis, it's an instinct. I suppose I was born with an aversion to children (he really believed he was honest), and I'll die with it. I'm that baby's father, but till it gets old I shall hate it, I know I shall. I don't want to see it"—he made a squiriming movement with one shoulder—"I'd rather have a blind kitten crammed down my back than have the touch of that child on me. You can't understand that, can you?"

"No, I can't," says I, "and I think you are a horrible unfeeling brute, that should be well kicked—you wretch."

"That is all quite true," he answered, "I am worse than a brute, for even a brute cares for its whelps; but give me time. When she grows up I suppose I shall like her."

"Suppose you shall like your daughter? Now that sounds fine. Where's my hat?"

"Going?"

"Sorry I came!"

"Well, you know how it is," said he at the door. "It's an unreasoned instinct. I can't help it. I hate children, and all's said. Think of feeling it clawing at your nose and ears. It gives me shudders to think of it!"

Here I couldn't stand him any longer so went away. If you know anything of men's friendships, you will have understood from the preceding conversation that Stamford and I were the best chums in the world. That is why, five years later, when I came back to the place again I went straight to Stamford's house. I had heard a good deal about him during those intervening five years and was prepared for changes. But even at that, the difference was poignant. The little house stood buried in weeds, the gate was gone and the small panes of the windows smashed.

Stamford opened the door for me. Evidently he had not shaved that week. He was in his stocking feet. His eyes looked at me out of saucers of brown skin. The place reeked of stale tobacco smoke, and it did not need the sight of the unmade bed nor the cigar stumps in the card tray to tell me that Stamford was living there alone.

Towards two o'clock that night, over his tenth brandy-and-water and his last cigar, Stamford told me the tale of the things that had happened.

"It began all of a sudden on one day," said he, his hands on his chin, glowering into the fire grate. "'Jack' (that was Mrs. Stamford) had been up about a week. I hadn't so much as seen Emmie yet, and Jack and I had almost quarrelled about her. Jack had begged me just to look into the room while she was asleep, but I couldn't—I mean that I wouldn't do it. One Sunday afternoon when Emmie was about three weeks old, I was stretched out on the sofa here sort of half-asleep, when Jack came up to me very softly, and before I knew it put Emmie into my arms.

"'Joe,' she says, 'look at her now, your little daughter, how can you help loving her—' She was going to say something else, but she never got further than that. Emmie snuggled down into my neck and put her little fists into my face. I jumped up and pushed her, almost threw her, from me, recoiling as though a snake had touched me.

"'Take it away,' I cried. 'For Heaven's sake take it away, I hate it and loathe it, and I always will hate it!'

"Jack was only a week out of bed. I don't need to tell you how delicately poised a woman is at such a time as that, how tangled and jagged her nerves are. The doctors have got names for it all. She heard what I said, and saw me thrusting my little daughter away from me. Then she looked at me once in—I say she gave me—she—you see"—Stamford cleared his throat—"she gave a little sigh, and went down softly into a little heap on the floor.

"She was in the hospital about a month, and for a time we thought she would never be right in the head again. I wasn't allowed to see her, and her folks took Emmie. After a month's time, though, the doctors brought her round all right; said she had pulled through sound as a nut, and that I might see her. She knew I was coming. They had her propped up in a big deck-chair by a window. I had sent her a lot of flowers and she wore some of them.

"When I came into the room I saw her leaning back there in the deck-chair. She looked up at me and smiled, happy as could be to see me. Then all at once her expression changed to one of the most abject horror and revulsion. She put up her hands to shut out the sight of me, and cried out, 'No, no, I can't. Take him away, oh, somebody take him away!' It was no use reasoning with her, she got hysterical, screamed and fought from me as though I were a leper or a murderer. I had to go, and as soon as I was gone she was quiet again. Couldn't understand herself how it had happened.

"The doctors said I could come the next day, and as soon as Jack heard my foot on the stairs she fainted with the pure horror of the thought of seeing me. She had forgiven me my brutality with Emmie, loved me as much as ever, mark you, longed to see me as much as I onged to see her, and yet went mad with loathing as soon as I came near. This was the one point of insanity of which the doctors could not cure her. They have never been able to cure her. We have tried everything. She can't even see my handwriting without that horrible revulsion seizing upon her. But she can write to me and she does, and that's how I know she is suffering as much as I.

"How much we two have gone through, Heaven only knows. Can you imagine the horror of the situation? We are as dear to each other as ever—more so," he cried, digging his nails into his temples, "more so. We are here, here in the same place, where I can see her every day, and yet we are worlds apart. It's a death in life, a death in life," and he rocked himself to and fro in his place. "Every Sunday we have arranged that she shall go to church. She tells me where she sits, and I go up in the gallery and peep at her from behind pillars. Even that is bad for her, but she can stand it for an hour once a week. Once she caught sight of me and——" He broke off suddenly and closed his eyes.

"And Emmie?" said I.

"Emmie will be eight to-morrow. Here's a lot of pictures that Jack has sent me from time to time. Isn't she the finest little girl you ever saw, and bright, bright as a new pin."

"How about her?" I asked him. "You manage to see her when her mother's not by, I suppose."

I saw the knuckles of Stamford's fist whiten suddenly.

"Emmie is—is like—Emmie takes after her mother. By the way, you have some little nieces, haven't you? What do you give 'em on Christmas, and—and on their birthdays and such like? Emmie's eight to-morrow. Books wouldn't do, would they, eh? Is she too old for toys—or too young? Here's what I got her. I thought I'd take the chances on toys."

He turned to the table and undid a few packages.

"There's a little doll," he said, "and you see," he added proudly, "she closes her eyes when you lay her down, and there's a doll's house; aren't those little chairs and tables sweet? I fancy Emmie will like those all right. I can just see her eyes stick out when she undoes the package. I think I'll get a big doll house like that for my kindergarten—I've started a kind of a kindergarten in the town that you must see. And here, look at this. Here's another thing I am going to send to Emmie. Catch hold of this. Here's a little pump, and, by Jove, you can pump real water in it, see," and he showed me how it worked. "I wonder if Emmie will know that you can pump 'truly' water with it? Tell you what, you write it on a card and put it in, will you?"

"Why not you?"

"Well—you see, they might recognise my handwriting."

"Shan't I say," said I, pen in hand, "that it all comes from you, with many happy birthdays?"

"Not that, above all things," said Stamford. "I can't forget all that's happened."

* * * * *

Ten years passed before I again visited Stamford, and then what a change I found. The house no longer bore a deserted look, but was in good repair; the garden, too, had been put into decent order.

I was thus prepared for a change in Stamford himself, and was not disappointed, his appearance being smart and well cared-for as it had been in the old days.

The house inside evidenced the presence of a feminine hand, and at luncheon a pretty girl of about eighteen occupied a seat at one end of the table; Stamford introduced her to me as his daughter.

When we were having a chat over our cigars in his den Stamford told me that not long after my previous visit his wife had died and with her last words had intrusted little Emmie to his care. She did not take to him at all at first, but after a time they became great friends, and since then had become inseparable companions, despite the great disparity in age.

"I don't hate children now," were his last words, as I left him.

GIGANTIC NAME HUNTING COMPETITION.

Members of Parliament.

1st Prize: £25.

3rd Prize: £3.

One Sovereign will be given to every Competitor, no matter how many errors may be made, who is one of those whose attempts form the greatest number sent in from any one place (in proportion to the population).

Each separate competitor will count as one—not each set of coupons. Therefore, induce your friends to enter for the competition. If you get a few friends to do so, and they in turn each induce a few friends, the number will soon mount up, and each will get a golden sovereign, no matter how many.

Don't wait any longer before you ask your friends. Tell them about it at once.

 The Billiard Table is made by J. R. Mally and Co., 15 Goswell Road, E.C., and will go into a furnished room 13ft. square. It has a slate bed, and will stand on any dining-table. The cues, balls, marking-board and spirit level are included.*

On the opposite column will be found thirty sets of words, each set describing the name of a gentleman who was a Member of Parliament at the end of 1901.

Write down in the spaces provided the names of all those members you can discover. If you can't find all, put down as many as you can.

Where the initial of the Christian name is indicated it must be given.

Note These Facts. . .

1. Names must be written in ink.
2. Only one name is allowed against each set of words.
3. When you have filled up your list, get the number of Pearson's Weekly published on Friday, January 31st, and fill up the last coupon which it contains.
4. You may send in as many sets of lists as you like, but each set will be accepted independently, and must be pinned together.
5. In the event of the prize being divided, only one share will go to each successful competitor, no matter how many duplicate attempts he may send in.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the reader from whom we receive the greatest number of correct solutions. The second prize will be given to the sender of the next most nearly correct solutions, and so on. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor, whose decision is final. The prizes are all offered by Pearson's Weekly.

A Charming Scamp.

LILITH DREW was out of sorts—her maid said out of temper; and judging by the red eyes of the latter, and her limp appearance generally, it might be supposed she had good reason for the supposition. And yet it was difficult to gather what could have ruffled her young mistress; of all persons in the world, old Drew's only daughter, one would think, had little of which to complain—money, and all that money buys, an adoring father, an obedient mother, coupled with youth and a fair share of good looks, what could the girl want besides?

This day, at all events, she should have been all smiles. It was her birthday, and the dainty morning room hung with her favourite shade of pale pink silk, was littered with a profusion of dainty gifts, costly trifles, flowers, jewellery, bonbons, all the thousand and one expensive fripperies dear to the feminine heart.

"Why, Lilith," exclaimed her cousin Marion, "I don't think you've ever had so many presents. What a lucky girl you are!"

"You can have them all so far as I'm concerned. I don't care a rap for any of them."

"Not even for this, Lil?" holding up a costly bracelet from its nest of pale blue velvet.

"For that least of all. He has no business to send me such a thing. He has no right! The idea of a mere acquaintance sending me a present of the kind. Give it me, Marion, I'll send it back at once."

"At least wait until you've spoken to auntie, Lilith. You really can't call Harold Vincent 'a mere acquaintance,' and it would be an insult in any case to send it back. After all, the poor man's only crime is that he cares too much for you."

"Yes, that is it—he cares too much—others too little."

Marion's fair face clouded. She was devoted to her wilful cousin, and had power to soothe the sudden gusts of passion which came over the girl when no one else was able to control or comfort her. But this was a new phase, and she was puzzled.

"Dearest," she said gently, "you are keeping something back from me. What can trouble you, Lilith—on your birthday?"

"My birthday!" said the girl scornfully. "To think that I have waited months and months for to-day only to be disappointed. I was so certain I should be happy this morning, and now—now I am so miserable that I could cry my heart out. Can't you see that I am suffering—wretched? Oh, Marion, Marion, say something kind to me, say something——" The girl's voice died away into a passionate sob.

"Is it Elliot Raeburn?" asked Marion, in a half-fearful tone of voice.

The slight figure, prone upon a heap of silken cushions, stirred uneasily.

"Yes."

"But, Lilith, I thought——"

"I don't mind what you thought, or anything else, Marion. All that I care about is this—I love him, and I thought he cared for me. And now—now I awake to find I have been fooled. That what to me was all too real, was but to him a pastime.

"When we first came back to town," she went on more quietly, "after the summer that we spent in Wales — that never-to-be-forgotten summer when I met him — he used to write regularly. Indeed, up till within six months ago I had a letter nearly every morning. And then the letters stopped quite suddenly, and in my foolish pride I did not write to ask the reason. And so I have eaten out my heart waiting for this, my birthday; hoping, longing, praying for one word from him. And none has come.

"He is so proud," she added, in answer to the unspoken protest on her cousin's face. "I used to beg him to see my father and explain that we were engaged, but he said he would not till he'd made a name. 'Some day, sweetheart, I vow I will be famous, and then we will be happy ever after!' Those were his words, Marion, and I believed him."

"'Tis possible he may be coming to see you!" suggested Marion weakly, not with the faintest belief in the probability of such a thing, but with the desire of turning Lilith's thoughts. "Anyway, you ought to be prepared; besides, you'll have all sorts of questions asked if you mope about all day dissolved in tears."

But Lilith needed no further spur. The hope, the glimmer of a hope that she might see him was enough, and later no one would have recognised in the bright girl who, side by side with Harold Vincent, cantered gaily down the Row—no one, I say, could possibly have recognised in her the despairing creature who, but an hour ago, had sobbed her heart out on her cousin's shoulder.

By the evening all traces of her grief had vanished, and she was radiant in her gown of soft white satin ready for the ball.

"I won't let myself care," she told Marion, with a laugh that somehow ended in a sob. "I'll flirt, let Harry Vane make love to me, and drive Vincent mad with jealousy. You'd think that I was worth remembering, wouldn't you?" she asked, standing in front of a tall mirror, which surely had never held the likeness of a fairer woman.

Tall and slight, with wavy, dark-brown hair and eyes of the same soft hue, she seemed to Harold Vincent the spirit of loveliness, and as she moved towards him in the ball-room, the colour coming and going on her rounded cheeks, he caught his breath and vowed that life was worth nothing without her love.

Marion, watching her cousin from the friendly shelter of a palm, whither her own lover, Sydney Rowth, Vincent's greatest friend, had taken her, thought she had never seen so beautiful a face.

"I wish Lilith cared for Harold Vincent!" she thought regretfully. "It seems such a folly for her to dream of marrying Elliot Raeburn." And then she sighed at the remembrance of her cousin's grief, until Sydney gazed at her in wonder.

"I don't think you have been listening to me, Marion," he said stiffly. "I've been telling you all about the post I have been offered at St. Petersburg."

But Marion had risen to her feet and, all unmindful of her sweetheart's gravely disappointed air, had hastened to her cousin's side.

"What is it dear?" she asked fearfully, at sight of her agitated face.

For answer Lilith handed her a note, and obeying the intreaty in those soft brown eyes, Marion hurried with her from the room.

"It is from him," she whispered; "and he wants me, prays me, to meet him, if but for a moment in the square."

As she spoke she hastily put on a long dark cloak and fastened a piece of lace about her pretty head.

"You can't go, Lil! Are you mad, to dream of such a thing?"

"I tell you," answered the girl, "that nothing shall stop me. I must go. Even now," she added tearfully, "it may be too late. He must have been waiting hours before I got the note."

Argument was useless. All Marion could do was to go with her cousin, and if possible cut short the interview. She had never been much impressed with Elliot Raeburn. His was too complex, too sensitive a nature for the somewhat Puritanical little maiden to understand. But the very qualities that Marion most distrusted appealed irresistibly to Lilith, and, as she had said, if he desired her, nothing would keep her from his side.

Lil was downstairs, and had reached the door which opened from the garden, at the back of the house, into the square before Marion had collected her somewhat scattered faculties sufficiently to follow her. And when at last she overtook Lilith it was to find her clinging tightly to her lover, Elliot Raeburn.

Something in his face choked back the indignation that poor Marion felt, and though she despised herself for the sensation, she was even constrained to feelings of pity, shallow, worthless, as she deemed him. He looked so pale, so worn, so—so shabby in the moonlight, and yet with it all there was a nameless charm about him, a subtle fascination, which Marion acknowledged, even when she found expression for her wrath, in the title which she privately bestowed on him of "a charming scamp!"

The younger son of a younger son, he had run through his slender patrimony and, save for a tumble-down old place in Wales, had nothing left to call his own—except his genius.

"And that," reflected Marion sagely, "is worse than useless without work."

"And why did you never write? Did you cease to care for me, Elliot?"

Marion moved into the shade, and hated Elliot once again for the fascination that he held for Lilith.

"I can never cease to care, my darling! I can never cease to love you. My love is as unalterable as fate. It is part of myself, and can only end with life. But for you it is different; you are so fair, so sweet. What right have I to cast a shade over your bright young life?"

"And I," said Lilith, "can only give you your own words in answer: 'My love for you is unalterable as fate!' But, tell me, dear, why have you not written for so long?"

He was silent for a while, and the moonlight showed the tightening of his lips.

"It's a sorry tale, Lil," he whispered. "I was determined when we parted on that summer day two years ago to do my utmost to make a name—position—in the world. For a while I worked hard, and my pictures sold well, and then—I got discouraged; waiting was weary work, and I drifted into gambling, betting, until I woke one day to find myself without a sou."

"Why did you not write to me? Why——"

"Dear heart!" he whispered fondly: "how could I tell you such a tale of failure and of folly? After a bit I pulled myself together and did fairly well, and now, now I am going to Italy to try once more—perhaps to fail!"

"No, not to fail, for my sake, for the sake of the love I bore you."

And then she whispered her belief in him; how nothing could or should shake her confidence and faith.

"Whatever happens, dear," she said, and no words can paint the tenderness with which she spoke; "whatever happens remember that I love you now and always."

"Now and always," he repeated, and their lips clung in a long passionate kiss.

Marion felt half-guilty that she had to break the spell, and crept unwillingly to Lilith's side.

"You must come now, dear," she whispered. "Say 'good-bye' and get it over."

"For how long, Elliot?" cried his sweetheart. "For how long?"

And no one—even Marion never knew—the pang she suffered when he answered with a sigh:

"At least five years."

It seemed an eternity to two-and-twenty year old Lilith, but she turned a brave face to her lover and quietly followed Marion to the gate.

Then a thought seemed to strike her.

"Go quickly and fetch my portrait off the table, will you, Marion? You know the one I mean—the miniature in the morocco case. I'll go back and ask Elliot to meet me at the corner." And, like a flash, Lilith disappeared.

Marion was flurried, vexed with herself for countenancing Lilith's indiscretion, annoyed with Lilith, more than all, angered with Elliot. Agitated and fearful, she hurried up the stairs and fumbled in the semi-darkness of the room till she found the case required, then once more she fluttered down and waited for her cousin.

"I have found it, Lil," she said. "Promise me to go at once into the ball-room and I'll take it."

With a smile the beauty promised, pausing until Marion had closed the door.

Elliot was standing by a gas-lamp, and Marion's heart beat apprehensively as she approached him.

"Here," she said breathlessly, glancing over her shoulder; "please take it quickly."

A hand grasped the case, also her own slight palm. Marion turned indignantly and tried to free herself, but as she faced the man who held her, her anger faded to a dull, cold fear, and her voice dropped into a moan.

For the figure who stood there in the lamplight, with a white set face and flashing eyes, was Sydney Rowth—her lover.

In a dull sort of way she followed the direction of his gaze; it rested on the case she held. Marion drew nearer; for a moment she fancied she must be dreaming, dazed, and then the truth, the cruel truth, broke upon her.

She had thought to meet Elliot Raeburn with her cousin's portrait, and instead, she'd met her lover—and brought Lilith's diamond bracelet, Vincent's birthday gift!

"I shall of course inform Vincent"—could it be Sydney who was speaking in those cruel, relentless tones?—"it is only due to your cousin to do so. Otherwise this evening's proceedings will not be mentioned—by me, at all events. Of course you will understand everything is at an end between us."

If he had struck her she felt she could have borne it better.

"I may mention," he went on, "that I saw your meeting this evening in the square, and waited here with the intention of settling with—with the man you met—whom you doubtless intended to present with your cousin's diamonds."

Not a suggestion that she might have an explanation to offer, an excuse to make. No, all was over. She had been seen and, therefore, was condemned.

She followed Sydney into the house and waited while he fetched Vincent to the library. She never dreamt of giving up her cousin's secret—Marion was loyal and true as steel—and stood, a forlorn and pitiful little figure, by the window. Only when it was over and he had gone did she turn with streaming eyes and outstretched hands towards the door:

"My heart is broken!" she sobbed; "my heart is broken!" and staggering, fell.

And Vincent, as he lifted the slight form from the ground, felt that, in spite of all appearances, somehow she was not guilty.

And through the night his brain was haunted by the memory of that fair, soft face, that low, despairing cry: "My heart is broken!"

* * * * *

Lilith Drew had always been something of a puzzle to her friends, and was generally spoken of in Society as capricious, to say the least of it. But when, after six seasons, the wilful beauty still remained single, and persistently refused one brilliant offer after another, she was regarded as a most profound enigma, and as much by her own people as mere acquaintances.

Vincent had long given up his quest as hopeless, and had gone abroad, presumably to forget his heartache. As for Lilith herself, she had grown softer, more even-tempered, and, if possible, lovelier than ever. Inexpressibly dear to Marion, she had of late understood something of her little cousin's rare devotion, and had repaid it in her own sweet, lavish fashion.

Marion had never told the true reason of her quarrel with Sydney. Truth to say, the young girl still hoped that her cousin would forget the undesirable though fascinating Elliot, and reward Vincent's long and patient love, and, filled with that hope, she had judged it better to keep silent on the matter of the bracelet, knowing that Lilith, generous to a fault, would at once explain the situation, and in so doing set up a barrier for ever between her and the man whom Marion longed to see her marry.

But gradually even Marion saw that Lilith's heart was irrevocably given to her artist lover, and with a sigh, half of sorrow, half of envy of this wonderful love that had worked such wonders in the wilful Lilith, she gave up planning a brilliant future for her cousin, and resigned herself to seeing her "merely happy."

For herself, happiness seemed to have passed from her life, but in its place had come a quite contentment. She had not seen Sydney since the night he had left her in a passion of grief and humiliation. He could never have really loved her, she thought bitterly, or he would not so soon have got over her loss. He was engaged to a brilliant Society beauty, and was spoken of everywhere as "a rising young diplomatist."

And so the years went on, each one bringing to Lilith a surer promise of a happy future; to Marion a fainter echo of a happy past. Old Drew and his wife had long ago resigned themselves to Lilith's whims, and save for an occasional protest from her mother, generally after a more than usually brilliant offer had been refused, no one interfered with her avowed intention of "remaining single for the present."

"Not so long now, dear!" she whispered to her cousin. "Another six months, and he will be here. Think, Marion, what a lot there'll be to hear, to tell!"

"You have a wonderful amount of faith, Lilith; don't be too sure, dear."

"You forget," replied the girl, "he was to write if he failed, or was ill, or unhappy. Only so long as he was doing well there was to be silence on his part, trust on mine. He has not written, and so I know my faith is not misplaced. I'm sure he will be here."

But as the time went on, bringing ever nearer the hour which was to be the realisation of her fondest dreams, or the crushing of her brightest hopes, Lilith grew restless; now, utterly despondent; now, supremely confident, she seemed consumed with a fever of uncertainty.

It was with a feeling of relief that she learnt that Vincent had returned to town. Every woman has a kindly feeling for an old lover, but he was the only one for whom she entertained a feeling akin slightly to regret.

Vincent soon fell into his old custom of dropping in to afternoon tea, calling for Lilith for a ride, occasionally accompanying them to the theatre, and the quiet friendliness of his manner, so different from the old passionate adoration, was infinitely comforting. He used to talk of his travels, and generally, in some mysterious fashion the conversation drifted round to Rome.

"I knew a young fellow there," he said, "one of the most marvellous painters I have ever met. He's coming over to London, I believe, this year, and would interest you, I think. Romantic-looking fellow, tall and dark. His name? Oh, rather a peculiar one—Elliot Raeburn."

And then Lilith had smiled in such a radiant fashion that he had started and fell to pondering,

Perhaps it was as a result of his reflections that he devoted himself to Marion for the rest of the evening, and when he left, whispered a request for an interview next day.

"I always believed," he said, "that Sydney Rowth did you a great injustice, and now I am certain. I was pretty intimate with Raeburn in Rome, and was struck by the fact that all his pictures were modelled after your cousin Lilith's face; that, and some other things made me draw my own conclusions. Have I your permission to explain to Rowth?"

"No—never; I would rather die!"

"Don't you care for him still—a little?"

The girl's face flushed. How dare he ask such questions, what right had he?

And he answered, taking her hand in his: "The right of love. I have cared for you ever since that night, my dear, when you fell, pale and helpless as a broken lily, and now I care more than ever. Marion, is there any hope?"

Later Lilith looked in with a strange flush on her face and a new light in her eyes.

"Marion!" she cried, but drew back and closed the door when she saw the picture that confronted her—a picture old as the world but ever new.

A fair young girl, whose quiet loveliness was touched into beauty, leaning against her lover, in whose eyes she read all she wished to know.

Lil turned towards someone in the dusky hall—someone who caught her to him with a sigh.

"I'm but a poor sort of fellow, darling, after all. What am I in comparison with Vincent?"

"The man I love!" she said, and kissed him.

* * * * *

Old Drew and his wife, and the world generally, took very kindly to Raeburn; indeed, it is hard to say whether he or his pictures are the most popular nowadays. Despite success, and all that success brings, however, Raeburn himself is very little changed; careless, light-hearted as ever, perhaps Marion is right, when she declares that, after all, he is still, and always will be, just "a charming scamp."

The Most Severe Winter for Years.

Reports from the Meteorological Office predict that this winter will be the most severe we have had for years. An eminent authority on such matters announces that every four years England is visited with an unusually severe spell of cold weather, and this is the year on which it is due. How to keep warm and avoid colds and chills becomes therefore an important question.

The human body may be said to be heated by a system of "hot pipes." These "pipes" are the arteries and veins through which the hot blood is forced by the heart. When ill-health supervenes the blood becomes poor and thin, and does not carry enough oxygen to thoroughly warm the extremities. Cold hands and feet, a general sensation of chill, and a shrinking from the least draught are symptoms which reveal this condition. On the other hand the heart may be weakened by some ailment, and rendered unable to pump the blood with sufficient force. Palpitation, fluttering sensations at the heart, and fits of faintness are signs of this state.

There is a third common reason for the "warming system" getting out of order. That is the failing appetite. Food is the "fuel" which mends the fire. When the appetite fails the fuel supply is cut off, the heat goes down, colds and chill creep in, and in but too many cases bronchitis, pneumonia, and fatal complications ensue. In Chas. Forde's Bile Beans will be found a strengthening, blood-making, blood-purifying medicine. They strengthen the digestive organs, thus ensuring that all the "fuel" taken in the form of food, is used. They purify the blood, thus preventing it from carrying about waste and detrimental substances. They cure palpitation, fluttering sensations at the heart, and other signs of weakness of this important organ, thus ensuring vigorous heart action and circulation. Indeed, in all departments in which wintry weather tries the system, Bile Beans will be found to give strength. They may be obtained from any chemist for one and three half-pence or two and ninepence, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 and 120 London Wall, E.C., by sending prices. They should be found in every household during the winter months particularly.

MODERN COMPOSER: "I've got a new stage song that's bound to make a hit." Manager: "Any sense in it?" "None at all." "Any fun in it?" "Not a bit." "Any music in it?" "Not a note." "Hooray! It's bound to catch on."

A Saving Revenge.

KNOWIT: "My cook is a treasure." Wantoknow: "You're in better luck than most people, then." Knowit: "I wasn't till lately. You see, she had a row with the grocer, and to revenge herself she is very saving with the groceries. The bill is only half what it used to be."

Rather Mixed.

MR. YOUNGHUSBAND (reading from paper): "Married—Blanche de Smythe to Walter Wellington Jones. What old memories that name awakens!" Mrs. Y. (blushing): "I never imagined you knew of my engagement to Walter." Mr. Y. (chillingly): "I was alluding o Blanche."

A Good Thing, Too.

LITTLE HANS had a picture-book given him on his birthday. Suddenly he came running to his mother, and said: "Mamma, do animals know what they are called?" "No." Hans uttered a sigh of relief, and remarked: "It would have been so unpleasant for the donkey, wouldn't it?"

Cigars as Vegetables.

"I HAVE here," said the father, "a bill of yours, for £47, for cigars. When I agreed to honour all your bills for ordinary necessities——" "They are necessities," came the prompt reply. "Indeed, sir, and how do you make that out?" "Well, my doctor orders me a vegetable diet, and I take it in that form."

Father was Silent.

"GEORGE," said the fond parent, "you took my overcoat instead of your own, and I found the pockets full of cigarettes and matches." "I discovered my mistake, father," replied the son, "directly I got outside, for the pockets of the coat I had on contained chocolate creams and three pairs of ladies' gloves." No more was said!

A Tedious Task.

HE was apprenticed to the grocery trade. One day a customer went in for a bushel of split peas. The master of the shop called the boy and said: "Sydney, just fetch a bushel of split peas from the loft." Sydney was so long gone that his master went to see what he was about. Imagine his surprise when Sydney said, "Please, sir, I shall never be able to split a bushel of them." He had taken a pair of scissors, and was vainly endeavouring to cut some ordinary blue peas in half!

How Nice!

TOMMY: "This is Saturday, and mamma and papa are goin' to the theatre to-night. I'm awfully glad." Mabel: "Why?" "'Cause she can't wash me to-night, an' she'll get up so late to-morrow morning she'll have to let me go dirty, or miss church.'

Not Quite Alone.

THERE was a very small audience present, and it was rapidly dwindling away. On the stage the hero and heroine are holding a rendezvous. Hero to Heroine: "Are we alone?" Heroine (thinking of the audience): "Not yet. There are two fellows near the door who look as if they might be able to sit through another act."

Competition a Good Thing.

IN a country town in Ireland a new post-office was in process of erection, when a poor man came into town to post some letters. On learning the nature of the new building, "Faith," said he, "it's glad I am to hear that same, for not a shop of the kind was there in the town but one, and the thunderin' villains used to charge what they liked for them stamps! But now there'll be someone to compate with them."

Sound Advice.

AN amateur painter, who was repairing his house, told a friend that he had been struck by a bright notion. The ceiling of his library was very dirty, so he purposed to whitewash it and then paint upon it a picture representing Apollo and the nine Mus s. The friend, who had his own views as to the proficiency of the amateur, suggested, as an improvement, that the ceiling should be painted first and whitewashed afterwards.

He Wasn't Chained.

A LONDONER who lately crossed over to Cork asked his Jarvey as to the population and municipal government of that town. On being informed that it was an incorporated city, the chief officer of which was a Mayor, he asked: "And does the Mayor wear the insignia of office?" "Insignia, what's that?" asked the astonished Jarvey. "Why, a chain about his neck," explained the cockney. "Oh, bless you, no," responded the other, "he is perfectly harmless. They let him go about loose."

A Smart Reply.

LAST Christmas Day at a dinner party, an officer of the Dragoon Guards had been placed with his back to the fire. Having stood the heat for some time the officer was obliged to ask for a fire-screen. His host, a pompous old squire, who thought everything belonging to him was perfection, got exceedingly wroth at the fire being complained of, and irefully said: "A British soldier should always be able to stand fire." "Not at his back, sir," was the witty response.

An Act in Two Scenes.

"I HAVE a little surprise for you, Amy," said the enraptured young man half-an-hour after the wedding, in some embarrassment. "Excuse me for a moment." He went out of the room and returned with a stout old lady with a determined expression of countenance. "My dear," he said, "this is my mother. She—er—will live with us, you know." "So glad. And I have a little surprise for you, too, Harry." She left the room, and returned in a moment with five fair-haired little girls, apparently ranging in age from three to thirteen. "These are my little darlings, Harry," she whispered. "Lydia, Minerva, Penelope, Rachel and Mehitabel, kiss the gentleman. He is to be your new papa."

LOOK IN THE MIRROR!

ARE YOU ASHAMED OF YOUR FACE?

EVERYBODY admires women and girls with clear, healthy, spotless complexions. They are attracted by pink cheeks and soft, velvety, delicate skin. Nothing destroys happiness and beauty like FRECKLES, PIMPLES, BLACKHEADS, YELLOW or MUDDY SKIN, MOTH, WRINKLES, RED NOSE or FACE, TAN, ERUPTIONS, DISCOLOURATIONS or BLEMISHES of any nature. They make both men and women unsightly, and make them look old. All these afflictions are quickly and easily cured by the famous DR. ROSE'S FACE PERLES. This is the most wonderful beautifier that was ever made. It is positively harmless to all, and contains not a single atom of LEAD, BISMUTH, or ARSENIC, or any poisonous ingredients whatever.

These famous Perles completely and permanently remove every eruption, blotch, discolouration, and blemish on BOTH LADIES AND GENTLEMEN. They make the old look young. They beautify FACE, NECK, SHOULDERS AND ARMS. They impart the delicate tints of girlhood and youth to the complexion.

A woman cannot possibly look plain or unattractive if she uses the famous DR. ROSE'S FACE PERLES. She will be as fair as a lily, and wrinkles will not appear until she is far advanced in life. This may seem impossible to you, but it is the plain truth. The Perles are not a cosmetic, remember, but a food for the skin. They make ladies of 40 look to be less than 30. If from any cause you have reason to be ashamed of your face, you should commence taking these famous Perles without delay. They are bound to effect an improvement in your appearance. Thousands of men and women, with unhealthy, blotchy or muddy skins, are grateful for having taken DR. ROSE'S FACE PERLES

WHY NOT TRY THEM?—If you would like to test DR. ROSE'S FACE PERLES send three stamps for dainty booklet, "Beauty is Power," and FREE TRIAL BOX, or 2/6 postal order for a large-size box. All boxes sent in plain packages, post free. Address: The Rose Remedy Co. Dept K, St Albans, England.

IN CONFIDENCE.

Conducted by MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.—MADGE MORRIS.]

"Sunflower."—Your young lady means nothing in wearing a ring on the second finger of her left hand. It is a mere ornament, and not intended as a hint to you to place one on the third. I cannot advise you on the second question, which must depend on circumstances. However, if the matter is as you say, your fears are justified, and your action must depend on the extent to which you are fond of her.

You ask me, "Peggy Patti," if I advise you to go on the stage. You say you have a good home and a good situation, and yet are not content. Now I know nothing about you, whether you have a talent for acting or no; but of this I am sure, unless you have some influential friend in the theatrical world, who would give you work, and help you along, it would be more than foolish to give up your comfortable home for a mere speculation which would, in all probability, end in smoke.

"Flora" is receiving attentions from a young man in a boarding-house. He is something in the City, and has travelled a great deal. Should she encourage him?———You ask my advice in strict confidence about the young man. Don't think me unkind if I am quite candid about him, but I don't quite like your description. I may be wrong, but I seem to know that young man. He is a very regular frequenter of the boarding-house of the kind at which you are staying. He has generally travelled a lot, talks delightfully, knows how to pay a compliment, is free with his money when out with you, and is—something in the City. He may be thoroughly genuine, but I think the majority of young men of the cosmopolitan order are seldom matrimonially inclined, and carry on such flirtations with every pretty girl they meet. Further, just get your brother or somebody you know to make a few inquiries about his position in the City before you let him squeeze your little hand again, and get to know something about his family antecedents before you next turn those pleading grey eyes upwards to his in a glance of half affection, half doubt. I am sure you have pleading grey eyes. Cosmopolitan young men like them, and girls with them very often return the sentiment, often to their own danger.

"Tom" is engaged to the best girl in the world, and wants to know what he can give her for a small present; he has only been engaged three weeks, and is too bashful to ask her.———Why not give her a bottle of scent, or a fan, or a pair of nice gloves? It is difficult to advise you, really, there are such a host of things suitable. Try and find out what her tastes are, and you will soon know what to give her.

"Dolly" wants to know whether I consider tight-lacing injurious to the health and complexion.——— Most certainly I do, "Dollie," and not to the health and complexion only, for girls who lace tightly are too often bad-tempered in consequence. Surely there is no sight in the world more ugly than a stout woman with a wasp-like waist. I certainly do not recommend you to drink eau de Cologne in order to brighten your eyes at night. It only leads on to the habit of drinking, and that is an evil which every nice-minded girl would shun.

"Gerty" has been saying unpleasant things to the neighbours about Rose. The latter wants to know whether she should cut the former, or how she should act.———I should not cut her. Why not ask her to tea one day, and when you are together, hint that you hear somebody has been maligning you. Point out how utterly wrong the suggestion has been, and say you wonder how anyone can have been unkind enough to make such false statements. You in this way convey to your supposed traducer the fact that she has been wrong and unkind, without mentioning any names. The next time you meet, you can bow slightly, and suit your actions entirely according to the behaviour of the other.

"Lovesick Jack" says that a young lady calls at his office on business every morning, and that he has fallen madly in love with her; but she does not appear to notice him, though he has an idea she likes him. He wants to know how he can impress her?———What business does she come on? Is it anything that is in your province? If so, you can, perhaps, win her favour by doing her all sorts of little services. Try and manage to always be in attendance on her yourself, and, unless she resents your advances, she will not mind a young man being nice to her. This largely constitutes an acquaintance, and you are entitled to bow to her if you should meet. For the rest, you must, supposing her to be a young lady living with her people, try and get to know her socially. I have often suggested to correspondents how that is to be done. You must find out where she lives, whom she visits, how she spends her time, and manage to meet her somehow or another outside of business. If she really likes you, she will, perhaps, be a party to it.

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium, Nos. 31—36," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, February 10th, 1902.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 31. NUMBER PUZZLE.

What is the number which is made up of one-half, one-quarter, and one-seventh of itself, plus three?

No. 32. ACROSTIC.

The initials of equivalents of the following give the surname of a prominent politician:

A well-known town in France.
The capital town of an English county.
A Chinese town.
The capital town of a Scotch county.
A seaport of England.
One of the English counties.
An English river famous for its salmon.
An English town famous for another kind of fish.

No. 33. WORD DIAMOND.

A consonant, part of a very important verb, something necessary to sustain life, a personal pronoun, a consonant.

No. 34. ARITHMETICAL PUZZLE.

A man went into a shop and said to the owner, "If you will give me as much as I have in my pocket I will spend sixpence with you." The shopkeeper agreed to do this. The man then went into a second shop and said the same words with a similar result. He then entered a third shop and repeated the transaction, but after leaving this shop he had nothing left. How much had he to start with?

No. 35. BEHEADED WORDS.

1. Behead a part of the body and leave a number.
2. Behead the name of a college and leave a drink.
3. Behead to banter and leave a confederate.
4. Behead ajar and leave a writing instrument.
5. Behead in no degree and leave at any time.

The beheaded letters form the name of a famous poet.

No. 36. CHARADE.

I accompany the diver in treacherous depths,
I protect him from the fishes,
I am with the scorcher as he flies along
And bounds o'er hedges and ditches.
I am used in a thousand different ways,
But stay—I'm beginning to brag.
Still you'll find me in all sorts of places,
And in every schoolboy's bag.

Result of "Brain Gymnasium," Nos. 13 to 18.

The most correct list received was that of Mr. C. G. Martin, of 2A Edgington Road, Streatham, S.W. The prize of £1 1s. has therefore been dispatched to him.

RHEUMATISM CURED

BY A REMEDY THAT HAS ENABLED MANY TO ABANDON CRUTCH AND CANE.

Trial Package FREE,

On the theory that "seeing is believing," John A. Smith wants everyone to try his remedy for the cure of rheumatism at his expense. For that reason he proposes to distribute 50,000 free sample packages among all persons sending him their address. Mr. Smith has suffered all the agony and torture from Rheumatism, tried all the remedies known, and yet utterly failed to find relief.

At times he was so helpless that he had to take to morphine, and after considerable doctoring he gave up in despair. He began studying into the causes of rheumatism; after much experimenting he finally hit upon a combination of drugs which completely cured him. The result was so beneficial to his entire system that he called his new-found remedy "Gloria Tonic." Those of his friends and relatives and neighbours suffering from rheumatism were next cured, and Mr. Smith concluded to offer his remedy to the world. But he found the task a difficult one, as nearly everybody had tried a hundred or more remedies, and they couldn't be made to believe that there was such a thing as a cure for rheumatism. But an old gentleman from Seguin wrote him saying if Mr. Smith would send him a sample he would try it, but as he had suffered forty-one years and wasted a fortune with doctors and advertised remedies, he wouldn't buy anything more until he knew it was worth something. The sample was sent; he purchased more, and the result was astonishing. He was completely cured. This gave Mr. Smith a new idea, and ever since that time he has been sending out free sample packages to all who apply. The result is that he is now the happy possessor of thousands of testimonials from people throughout the world who have been both greatly benefited and entirely cured by "Gloria Tonic." Prominent physicians had to admit that "Gloria Tonic" is a positive success, among them Dr. Quintero, of the University of Venezuela, to whom it was recommended by the United States Consul. In thousands of other instances the result has been the same. It cured many cases which defied Hospitals, Drugs, Electricity, and Medical Skill.

JOHN A. SMITH.

"Gloria Tonic" cured Mrs. H. Bester, of Welton, near Daventry, who has suffered for years. Mr. L. Pinkey, 3 Well Lane, Bridlington, a martyr to Rheumatism for 27 years, has been entirely cured through its use. Mr. J. Holden, of 28 Angles Road, Streatham, S.W., is an enthusiast over "Gloria Tonic." A neighbour of Mr. Holden, Mr. J. Crampton, 24 Angles Road, Streatham, S.W., says: "I can recommend 'Gloria Tonic' to all who suffer with Rheumatism, as I am thankful to say that your remedy has cured me entirely."

The following people have also been entirely cured through the use of "Gloria Tonic" attested to by testimonials which they have sent me: Mrs. J. Brewer, 59 St. Ann's Rd., Barking, E.; Mr. T. Marsh, 190 Bury New Rd., Whitefield, Lancs.; Mr. J. Metcalf, Hill Gill Farm, Mallerstang, Kirkby Stephen; Mrs. West, The Club, Surbiton; Mr. G. Chennells, 11 Waterend, near Hemel Hempstead; Mrs. G. Hiron, 39 Stanley St., Queen's Rd., S.W.; Mr. E. Guest, Bissell St., Quinton, near Birmingham; Mrs. Sanderson, 22 West Park Rd., Newport, Mon.; Mr. L. Leyshon, 2 Gwindy Terrace, Pentrechwyth; Mrs. W. Smith, Appiehouse, Tronston, Sandwick, Stromness; Mr. J. Helmsley, Hadlow Down, near Uckfield; Mr. P. Haslem, 32 Tanners Terrace, Ramsbottom; Mr. G. Mackay, Embo Dornoch, Sutherlandshire; Mr. J. Little, South Marston, Stretton St. Margaret's, Swindon.

Can I offer you better proofs of the merits of my remedy? These are only a few of hundreds of testimonials of recent date which I now hold.

On receipt of a postal card or a letter from you, mentioning this paper, you will receive by return of post, FREE, a trial package of "Gloria Tonic" a booklet on Rheumatism, and other literature of great interest to sufferers. Address—

The House on the Moor.

By J. Le. Hornibrook.

"Hullo, Eastlake!" called out Lattimer, as he caught sight of me in the wedge at Paddington on Christmas Eve. "Where away?"

A man—an utter stranger—who happened to be brushing past at the moment, turned his head quickly and looked at me in a curious, arrested manner as my name fell on his ears. He hung for an instant irresolutely in the midst of a stride; and then, with another quick, interested glance at me, passed on and was swallowed up in the crowd.

"Who was that?" asked Lattimer, curiously, upon whom the incident had not been lost.

"Haven't the haziest idea," I answered, quite as much in the dark as to the stranger's identity as he was. "Never laid eyes on the man before, to my knowledge."

"Very strange," he ruminated. "He pricked up his ears the instant he heard your name. And there was something odd in his look, too. Depend upon it, there's more in this than meets the eye. Where are you off to?"

"Down Mavistock way. I'm booked for Christmas at Coombe-Leigh."

"The Barringtons?" he said, with a sly, quizzing look.

"Yes," I admitted, well aware that there was one particular member of the family in his mind at the time.

"Well, take care of yourself, old man. I shouldn't be surprised if that unknown friend of yours has his eye upon you, for some reason or other. By the way——"

He stopped short, puckered his brows and stroked his chin in a meditative manner, as if he were chasing some idea through his brain, which, however, managed to elude him.

"What is it?" I asked.

"Oh, it doesn't matter. There was something I wanted to tell you, but it's gone clean out of my head for the moment."

As the empty train for the West backed down to us just then, there was a general scramble for seats, and in the rush I got separated from Lattimer. I was fortunate enough to secure a corner of a smoking carriage; and having stowed away my belongings I leant out of the doorway, looking around for him. I saw him standing at some distance, the same puzzled expression on his face, as if he were still striving to recall what he wanted to say to me. Presently he looked up and caught my eye. With a parting wave of the hand he turned from the spot, and sauntered away.

The train was late in starting, of course, for there were truck-loads of Christmas hampers and parcels of all sorts consigned to the West Country, which took a good deal of handling. Besides, the carriages were packed, and not a few belated passengers were feverishly hunting for seats up to the last moment.

When the guard's whistle sent us off, and the train curved slowly out of the station, I stuck my head out of the carriage window and glanced back along the half-deserted platform. As I did so, I was amazed to see Lattimer dash suddenly into view again, making frantic signals of some kind to me as he raced along with the moving train. Seeing that he could not diminish the distance between us, he pulled up, put his hand to his mouth, and yelled out something; but unfortunately, the shriek of a whistle just then completely drowned his warning shout.

Between one thing and another, I had plenty to occupy my mind during the first hour or so of my journey. I sat with my face to the window, gazing out over the cold, bleak, wintry landscape, and meditating upon the incidents which had occurred previous to my departure. I wondered what Lattimer wanted to convey to me so urgently at the last moment, and if it had anything to do with the appearance of that stranger, whom he seemed to regard with latent suspicion. As I could make nothing out of it, I put the whole thing away from me, and turned to the budget of Christmas numbers which I had brought with me. But still, I could not entirely drag my thoughts back from dwelling on those singular circumstances. A vague consciousness that they foreshadowed some evil in store for me floated hazily through my mind.

At Bristol, where we had a pretty long wait, I made a tour of inspection along the whole length of the train, on the off-chance that the stranger I had seen at Paddington might have come down in it. It was dusk by this time, and though the glow of light in the carriages aided my search, I was unable to pick out anyone in the least resembling him. Even among those who were standing on the platform, or hurrying to and fro from the refreshment rooms, I failed to distinguish him.

He put his hand to his mouth and yelled out something.

This being so, I returned to my compartment with the reassuring conviction that I was not shadowed at any rate.

I had to change at Exeter, and on alighting there found that the weather was very different from what it had been in London. It was sharp and piercing enough when I left town; but down here in the West Country, I could see by the watery rim round the gas-lamps at the further end of the platforms, and the marks of wet footprints all over the place, that it was raw, damp, and foggy. There was, in fact, every prospect of a "green" Christmas.

This, however, signified little, since it would have required something more approaching a second deluge to damp the spirit of conviviality at Coombe-Leigh. Christmas there was a thing to remember. None of your modern, half-hearted displays for the sake of the children principally; but a real, genuine, old-English Christmas, with plenty of holly and mistletoe, blazing Yule logs, and beaming faces on every side. I looked forward to meeting the genial and hospitable Sir Brian; big, hearty Jack Barrington, his son and heir; above all, and beyond all, the roguish and bewitching Eva, the youngest of the baronet's three charming daughters.

With such thoughts as these I beguiled the time until the slow train to Mavistock put me down at that station. On the platform I caught sight of the ruddy face and belted figure of Manton, Sir Brian's groom, who had been sent to meet me with the dog-cart.

"You're welcome, sir!" he said, touching his hat, as he took the bag from my hand.

"Thank you, Manton. The train's rather behind-time, I fear."

"It always is, sir, on Christmas Eve. But I've got Master John's mare in the trap, and she'll take us back within the twenty minutes."

It was a good long drive to the baronet's seat, as I knew from experience, but the mare seemed bent upon justifying Manton's opinion of her speed. When we got out on to the lonely country roads, and he let her have her head, she took us along at a spanking pace, the wheels humming like a spinning top.

Fast as we went, however, there were others behind us who went just as fast. Ever since we had cleared the little town, the lights of another trap followed steadily in our wake, keeping close at our heels up hill and down dale. If we swung round a corner, and the bend of the road shut off those lights for a few seconds, they sprang into view again the next moment, like a pair of glaring, watchful eyes, determined to keep us in sight. Looking back through the misty gloom, I could dimly make out the blurred outline of two dark, silent figures seated in the second vehicle.

"Those people behind us, whoever they are, seem bent upon not losing sight of us," I remarked to the groom.

Manton sent a searching look back into the darkness, and appeared puzzled.

"They don't belong to these parts, sir, wherever they come from," he said, evidently rather mystified. "I noticed the trap at the station, and it's a strange one. They've got a smart-looking roan between the shafts; but we'll shake them off presently, for all that."

Just in front of us, the road was lined with trees on either side; and the branches, meeting overhead, formed an inky tunnel through which we had to pass. Manton had to ease the mare here, and proceed with caution, keeping a sharp lookout ahead lest we should meet with any obstruction.

We had got half-way through when I caught the sharp clap, clap of hoofs and whir of wheels close behind us. Glancing round, I found that the strangers had caught up to us, and were evidently about to pass. The light from their lamps showed me that the driver was a tall, burly, sullen-looking individual; but his companion was so muffled up that I could distinguish little of his face or figure.

They drew up close beside us—dangerously close, it seemed to me—while the tall man screwed his head round, and scanned me narrowly behind Manton's back, who was sitting between us. The next second I saw him deliberately pull the roan's head round in our direction; and then came a jarring crash as he dexterously caught the hub of our near wheel. The impact was so sudden and forcible that it very nearly dashed us into the trees at the side; as it was, the mare plunged wildly, and the groom had all he could do to hold her in.

The wanton rascality of the thing made my blood boil; and I half rose from my seat, an angry protest upon my lips. But the stranger, with the coolest insolence, turned the tables by putting the blame upon us.

"Confound you!" he roared to Manton. "What do you mean by pulling across me in that way?"

He leant forward as he spoke, and brought his whip down with a vicious cut across the mare's back. The maddened creature leapt into the air; and then, as the scoundrel in the other trap raised a shout, she jerked her head down with a frightened snort, closed her teeth upon the bit, and away she went at a blind, furious, reckless gallop, that threatened us with destruction every instant.

"Hold on, sir! Hold on tight!" screamed Manton, his face crimson with passion, as he tugged and strained at the reins. "If once—— Oh!"

There was a snap, and the near rein parted in his hands. He made a wild lurch forward to grab the broken end as it disappeared over the dash-board, lost his balance, tumbled out on the mare's back, and was pitched off on to the muddy road.

After that, I have a horrified recollection of clinging desperately to the bumping, swaying trap, expecting that every moment would be my last. How long that mad rush continued I cannot say; but, suddenly, there was a swerve—a bump—a crash; and I was shot into the air like a stone from a sling. I reached the ground with a sickening thud, that seemed to jolt every tooth out of my head. And then came darkness—a blank.

* * * * *

In that interval of unconsciousness I must have been picked up and transported to a distance; for when I opened my eyes again I found myself in new and totally strange surroundings. Through the swimming mist which blurred my vision, I could dimly distinguish a round ball of white light within a few yards of me; and that was practically all at first.

As my brain cleared, however, I saw that this ball of light represented a lamp, with an opalescent globe, placed at some little distance from me. My gaze travelled slowly round, and I became aware that I was lying on a couch in a large, square-shaped room; the ceiling being so low that, to my distorted fancy, it seemed to be descending slowly to crush me; and I experienced that horrible, overpowering sensation, such as is produced by a nightmare, in looking up at it.

To escape this disagreeable illusion, I turned my head round towards the lamp again. It stood on a circular table, placed in the very centre of the floor, and which looked like a small island set in the expanse of faded green carpet. Whatever other furniture the room could boast of was moved back against the wall, where I could distinguish little of it.

There was something more than all this, however. Lying open on the floor within a few paces of me, the contents exposed to view, was my portmanteau, which, judging by the way my linen was tossed about, had evidently been thoroughly overhauled. I was so weak that I could not drag myself to it, even if I wanted to. Though, by moving my limbs, I had ascertained that no bones were broken—luckily, I had come down upon soft, sodden ground—I was terribly bruised and shaken by that headlong flight through the air.

When I had taken in my surroundings, I began to consider—vaguely enough at first—where I was, and for what purpose I had been brought here. But, presently, as my mind took a firmer grip of the situation, and every detail of this disastrous journey came vividly back to me, a vague, nameless dread stole upon me. The strangeness of the place, the unknown dangers which threatened me; above all, the ghostly silence that reigned around, filled me with the most ominous forebodings.

I was striving to drag myself from the couch, with some feverish notion of endeavouring to make my escape while I was yet alone, when a door at the other end of the room opened, and two men made their appearance. In the foremost I recognised the tall ruffian who had been directly responsible for the disaster to our dog-cart; the other was the selfsame stranger whom I had last seen on the crowded platform at Paddington!

Neither of the two displayed any immediate concern about me. They did not even bestow a glance in my direction. Standing over near the door, they whispered together for a few moments, but in so low a tone that I was unable to catch even the drift of their conversation. With my senses keenly, almost painfully, on the alert, I lay there and watched them.

Presently the tall man—from what I heard afterwards I have reason to suppose his name was Bradley—crossed the room, and looked down at me with the calm and deliberate observation of one who was summing up the injuries sustained by a horse or a hound. Now that they had me in their power, as helpless, for the moment, as if I was bound hand and foot, the brazen ruffianism which he had exhibited on the road was laid aside, and he appeared disposed to treat me with some show of consideration. But still, as my eye rested upon his great, hulking figure, his huge, red hands, and bare, sinewy wrists, I felt utterly weighed down and overpowered. There was something about the man which told me that, if he were put to it, he would have strangled me as I lay there, without any great compunction.

"Not so much damage, after all, I see," was his comment, when he had run his eye over me. "No bones broken, eh?"

"No," I admitted.

He turned away with a sort of satisfied grunt, and my gaze followed him as he went towards a small side-board, from which he came back with a decanter of brandy and a glass in his hands. He poured a medium quantity of the spirit into the glass, and held it out to me. I hesitated, looking at him doubtfully, for I was not at all sure that the liquor was not drugged.

"Pshaw, man!" he said, evidently divining my suspicions, and tossed it off himself.

Satisfied with the test, I was glad to avail myself of the stimulant, and it seemed to put new life into me. Taking the glass from me again, Bradley retired into the background, leaving me an interrupted view of the second man, to whom I now devoted my whole attention.

He was seated at the table, engaged at the moment in jotting down something with a fountain pen, the tails of his long, loose overcoat trailing on the ground. As he sat there in the strong light of the lamp, his sharp, clean-cut profile turned towards me, I studied him narrowly. It required no prolonged examination, however, to convince me that he was a man of a very different stamp to his big, blustering colleague; and, moreover, far more to be feared. I had not a doubt that he was the instigator of this rascally business, and the prime mover in it.

"There are a few questions which we shall have to

"Not so much damage, after all, I see," was his comment.

put to you, Mr. Eastlake," he said, without suspending his work, and speaking in a hard, metallic voice, that had something grating in it. "Perhaps you will be good enough to answer them."

"That depends," I returned.

The pen stopped; and his eyes came round in my direction with a look which it was not at all pleasant to behold.

"It might be well, before we proceed further, that you should realise your precise position at the moment," he remarked, coldly. "Might I ask if you have any idea as to where you are?"

"I have not," I replied.

"Then I will venture to enlighten you. This house stands out on the moors, away from every other habitation, and even from the public roads. There is not, I may safely say, a building of any sort within a mile of it. Across that belt of moorland your voice would have to travel in order to reach a human ear, if you impose upon us the necessity of enforcing your compliance. And as my friend here will tell you," he added, indicating the tall, ominous figure in the background, "there are deep and ugly pits on these same moors, which have a knack of keeping any secret intrusted to them."

He paused; and as I pictured this lonely house, set in a desolate expanse of moor, I confess that I shuddered. To be held a prisoner here, in the custody of two such men, robbed me of the last lingering hope of escape or rescue, and I realised how utterly and completely I was at their mercy.

"Now that I have made the situation plain to you," proceeded the stranger, in the same hard, matter-of-fact tone, "you will probably recognise the futility of any opposition on your part. The questions which I shall put to you need not alarm you, however; they are merely intended to clear the way. To begin with, you are, I understand, an official of the Home Office?"

"I am."

"You are acquainted with the Minister who is at the head of that Department, I suppose?"

"I am."

"Are you brought into personal contact with him?"

"Daily."

"In what capacity?"

"As his private secretary."

I caught a gleam of triumph on the keen face before me.

"Then, Mr. Eastlake," he declared, "you are the very man we want."

The announcement fell on me like a blow; and my heart sank under it. It was very evident that these men had some desperate move in view, in which I was to play an important part, whether I liked it or not. It grew on me that I was in the hands of a couple of dangerous criminals, and that my life depended upon implicit compliance with their demands.

"Might I ask," I said, wishing to know the worst at once, "what it is you require of me?"

"The matter is this," replied the other, leaning forward, and tapping his long fore-finger with the fountain-pen. "There is at the present moment a man confined in Dartmoor Convict Prison, undergoing a life sentence. It is vitally essential that I should obtain access to him; and not only so, but that he should regain his liberty, even if he is eventually captured again. There are interests at stake, the importance of which I cannot exaggerate, and which render his presence absolutely imperative, if only for one hour. More than this I need not say. I may tell you, however, that I have a plan for getting him out; and to-morrow being Christmas Day, will be the most suitable one for my purpose. Most of the warders will have gone out on leave; so that, in case of pursuit, the chances will be more in our favour. Besides, at such a time, discipline is likely to be a trifle lax.

"The first and main difficulty is to gain admittance to the prison. There are, as you may readily suppose, certain reasons which stand in the way of my obtaining an order from the Home Office. Apart from that, it is necessary that it should be of such a stringent nature as to override all formalities and technical objections. It is in this respect that I require your assistance."

"In what way?" I asked.

"I have here," he said, turning to the table, "some of your official paper, with which I took the precaution of providing myself. You are, I have no doubt, perfectly well acquainted with the signature of the Home Secretary; probably you may happen to have a specimen of it by you at the moment. You will write an order such as I require, and sign it with his name; taking care to word it so that no quibble of any kind can be raised. You will also give me a covering letter from yourself, as his private secretary, impressing upon the officials the importance of this order, and desiring them to facilitate my interview with the prisoner. That, briefly, is what I must call upon you to do."

"And if I refuse?" I said.

"If you refuse," he returned, in a perfectly even and level tone, "I can only assure you that you will find a resting-place at the bottom of one of those deep pits out there."

He was silent; and, though, as yet, my mind failed to take in the full significance of this daring scheme, I was keenly alive to the extreme and pressing danger of my position. For the present my sole desire was to gain time, so that I might think the whole matter over quietly, and if possible discover some loophole for escape.

"Even if I were willing to comply with your demands," I said, "you can see for yourself that I am not in a fit condition to put pen to paper just now. The very shakiness of my handwriting would betray you to the officials."

"That is only reasonable," he replied. "It will be time enough in the morning; and, I daresay, a night's rest on that couch will help to steady your nerves. Only," he added, impressively, taking my consent for granted, "let me urge upon you the necessity of exercising the utmost care when you sit down to write that order. There must be no flaw, either in the document itself, or in the signature. If anything should go wrong, and I am not back in this house to-morrow evening, my friend here will deal with you in the manner I have already pointed out."

He rose as he spoke, gathered up his papers, and withdrew from the room. Bradley followed him, locking the door as he passed through, and I was left to my own uncomfortable and very disquieting reflections.

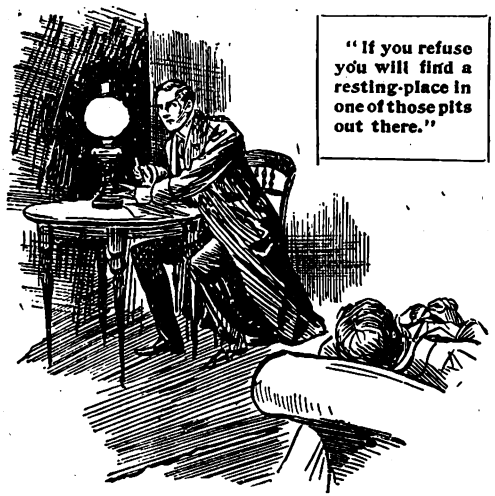
* * * * *

In about an hour's time, Bradley invaded my seclusion again, bringing something in the shape of a rough and ready supper on a tray. Though I felt equal to moving about a little now, I begged him to wheel the table over to the couch, for I thought it just as well he should rest under the impression that I was still too weak to rise.

When he had gone, and I was free from observation, I sat up and turned my attention to the supper tray. The fare, homely as it was, proved none the less acceptable. I made a good hearty meal, considering all things; and then, feeling decidedly better, proceeded to examine the room with stealthy, cat-like tread.

The result of my inspection threw me back upon my difficulties again. Both the windows were heavily barred on the outside, and all hope of escape by the door was out of the question. I returned to the couch, satisfied that there was nothing for it but to wait the issue of events.

Shortly after eleven o'clock, Bradley made his appearance for the last time that night. He brought in a couple of coarse rugs under his arm, which he flung down on me as if I were nothing more than a log. Then he turned and picked up the tray.



"If you refuse you will find a resting-place in one of those pits out there."

"You will leave me the lamp, I suppose?" I ventured to ask.

"Um—yes," he said, though he looked at it doubtfully for a moment or two. As he retired, I heard him lock the door and take away the key. A little later his heavy step sounded overhead; and as I had seen the other man pass through the hall on his way upstairs when Bradley last entered the room, I felt assured that I was now the sole occupant of the ground floor.

Away we went, across the bleak, brown moor in this race of life and death.

Left alone for the night, I turned the lamp down, tucked the rugs round me, and set myself to look the situation straight in the face. It was unquestionably an ugly and embarrassing one. On the one hand, I was asked to forge an official order, and for the purpose of setting free a criminal, who, for all I knew, might make use of his liberty to commit some murderous outrage, by way of revenge or otherwise. On the other, if I stood out, there was the certainty of my being dragged from this house in the early morning—gagged and bound, most likely—and flung to the bottom of one of those deep, slimy Dartmoor pits, which have been the scene of many a dark and secret tragedy. Those were the two alternatives which confronted me; and I saw no middle course, no possible way of escape.

I cannot say that I came to any definite decision, then and there; I still grappled with the problem, hoping that I might yet hit upon some means of frustrating the designs of these men, without drawing their vengeance down upon me. But at the back of my mind there was a fixed and unalterable resolve that no pressure they could bring to bear would induce me to comply with their demands. At the last moment, even when death stared me in the face, something might crop up to turn the tide in my favour.

It was not until the night was far advanced, and I had spent long and harassing hours in racking my brains without avail, that hope began to slip gradually away from me, like a rope from a drowning man.

Unable to bear up any longer, I sank into the depths of gloomy despondency. The dead, boding silence; the consciousness that I was absolutely cut off from the outer world; above all, the knowledge of what awaited me in the morning, sent my heart down as if weighted with lead. At last, worn out by that protracted and anxious vigil, I fell into a broken, fitful slumber.

When I awoke, and all the dark forebodings which had haunted me throughout the night came crowding back, the lamp was still burning dimly. My watch showed me that it wanted but a few minutes to five o'clock. I reckoned that those men upstairs would not be stirring for another hour or two, so that a brief respite remained to me. The time was short, yet—— Great Heavens! I had it!

As I lay there on the couch, staring at the lamp with dismal concentration, a thought came to me, which was almost like the flash of an inspiration. In an instant, palpitating with feverish eagerness, I was on my feet, for there was not a moment to lose. Fumbling for my matches, I lit a candle which I found on the mantel piece, and then turned to the lamp again. For in the lamp lay my one and only chance of escape!

With a puff, I extinguished the flame, removed the globe and chimney, and proceeded to screw off the top. Thank Heaven! There was a small quantity of oil still left. Taking hold of the shank, I tiptoed softly across the room, and saturated the door with paraffin, especially in the neighbourhood of the lock. Then I struck another match.

Pop! It was the sudden burst of flame as the oil caught fire. I stood back, watching, with breathless, concentrated intentness, those fiery tongues as they licked their way up the wood, like so many willing agents, eager to effect my deliverance. I knew it was a conflict between them and time, and was kept in the throes of agitated suspense.

For a few anxious moments I doubted whether the fire would take hold, but I soon saw from the charred appearance of the wood that it had got its grip. Still, it made slow progress at first; and I was on thorns lest the smoke or smell of burning paraffin should arouse the men upstairs. Every second I expected to be startled by a thump and rush overhead, and hear Bradley thundering down to intercept my escape.

It seemed to me hours before the fire had eaten away the wood round the lock; but at last, as I drove my foot against it, the socket fell out, and the blazing door yawned open of its own accord. Another moment and I was in the hall; clawing, with trembling fingers, at the bolts and chain of the front door.

Oh, Heavens! what a thrill went through me when this last obstacle was overcome, and the raw, cold Dartmoor air, free and invigorating, struck upon my bare brow! Without an instant's delay I pattered down the neglected strip of garden, slipped through the little wicket at the end, and sped away across the moors.

It was still dark, though there was a cold, greyish glimmer in the sky, which enabled me to steer clear of obstacles in my path, and maintain my headlong flight. I had only got to a short distance, however, when a shout—or rather a regular bellow of rage—came across to me from the house. My head went round over my shoulder as I ran; and there, standing at the door in his shirt-sleeves, was Bradley, menacing me with his huge, extended fist. For a second, the face of the other man showed up behind him, but he darted back instantly into the house; while Bradley, half-dressed as he was, set off after me like some raging beast that had its quarry in view.

Away we went, across the bleak, brown moor, in this race of life and death. From the first I recognised, with a sinking heart, that the chances were dead against me. Weakened by all I had passed through, I was no match in point of speed for my vigorous pursuer. Soon—all too soon—I heard his hard, wicked pants in the darkness behind me; and could tell even without turning my head, that he was gaining on me at every stride. Bracing myself for one last, desperate effort, I struggled on blindly, recklessly, dreading to feel the ruffian's detaining clutch on my shoulder at any moment. And then—Oh, horror!—just as I thought there was still some feeble chance of shaking him off, a dark figure seemed to rise out of the ground straight in front, and bore swiftly down upon me. With a choking cry I gave in; my leaden arms dropped to my sides, and I stopped short on the spot.

But, instead of making for me, the man, whoever he was, went by like a flash. A moment or two later I heard the thud of a blow in the rear, a savage oath, and a snarl like that of a fierce brute brought to bay. The next second they were at it, tooth and nail, those two men; while I, weak and spent, flopped down on the damp soil, and sat there gasping for breath.

The fight which was going on in the dimness near me was fierce enough while it continued, as the state of the ground amply testified when I came to examine it afterwards. But it did not last long. Looking round, I saw that one of the men was already down, and from the patch of white shirt I knew that it was Bradley. The stranger, digging his knees into the ruffian's chest, and gripping him by the throat with one hand, raised the other to his lips and sent forth a shrill whistle.

In answer to the signal, two or three men came running across the moor from different directions, and between them they soon had Bradley securely bound. The conqueror then rose up, and came over to the spot where I sat. Looking up at him as he approached, something in his tall, athletic figure struck me as familiar, and the next second I had recognised him.

"Barrington!" I exclaimed, joyfully; for it was none other than my big friend Jack himself.

"So we've got you at last, old fellow!" he cried. "We've been out on the moors all night hunting for you. Come, let me give you a hand up. Now, what the dickens does all this mean?"

"It's too long a story to tell you just now," I said. "But how did you get on my track?"

"Manton staggered home last night, a pretty sight! He was bleeding, coated with mud from head to foot, and seemed to be half-dazed. With some difficulty we got out of him a confused account of what had happened. We set off for the scene, a lot of us, found that the mare had dashed into a hedge, splintered one of her forelegs, and smashed the trap to atoms. You, my dear fellow, must have been shot out into the adjoining field, but we could find no trace of you. We organised a search party on the spot, and very luckily came in this direction towards morning. Hullo! what's that?"

"What?" I asked, looking round.

"That blaze over yonder."

"It's the house!" I cried. "The house where I was a prisoner! They shut me up in one of the lower rooms, and to get out I had to burn down the door. The fire has evidently spread."

"I'll have a look," said Barrington, quickly. "You wait here till I get back."

Calling to one of the men who were guarding Bradley, they started off together at a run, making straight across towards the burning building. They soon returned, however, to say that the house was doomed. Nor could they discover a soul about the place. The second man had evidently slipped away; probably having pressed into service the smart roan which Bradley had driven on the previous evening.

As there was nothing further to detain us, Barrington gave directions regarding the prisoner; and then, slipping his arm through mine, led me away. Somewhere about eight o'clock on that Christmas morning we approached Coombe-Leigh; and there, on the doorstep, stood Eva herself, very much relieved, apparently, to see me turn up at last, and showing evident traces of an anxious and sleepless night. I fear that I am open to the charge of having traded on her sympathy; for whereas the little rogue had hitherto backed out of naming the day, I found her more amenable to my intreaties on the present occasion, and this important date was definitely fixed before my visit came to an end.

It was not until I had returned to town that I learnt what Lattimer wished to convey to me as the train was steaming off. It seems he had heard, in a roundabout way, that some stranger had been making inquiries regarding me, especially with a view to ascertaining my probable movements about Christmas time. He remembered this just as he was leaving the station, and rushed back to try and put me on my guard; being convinced that the man we noticed on the platform was the very individual in question.

If only his memory had been a little more retentive!

The Little Green Badge.

To any man who chances to be enslaved by the wiles of a coquette, I would offer the following advice:

Never permit her to guess that you are jealous, and, above all, do not tax her with fickleness.

Perhaps Harry Mallory had never received this sage warning, or else disregarded it, for he made the stupendous mistake of upbraiding his fiancée for heartlessness.

Standing before her with stern brows he said, dictatorially:

"Your manner indicates that you care no more for me than for a dozen other men. Gad! You distribute your favours most generously."

The girl looked up with a saucy flash of her sea-blue eyes.

"There is safety in numbers," she said lightly.

"Both safety and peril," he answered.

"Do sit down," she urged. "You look most uncomfortable standing in that rigid attitude." She was lounging on a divan among a nest of gorgeous cushions.

"Doris," the man said sternly, "trifle no longer. If you wish to break with me, let it be done."

The commanding tone would have roused the girl's anger had not the note of pain in his voice touched her woman's heart.

"What a silly boy!" she laughed, leaning forward and catching at one of his hands. "Tell me this, wise dictator, if I do not prefer you to all other men why am I betrothed to you?"

"You only know," he said bitterly. "I cannot understand it."

"I wouldn't be, had I known you possessed a jealous nature," she said, relinquishing his captive hand, and sinking back among the cushions.

"I am not jealous," he protested.

"Oh! What then?"

"I simply desire to understand your position towards me, which is becoming somewhat uncertain."

The girl clasped her hands behind her head and leaning back farther still, smiled broadly up in his face.

Harry trembled with impotent rage and love.

"You are absolutely heartless!" he cried.

"Then it is you who have deceived me," she answered sweetly, "for you said your heart was mine."

"But your own—" he stammered, feeling worsted in the skirmish, "I meant——"

"Oh, that was given into your keeping long ago!" cheerfully.

Harry capitulated. He sank down on the rug at her feet and buried his dark head in her billowy gown.

"Ha, ha! you surrender," she laughed, and stroked his hair. "Listen, dear," seriously. "You must have confidence in me or we shall be most unhappy. Now I have no desire to wound you, yet it seems I do so unwittingly. If you could only convey to me in some way that my actions were displeasing to you I might immediately cease whatever I chanced to be engaged in at the time. For instance, if I were dancing with Dan Clement, whose step suits mine so perfectly, and I caught your signal, I would immediately desert him. If I were playing an accompaniment for the new tenor, who sings so divinely, I would leave the piano, or, if I chanced to be singing myself, I would instantly close my mouth like a bivalve."

"Don't be absurd," Harry said, in a smothered voice.

"But I really wish to please you. I have no interest in other men, yet neither do I feel an aversion towards them since my betrothal to you. See here!" with a sudden idea.

Taking from the paraphernalia depending from her girdle a tiny knife, she unlaced a narrow green ribbon from its network on one of the cushions, and severed a small portion. This she tied in a bow, and raised her lover's face that he might view it. "Now you take this little badge which shall be a sign of jealousy, and whenever I am making you unhappy by my behaviour, attach it to your coat. This will admonish me to relinquish whatever amusement I may be engaged in at the time."

"What nonsense is this?" Harry inquired.

"I am quite serious. At any time that you display this little badge I promise to at once desist from my diversion of the moment."

"But I am never jealous," Harry insisted, flushing.

"Then you need never use it. But take it—put it in your waistcoat pocket, and if I ever should chance to make you jealous, pin it on your coat, and I will see it and end your discomfiture immediately. I will bend this little pin and catch it so it will be ready to hook on. Now put it in your pocket, and let us go on to the Mostyns'. They will think we are spooning on the way."

Two hours later Harry was again disturbed by observing his fiancée seated in a cosy corner with Jack Arden, a lady-killer, and apparently drinking in with delight all his dulcet flatteries. Jack ground his teeth and soliloquised.

"How can she permit him to gaze into her eyes like that? What can she find to laugh at in his gabble?

"Why does she clasp her hands round her knees in that coquettish manner? The cad is looking down at her slippers. I believe she dropped her handkerchief purposely. The impudence of him to inhale the odour of it as he picks it up!

"Great Heavens! Now he is holding her hand under pretence of palmistry. This is too much. Gad, I can't stand that! Why is she glancing at me? I thought she had forgotten my existence. Ha! She is looking for the little green badge. No wonder she thought it might be forthcoming. But no, missy, I am not jealous. You are making a fool of yourself—that's all.

"I'll walk off to the other room and watch the billiards. Perhaps that will bring her to her senses.

"I wonder what they are doing now? I may as well go leisurely back and glance that way.

"Jove! That looks well for an engaged girl—heads almost touching! They never missed me. What's he doing—mooning over her hand yet? Perhaps he is holding both by this time. Gad! if he isn't pretending to compare them! Every one has strayed away and left them quite alone. I've a great mind to take him by the nape of the neck and drop him over the bannister. I could easily do it—I'm three times his size. How the light glints on her yellow hair from the lamp over their heads!

"Ah! he has noticed it and is flattering her about it. What? Is the fellow going to touch it? No, she has drawn her head back out of his reach. I should hope so! She is looking for the badge again. I trust she is satisfied by this time that she can't make me jealous. If that fellow hasn't the nerve of a Napoleon. I believe he is trying to hypnotise her, else why does he lean forward in that engrossing manner, gazing into her eyes? Gad! It's time that tom-foolery came to an end. Where's that little green fol-de-rol? Anything to cook your goose, Jack Arden! Ha! she sees it—she has left him—but she isn't coming this way. I'll take it off. Now Dan Clement has secured her for a waltz. That will last as long as the music holds out. Dan looks idiotically enraptured. I'll soon stop his fun.

"Ahem! I thought so. She has excused herself. But she is no sooner out of the clutches of one than another man monopolises her. That insufferable tenor is dragging her to the piano that he may warble love-songs to her. When he gets fairly under way I'll cut him off short. Ha, ha! There's some amusement in wearing this little green bow after all. Next! What now? She's coming towards me."

"I would like to go now, Harry, if you don't mind."

"Certainly," he replied, in fiendish glee. "I am quite ready."

When they were in the carriage she spoke again.

"So you found use for the little green badge, after all?"

"Yes, I rather amused myself with it."

"You have a very queer expression on your face when you are amused! I have discovered to-night that you object to my conversing, dancing, or accompanying a singer on the piano. I should say that as your wife I should have rather a dull time. Harry, I have decided that I cannot marry a jealous man."

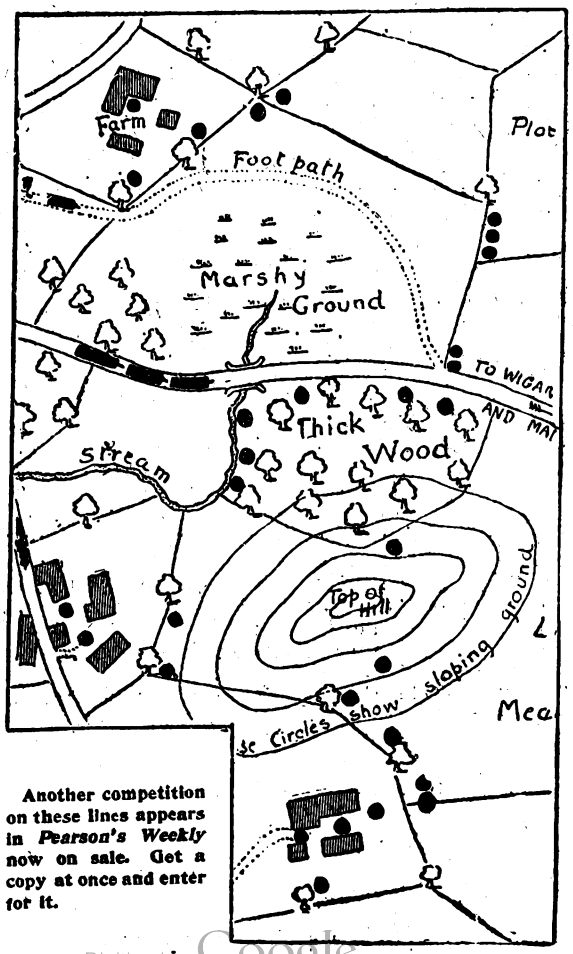
So Doris married a man who wasn't jealous, and now she has discovered, too late, that an unjealous lover often makes an indifferent husband. Landis Ayr.

Result of First "Pearson's Weekly" Sharpshooters' Competition.

The first prize of £10 has been awarded to Mr. L. Jekyll Duff, 1 Colville Square, Bayswater, W., who placed his thirty men in the best positions. The Columbia Graphophone has been awarded to Major R. Beatty, The County Club, Bray, Co. Wicklow, Ireland, and £1 each has been sent to the following: Mr. W. B. Scandrett, 2 Temple Street, Llandrindod Wells; Mr. J. White, 10 Gledhow Avenue, Roundhay, Leeds; Mr. P. F. Brian, 49 Old Clare Street, Limerick, Ireland; Mr. F. Fisk, 88 Folds Road, Bolton, Lancashire; Mr. H. Osborne, Dulce Domum, Clive Avenue, Hastings.

The above awards have been made in accordance with the key map published below, and prepared by Major Arthur Griffiths, whose reasons for placing the men (represented by black spots) are given here:

The problem "bars" the top of the hill, but the lower slopes should be held by riflemen under cover. The enemy has got so far along the Wigan-Manchester road that it is essential he should be met by a sharp fire directly his column crosses the stream on the road. He would believe then that the front was held in force, and seek to deploy to right and left across the open. His left is complicated by the march; so he would seek rather to open out on the right, and this necessitates the occupation of the villages and the ground on that side.



Another competition on these lines appears in Pearson's Weekly now on sale. Get a copy at once and enter for it.

PEPITA.

THERE were two letters awaiting Harrison when he came home that evening; one an official-looking affair in a long envelope with a type-written address, and the other in a blue-tinted covering with a dainty superscription.

He had had many letters before that looked just as these did, and smiled as a man will when he receives one from his sweetheart and his best friend at the same time.

He opened his friend's letter first and read it standing, holding the blue one between his fingers meanwhile. The letter he was reading was long, and he stopped once or twice and looked at the blue envelope and then went on again.

The type-written epistle was from Burnham, who had been his great chum at college, and who was now putting his collegiate training into practice in building a dam at a little town called Santilla, in Mexico. The two friends had corresponded at regular intervals ever since leaving college, and in this last letter Burnham was trying to induce Harrison to come out to Mexico and join him.

Harrison smiled as he read the last sheet, and laid the letter down without returning it to its envelope, then opened the missive from his fiancee to find that she no longer considered herself as such. The letter was nothing if not short and to the point.

> "You have grossly deceived me, and you may consider our engagement—in fact, our acquaintanceship—at an end. Do not be so presumptuous as to try and see me; I shall not be at home to you at any time."

The "you" in the last clause was underscored, and the note simply signed with an initial.

Harrison was dumfounded, and stood for a moment holding the blue paper loosely between his fingers.

He realised in a swift retrospect of his past life that it was about as murky as that of most men of his class, although since his engagement he had given up that sort of thing. Still, he could think of no special act of his that could possibly have come to her notice and prejudice her against him, and the letter he had just received angered him.

Moreover, he resented her forbidding him to call and explain matters. He reflected, as he walked up and down the room with his hands in his pockets and his forehead wrinkled perplexedly, that she flattered herself when she thought he would attempt to see her after a dismissal of this kind.

The more he thought of it the greater was his desire to shake off the whole business, to go away somewhere, and his eyes happening on the other letter lying beside the long yellow envelope, the invitation contained in its pages seemed as welcome now as it had been out of the question five minutes before.

Three weeks later found Harrison at Santilla, where he was comfortably housed with Burnham in an old adobe house owned by a Mexican named Pedro Sanchez.

Burnham had lived here nearly a year, in fact, it was about the only house in the village that was suitable.

Pedro's family consisted of his daughter, Pepita, and himself, the former attending to the household duties, and the latter gaining a livelihood by any means whatsoever, so long as he did not have to work.

At first sight Harrison sized up the old Mexican for the disreputable old thief that he was, which conjecture was afterwards confirmed by Burnham, and his next thought was one of wonder that Pepita could come of such blood.

She was sixteen and superb, with straight, lithe form, fully developed, though so young, glossy black hair and glorious black eyes—eyes that are found most often under a tropical sun, and that made Harrison forget to release her hand, which he had shaken in the English fashion, as he looked into them.

He decided on the spot that he was going to like Pepita, which was not so strange, as she was the redeeming feature of the bad impression he had got of Santilla at first sight, which reminded him of the Italian quarter of his own city, only it was worse.

There were two other men from England associated with Burnham in the work on the dam, but they lodged with the station agent at Concho and rode over and back each day on their bronchos. Harrison wondered why Burnham did not follow their example instead of living in an old adobe house with two Mexicans. At first he was inclined to suspect him—Pepita was so beautiful—but put the thought from him at once, knowing his friend as he did.

Besides, he had no reason to suspect Pepita of being anything but a good woman, although almost too attractive.

He began to like his new life as he became more accustomed to it, and although thoughts of a woman away at home came to trouble him sometimes he found it more and more easy day by day, as the tropical sun got into his blood, to forget.

Each evening, after the work on the dam was over and they had eaten supper, the three men were wont to play cards, set-back usually, although occasionally they indulged in a mild game of draw-poker, with five cent limit. In the latter even old Pedro used to warm up more than was customary.

Pepita usually watched them, sitting on a straight chair with her chin in her hands and her elbows resting on the table. Her usual position had been at the end of the table opposite Burnham, but after Harrison came she sat at the corner next to her father, where she could look into Harrison's face as they played.

Oftentimes, on looking up waiting for a play, he found her black eyes on him, and would smile at her.

He noticed, also, that Burnham, when not engaged in play, looked steadfastly at Pepita, and he wondered.

On coming to Santilla, he told Burnham frankly his reason for leaving home, knowing him to be worthy of the confidence.

As the days went by, somehow he could not help but think that Burnham was more interested in Pepita than he would care to admit, and, on the other hand, from the way she looked at him across the card table each night, he was egostistical enough to believe that the girl was beginning to care for him. It tickled his vanity to think that she should prefer him to Burnham, although he told himself emphatically that he would give her no encouragement to do so.

One afternoon, however, matters came to a crisis between the two, quite unexpectedly to him, if not to her.

Burnham sent Harrison over to the house for some papers, and the latter on arriving at the house found Pepita standing in the doorway, and as he dismounted asked her where her father was.

"Gone over to Concho," she answered, placing her hands against the sides of the doorway.

Harrison made a movement as if to enter, but Pepita still held her hands in the same position without moving.

"Won't you let me come in?" he asked.

The light of coquetry was dancing in her eyes as she looked at him, and her lips were half parted in a smile.

"The señor is so strong—I could not stop him," she replied, yet did not move.

Harrison came up close to her, smiling. He knew she wished him to make her move, although he did not realise the possible effects of her fascination.

He took hold of her wrists, still smiling into her eyes, and took them down, holding them firmly, yet gently, and then—he could not tell afterwards how it was done—her face was close to his and he could see her eyes smiling as he kissed her full, red lips.

It was a kiss unlike any he had ever experienced before, for the Mexicans kiss from the heart. Having tasted, it seemed as though the tropical sun had entered into his blood, and slipping his arms round her he held her lithe body to him and kissed her again and again until she broke from him and ran to her room, while Harrison hurriedly gathered up the papers he had been sent for and rode back to the dam, where he acted so queerly for the rest of the day that Burnham began to think the sun had affected his head.

That night the men played cards as usual, except that Pepita, with the perversity of a woman, took her old position where she could watch Burnham. The latter noticed her action and was puzzled, thinking Harrison and the girl must have quarrelled, which thought was strengthened by the former's queer behaviour in the afternoon, so he watched them both narrowly for some sign.

But Harrison acted as usual and Pepita watched the game without comment, as was her custom, although occasionally she stole a side-long glance at Harrison when she thought Burnham was not looking.

When the men had finished playing, however, and Burnham and her father had gone out to look after the horses, she came over to Harrison and slipped her arms round his neck, while he, in defiance of the good resolutions he had been making all the evening to the contrary, drew her shapely head down and caressed her.

He was five thousand miles from home and lonely, he told himself.

So the days passed, Harrison vowing all day during his work at the dam to do differently, only to hopelessly surrender when alone with Pepita under the fascination of her eyes.

After the day's work was over, she always found an opportunity to be alone with him, if only for a moment, and her good-night kiss became as much of a certainty as the game of cards it always followed.

At length a day came when the heat was so intense that work was stopped on the dam and the two men came home before noon. The shelter of the house was very welcome, and after dinner, followed by a bath in the portable bath tub that Burnham had rigged up, the two lay down to cool off—Burnham on the bed in his room, and Harrison in the living room on an old stretcher that Pedro at some time or other had filched from the railway company.

Pepita darkened the house as much as was possible without cutting off what little air there was moving, and stepped noiselessly about busy with her household duties.

These finished, she sat down in the room where Harrison was sleeping. Old Pedro had gone over to Concho despite the heat.

Pepita knew by her lover's measured breathing that he was sleeping, although his form showed indistinctly in the half darkness. His arm was lying over the side of the stretcher, and a beam of light from a crack in the wall near the floor illumined the white skin and blue veins that showed above the sun-burnt wrist.

She stole softly over to him and, kneeling down, gently raised his arm on to the stretcher, then touching her lips lightly to the white skin laid her head against it—she loved him with all her heart.

He moved slightly as though her touch had disturbed him and she slipped back to her seat, fearing to wake him.

There she fell into a reverie. How she loved this blue-eyed, fair-haired, laughing señor—the first she had really loved; although so many had wooed her. She loved Señor Burnham also, she thought, but in such a different way, more as she did her father—the father who had always been good to her, though people called him bad.

As she mused, there came to her for the first time the terrifying thought that she might sometime lose him. Perhaps he was betrothed to some woman in far-away England, and was only trifling with her!

The thought of it started her to her feet trembling, and she clenched her hands. But her love for him came to the rescue, blind as a woman's love always is. There was a difference in their stations, of course, she thought, yet in some way she knew it would come right, so she sat in darkness with her hands clasped over her knees and built the airy castles that were so soon to come tumbling down.

As she sat there in deep thought, there came dragging its loathsome length through a crack in the adobe wall that pest of the American continent, a rattlesnake.

On it came across the floor until it was just opposite the head of the stretcher, when Harrison moved uneasily in his sleep, and his arm dropped down again in the ray of sunlight and swung slowly.

The movement alarmed the snake and the sound of its rattles rang out shrilly as the reptile threw itself into a coil. The warning sound woke Pepita from her reverie. She could see nothing clearly in the darkness except the white arm that was swaying but she realised the danger, and, crossing the room with an action as quick as the thought that prompted it, knelt protectingly in front of the stretcher just as the ugly head struck out of the darkness, burying its fangs in her hand.

"Madre di Dios!" she gasped under her breath as she felt the sting, and the snake struck her again—this time in her shoulder through the thin dress.

Then her senses came back to her, and groping blindly in the dark with her uninjured hand, she seized the reptile's neck, and with superhuman strength crushed its life out, as it lay with its fangs entangled in her dress, where it had struck a third time.

All through this, with the exception of a slight outcry when the snake first struck, she had made no sound. Something seemed to tell her to do this for the man she loved so silently that he would not waken, and Harrison, after stirring slightly when she cried out, slept quietly through it all.

At length she rose. The poison was working through her veins, and her brain reeled so that she almost fell as she bent over the man she had saved.

She laid her head down on his shoulder for a moment, and, as though he had dreamt it, his arm slipped round her neck. For a second she stayed in his embrace, and then, disengaging herself softly, she kissed him lightly on the lips—as lightly as the mother kisses the babe she fears to wake—and left him.

At the door she paused for a moment, and looked back into the darkened room, then with a gasp that was almost a sob forced her way out into the sunshine.

She tried to close the door after her but her strength was failing, and she could not, so she left it open with the bright sunlight streaming into the room.

After a time Burnham came, and went over to Harrison and shook him.

"Come on, lazy!" he said. "It's time to wake up."

Harrison sat up rubbing his eyes.

"I have had the queerest dream, Burnham," he added. "I dreamt that Pepita——"

Old Pedro stepped in just then and he stopped. The Mexican held a telegram in his hand.

"For you, señor," he said, handing it to Harrison.

"I'll be back in a minute to see what it says," said Burnham, surmising that the message was from home, and went out.

Harrison tore off the yellow covering and read the slip. It was from his sweetheart at home, and read:

"I misjudged you, Dick. Come home."

It was signed simply "Mary," and he read it again to make sure. In that moment he was happier than he ever believed that a reconciliation with Mary could make him, and hurried out to tell Burnham the good news, knowing how glad his friend would be, but in his happiness giving not one thought to Pepita.

Hardly twenty yards away in the sage brush that surrounded the house he found Burnham—found him on his knees on the ground, rocking to and fro in the throes of an incontrollable grief, holding in his arm a shapeless, swollen form that had once been the beautiful Pepita whom he had loved.

The Opportunity of Zamia Leigh.

THE STORY OF AN UNDERSTUDY.

"I WILL not!"

"But why?"

"There is no need for me to be more explicit. I have no quarrel with either play or playwright, as I have said before; but if Zamia Leigh is to understudy me I throw up the part. That is my last word!"

"This is intolerable! I have ventured a small fortune on the production of this piece, and now, at the very last moment, when failure on your part to appear would virtually spell ruin for me, you deliberately propose to leave me in the lurch!"

"Well, I have told you, and, so far as I am concerned, there is an end of the matter."

"But what harm, in Heaven's name, has Zamia Leigh done you? I don't know a quieter, more inoffensive girl."

"I decline to discuss Miss Leigh's perfections or imperfections at this, or any other time."

"By Jove! you women are enough to drive a man out of the few senses you credit him with possessing," said Ewart Jaffray desperately, seizing his hat and making for the door. "I am going down to the theatre now, and shall expect a definite message from you before four o'clock this afternoon."

Annette Hope does not seem in the slightest degree disturbed or ruffled. She is tall, handsome, dark; the rich colouring of her skin, telling unmistakably of Spanish or Italian blood in greater or less proportion. The most distinguished actress of the day, she has had the ball at her feet for several seasons past, and now is in the position to dictate, not only to managers, but to the public, who, sooth to say, will not as a rule submit to the autocratic, save in the case of exceptional genius, and not always then, if genius presumes too liberally and abuses with too high a hand, its privileges and advantages.

The history of the new play in which Annette Hope was looked for—alike by the critics and the public generally—to out-do all her previous records, is somewhat peculiar.

Its writer was but a comparatively young man; his name, in fact, being absolutely unknown in literary circles, as also to the man in the street. Five years or more before the date of this story he had met Annette Hope at the house of some mutual friends, the impression on both sides being, from the very outset, of a decidedly fervid character, and ripening rapidly in the sun of each succeeding opportunity.

Cyril Chumley, barrister-at-law, and a literary student of no mean merit, was early imbued with an overmastering desire to write a play which should have in it such a woman's part as should, as created by his idol, lift her high above even the pedestal upon which she already stood. He had no thought of self in all this; the reputation which might, and, in the event of success, no doubt would accrue to himself, had no place in his sanguine anticipations of fame and reward. The woman he worshipped was his sole animating influence. Of course she knew it, for when did woman exist who was unconscious of a man's adoration? As naturally, of course, it pleased her, seeing that, according to her lights, she loved him.

Somehow the great piece was long in the writing; Chumley seeming never to be quite satisfied with it.

One day, about two months before her interview with Ewart Jaffray, she called upon Cyril at his chambers in the Temple. He was out, but had left in the littered evidence upon his desk, proof of hard and recent work. He had, indeed, that morning put the finishing touches to his play. An accomplished fact, it waited now but for the interpreter.

At any other time Annette Hope would have been eager to see that which was to bring about the crowning event of her life; but it so chanced that curiosity irresistibly prompted her to do more than glance at a note, in a woman's handwriting, lying invitingly open, and only half-concealed amongst the other papers.

There was not much in it (she had no nice scruples as to reading it); not enough, anyway, to account for the fit of furious spleen and jealousy to which it gave rise. It was just a few graceful words of thanks to Cyril Chumley for a kind act of his in recommending the writer for an engagement at the principal theatre in Edinburgh. It was signed "Zamia Leigh."

It was while, still with her back to the door, she held the letter in her hand, conning it, with contracted brow, for the third time, that Annette Hope was conscious of some one standing behind her. Turning sharply, she saw a slight figure, garbed in some soft clinging white stuff. The eyes which looked inquiringly into her own out of a face delicately small and very fair, were large and lustrous—almost too large indeed, for they appeared to dominate their owner's personality.

Annette Hope, although she had never set eyes upon the girl before, instinctively knew her to be Cyril Chumley's correspondent, and the knowledge made all the hot Southern blood within her rush madly to her brain and finger-tips.

Zamia, utterly innocent, as she knew herself to be, of offence as toward this indignant-eyed Juno, could not repress a look of timid surprise at the other's hostile attitude.

"Miss Zamia Leigh, I believe?"

"That is my name, certainly; but I fail to——"

"Are you in the habit, may I ask," interrupted the actress, "of accepting favours from, and of writing sweet little notes of gratitude, to Mr. Cyril Chumley?"

This with an assumption of the finest scorn, and in her best high tragedy manner.

"Really—I—do not know you!" said Zamia, roused out of her habitual gentleness; "neither am I aware by what right you, as a perfect stranger, put to me so insulting a question?"

"No? There may be a difference of opinion with regard to that perhaps." (Here the actress gathered up, with a grand gesture, her ample skirts). "Maybe, you have heard of me—my name is Hope—Annette Hope; and Cyril Chumley is an old and very dear friend of mine—that is all. I would merely, therefore, suggest" (with her fingers on the handle of the door) "that Miss Leigh should, for the future, be careful, very careful, not to write too many epistles of this kind, as possibly her motive in so doing, as also in paying undesirable morning visits to bachelor barristers, may be unhappily misconstrued—to her obvious detriment."

Before Zamia could clearly comprehend, much less reply to this caustic tirade, Annette Hope had left the room, shutting the door behind her.

Dropping into a chair Zamia burst into tears. Recovering somewhat after a while, but fearing that Cyril would return and find her in this state, she wrote him the following note, laying it where he could not fail to see it at once upon his arrival:

"DEAR MR. CHUMLEY—

"I have decided not to leave London just at present. I am anxious about my father, whom I think you know is far from well. I shall, therefore, under these circumstances, not need your kind letter of introduction to Mr. Campbell in Edinburgh, and so I re-inclose it now, with many thanks for the trouble you took in the matter. I shall try for an engagement in town.

"Yours sincerely,

"ZAMIA LEIGH.

"P.S.—I did not know Miss Annette Hope was a friend of yours."

When Cyril Chumley read Zamia's note he was puzzled at first as to its drift.

Then the true meaning of the postscript flashed upon him; light broke, and he reviled the fate which had made possible a meeting between these two.

Not once, up to this, had he wavered in his fealty to Annette; but shrewdly suspecting that with the predisposition to passionate injustice of her mother's race, she had wounded Zamia—wounded her sorely, and in a way that would make healing a matter of much difficulty, he experienced a revulsion, a change in his feeling towards her, which augured badly for love's continuance. With regard to Zamia his sentiments had been those of a big brother—nothing more; but it is certain now that he began to see her with different eyes. An inexplicable desire to shield her from Annette Hope's malevolency and spite, laid hold upon him with a strength and grip he could not shake off or resist.

The girl was, save for her father—whose state of health was such as to render him practically useless as a protection—alone in the world. She had been brought to the young man's notice by a theatrical friend, who fancied that she might perhaps fill a vacancy in the cast of My Lady Penitent.

Cyril Chumley, the first day he met her, saw latent talent in the girl, and the opportunity offering of a good opening in an Edinburgh theatre, he gave her his good word. Now, however, that events had taken this unexpected turn, he had no doubts as to what he ought to do—what, indeed, he ought to have done in the first instance.

Swayed by no other motive than a wish to advantage both himself and her, he pressed upon her the position of understudy to Annette Hope.

Zamia at first greatly feared to accept, but confident in her own powers, and relying upon Cyril's ability to "see her through," she consented, upon the one condition, that she should never at any time, whether at rehearsal or elsewhere, be brought into personal contact with her principal. As this was quite in accordance with Chumley's own ideas and wishes, strict silence in the matter was maintained, the understudy's identity remaining a mystery. That the secret ultimately leaked out, we know, with results fearfully disastrous to one woman, inasmuch as her fall contributed to the rise of that other upon whom she laid all the burden of that which really sprung from a reckless surrendering to her own ungovernable passions.

In the manager's office at the theatre two men sat anxiously discussing the situation.

Four o'clock went by and still no word from The Prince's leading lady.

"Jaffray," said Cyril Chumley, as the last silvery tinkle sounded from the little clock on the top of the bureau, "I have made up my mind! Zamia Leigh shall play 'Lady Susan'! If Miss Hope elects to sue us for breach of contract, I think, as a barrister, I know the law enough to be confident that the day would be ours."

Beyond a slight paleness there was nothing in either voice or manner which indicated mind disturbance or infirmity of purpose.

"But, my dear fellow!" protested the other; "had we not better give her, say, an hour's grace. You see, she has been largely advertised, and she is so popular that I'm afraid we shouldn't come out of it with unbroken heads."

"Not half-an-hour! not five minutes!" said Cyril bitterly. "I have my reasons—strong reasons—for giving the part to Miss Leigh, and Annette Hope must look to herself. As to the other matter, we must at once issue counter notices and advertisements. Make them as emphatic as possible, and—leave the rest to me."

Ewart Jaffray and Cyril Chumley were old college intimates, and so, the former knowing much and suspecting more, of his friend's life-story, had his own private opinion with regard to this absolute change of front. This, however, he kept religiously to himself, betraying only by the faintest of smiles his suspicions as to the other's manifestly expressed interest in the fair young understudy.

An hour later, and when, Chumley long since gone, Ewart Jaffray had quite made up his mind that his enterprise must certainly be relegated to the limbo of the might-have-beens, a commissionaire brought him a laconic note:

"I have changed my mind. I will play Lady Susan under existing circumstances; you can make your arrangements.

"Annette Hope."

In less than ten minutes Jaffray burst into Cyril Chumley's workroom in Hare Court, Temple.

"Look here!" he cried excitedly, holding out to the other the actress' note.

"Well!" quietly remarked Chumley, and returning the paper. "What's the trouble? The lady is too late—that is all; a by no means unusual thing with the majority of her sex; that is, according to my experience."

"But of course you will not insist now upon Miss Leigh's playing the lead?"

"But, indeed, I most certainly shall, so, my dear Ewart, see to it that the announcements I suggested an hour ago in your room are issued without delay. Fortunately, Miss Leigh is, I know, both letter and business perfect. There is no reason, therefore, why the date of production should be postponed by so much even as a day."

"But just imagine, Chumley! She—Annette Hope, I mean—has got the whip hand of us—and will use it!"

"As I said before, I don't think so, and am therefore, prepared to take the consequences."

Ewart Jaffray, despite his admiration and regard for his friend, shrugged his shoulders in good-humoured semi-pathetic fashion, as being a trifle unconcerned on this point.

"You know," he said, "how I am situated in the matter. Every shilling almost I possess is staked on this venture. What am I to do if things go wrong?"

"They will not go wrong—take my word for it. I know Zamia Leigh's power, and what that power is worth and is capable of effecting. More, should disaster come, I will myself guarantee you against personal loss."

Cyril Chumley was a rich man, and could make this offer worth the accepting.

But the stiletto was not allowed to descend on its murderous errand.

"Don't insult me, old man!" cried Ewart Jaffray, hastily. "Perhaps I am wrong—I hope I am. Anyway, I will at once announce our change of programme. Good-night! If I have belittled your judgment, forgive me. Good-night!"

The public were in no wise prepared for the substitution of an altogether untried novice (novice, that is, so far as the metropolis was concerned) for its favourite, and, in a way, resented it. Various were the critical and other comments in the Press and in clubrooms the town over.

It was as though our own Ellen Terry were, without good and sufficient reason publicly given, suddenly to throw up an important part on the eve of a great production.

In the present instance no explanation was vouchsafed, the published advertisements simply stating that the part of Lady Susan Strangeways, in Mr. Chumley's new play would, until further notice, be undertaken by Miss Zamia Leigh, her first appearance in London.

Far from affecting general interest in the new piece, expectation and curiosity were decidedly responsible for a marked increase in the desire to be present at the initial performance. It was rumoured that Annette Hope had left town for Paris, but beyond that (and even that was unprovable) nothing certain was known.

On the morning of the day of the opening Zamia received a note from Chumley, in which, after bidding her "good-speed," and giving her a few last words of encouragement and advice, he said: "I would like you to remember that, much as success will mean to you, to me it will mean more, although (and these concluding words she fancied to be somewhat tremulously written) your success or failure will be alike to me in this, that Zamia Leigh will be Zamia Leigh still!"

To read between the lines in matters of the heart is a woman's right and privilege, and certainly she is man's superior in both the method and the manner of it.

It needed, however, no expert to determine the real meaning of Chumley's words. Zamia instinctively knew that her hour had come; that the man who, ever since she had known him, had treated her with that kindliness and thoughtful gentleness, which in itself spoke volumes, was now more to her than all the world beside, as she to him.

For the moment the knowledge created a nervousness almost uncontrollable; but as the day wore on she became calmer, looking forward even with the indomitable fighting-spirit of the true artist to the now near-at-hand crisis of her life.

The curtain had gone up on the first act, and the house, crowded to its very fullest, had settled down to keenly critical consideration of piece and players.

Men's eyes and ears were, however, set to see and hear but one thing. Every movement of Zamia, every word she uttered was weighed in the balance, and, as time went on, found not only to be far from wanting, but to be certain to earn for the young provincial a very foremost place in the front rank of her profession.

Chumley was not in the theatre. Never at any time a man of much nerve, he was now pacing the embankment hard by, in no enviable state of mind.

Would Zamia fulfil his prophecy with regard to her? Of course she would. Should there be failure it would be his and his alone.

Then his thought went out to that other woman who, by her unreasoning jealousy and misdirected passion, had for ever torn herself out of his heart. Where was she, what was she doing? He might have had an answer to these questions had he but turned his head as a brougham passed close to the kerb.

The woman in it—an evil-eyed fury, with both jewelled hands convulsively clutching the top of the lowered window-frame, glared vengefully at him as the carriage whirled past, for, though his back was towards her, she knew his figure.

Presently, tired of watching the lamp-flecked river, and of hearing the lap-lapping of the water against the granite barrier, he moved to go up Savoy Hill into the Strand.

Reaching the theatre he passed unnoticed through the stage-entrance, and so on to the stage.

The curtain was down previous to the last act. Up to the present it had been a success, for both author and actress, all along the line.

There was yet five minutes of interval.

The stage was set for an elaborate conservatory scene, wonderfully painted and stage-managed.

The vista, which stretched to the extreme back of the stage, gave an impression from the front of illimitable distance of crystal, leafy beauty.

By a plashing fountain in the centre, shaded by luxuriant tropical plants, interspersed with fairy lights, sat Zamia, waiting the curtain's rise.

The orchestra was playing a dreamy waltz, peculiarly appropriate to the scene.

Behind a palm, at the right-hand second entrance, stood Chumley, watching Zamia, his eyes telling a love-tale impossible of misinterpretation.

What happened then, passed, as he has since said, with dream-like rapidity.

Raising his eyes he saw, gliding stealthily but swiftly down the green avenue from the back a woman wrapped to the feet in a long black domino.

Before he could think it out or comprehend the situation, the figure halted behind Zamia and, poising her hand, in which something glittered, a second, seemed as though about to strike the unconscious actress.

But the stiletto was not allowed to descend on its murderous errand.

The wrist, fast fixed in an iron grip, remained extended aloft; its owner unable to do more than hiss out her passionate disappointment. The stage, save for these three, was quite deserted; the leafiness, too, doing much to conceal this "play within a play."

"Miss Leigh," whispered Chumley, hoarsely and peremptorily, "leave the stage; don't return till you get your call!"

To Zamia it all seemed absolutely unreal; but she did as he bid her.

On her way to her room she met Jaffray, who asked the cause of her paleness and agitation.

"Come with me!" she wildly interrupted him. "Come!" almost dragging him in the direction of the stage.

"My dear Miss Leigh! The curtain will go up in a moment! What is it? I see nothing!"

Neither did she. The neighbourhood of the fountain, the whole stage even, was void of life.

"But—but I left them here!"

"Left them? Left whom?" somewhat impatiently queried Jaffray. "But tell me after the show, it's too late now." And as he swiftly left her side, the curtain rose, discovering her seated by the fountain side.

For the play, it need only be said, that it was an unqualified triumph for all concerned. Again and again was Zamia led out by Jaffray to receive the applause and congratulations of the house.

But the author—where was he?

No one knew; and so it was that the writer of the most successful play London had seen for years was apologised for as being absent.

Immediately before the commencement of the third and last act, the stage-doorkeeper saw Cyril Chumley, with a tall, black-cloaked lady, whom he fancied he recognised, upon his arm, pass out and enter a waiting brougham. The gentleman it was who gave the order "Home!" the carriage driving rapidly away westwards.

* * * * *

"You quite understand me?"

It was Cyril Chumley who spoke; as, standing by the table in Annette Hope's dining-room in her Duke Street flat, he looked sternly into the eyes of the woman who faced him, defiant and unabashed.

As she did not answer, he addressed her again.

"There is," he said, "no other course open to you. You are a rich woman, and to give up your profession and your home in England will be no hardship. That which you—and I—and—one other know, shall remain unknown to the world on this one condition only—that within twelve hours you leave London. I shall expect to receive a note from you by evening to-morrow dated from Dover (or, better still, a wire in the morning) to say that you are about to cross to France. I make no secret of my intention to marry Zamia Leigh, if she will have me; and I am vain enough to think that she will. Knowing you as I do, I conceive the knowledge of that fact to be part of your punishment, which, however, you have brought upon yourself, and for which you have no one but yourself to blame."

Up to this she had resolutely, though with difficulty, kept silence.

Now she spoke.

"I will go! for, like a coward, you hold me down—and—I cannot help it; but to say that it was I who began it all. I! is a lie!"

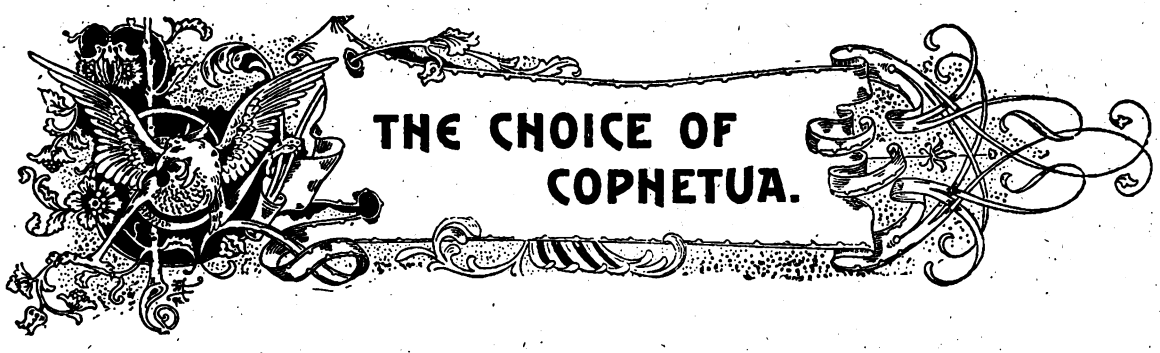
She closed her eyes in the intensity of her passion, as she blazed out the word.

When she opened them again, prepared to launch at him the uttermost of which she was capable—he was gone!

Ralph Enderby.



"Shall you marry him, Nora?"

"It's manners to wait to be asked," returned Nora.

"Hasn't he asked you?" persisted Will Cable.

"That would be telling," Nora Marsh replied.

Then she laughed up at the young giant leaning over the back of the armchair and regarding her with a look at once quizzical and puzzled. He was just as gentle, as retiring, as shy as ever. And yet the world had great things to say of his wisdom, his indomitable pluck in the face of distressing obstacles, the lofty scientific value of his researches and discoveries. He had been interviewed and lauded. The critics were unanimous in his praise. And here he was, back in the beloved, book-lined old room where they had quarrelled as children—just the same delightful fellow of five years before.

"I suppose you know we're awfully proud of you, Will," she said. She had been watching him dreamily, trying to fancy that powerful, cropped, dark head adorned with the soft waves of the lad who used to be so careful of his personal appearance when he was home from college on his vacations. "I keep telling people what great friends we were when we were young. I don't say a word about the torture you made me suffer when you kidnapped the doll."

"You may not happen to remember, either, your revenge for that injury!"

"Oh, I do," she cried, and laughed out. "Indeed I do! You were taking Laura Miller to play tennis, and Bobby——"

"I have always thought the sense of humour in your small brother was inspired and developed by his sister. To accidentally turn the garden hose on a young man clad in the height of fashion, was a peculiar evidence of misdirected energy! Now, what are you——"

Carriage wheels had stopped before the door. They could hear the servant crossing the hall. "Mr. Reginald Raymond," announced the man.

Mr. Raymond, bland and placid, round-faced, round-eyed, hat in hand and monocle in eye, made his appearance. Was he too early? Was Miss Marsh ready? He had been assured the first act was unusually strong. Mr. ——; ah yes, Mr. Cable, to be sure. He had heard of Mr. Cable. Quite pleased to meet him! Was this Miss Marsh's cloak? Would she permit him? Good-evening, Mr. Cable!

Then Miss Marsh had taken up her bouquet, had gathered around her the folds of her opera-wrap of old-rose panne velvet, had sent a sweet, swift, mocking look at Cable standing deserted—and was gone.

But, although she heartily enjoyed the gay comedy to which they went, she had not the faintest idea of the comedy in which she played a wholly unconscious part. How could she dream that Reginald Raymond had finally decided to bestow upon her the inestimable honour of his favour? How could she suppose that after long deliberation he had come to the conclusion that upon her fair shoulders should fall the mantle of his princely preference? How could she—in her wildest moments of prophetic rapture—imagine that he, the heir to millions, the bright particular star of half-a-dozen seasons of ambitious mothers, had finally decided that she should rule his household, and shed lustre on his name?

He was making no rash decision. He repeatedly strengthened his heart by this reassurance, while they drove to the theatre, while he sat by her side at the play—was her vis-à-vis at supper. Her family was one of not only social but intellectual pre-eminence. Her father had been twice a Member of Parliament. Her brother had held a high diplomatic post abroad. Their friends were of the most exclusive. Their acquaintances were those of the cultured—the artistic world. To be sure, the Marshes had no money to spare. But—what was money to him? And when it came to grace and wit, and distinction, and beauty, and above all, that exquisite indefinable possession we call breeding—there was not a girl who might be mentioned in the same breath with her—no, by George! not one! And he would marry her—he would! He'd tell her so this very night.

He turned to study her again, and with pulses that quickened as he looked. Faultless of form, graceful as only a beautiful woman and a tigress can be, with features perfect as those cut on the silver coins of Syracuse, she was worthy the incense of men's homage—worthy the quite as precious glory of woman's jealousy! There was just a glimpse of creamy flesh through the meshes of Mechlin at arms and bosom. The eyes that looked out from under long, white lids, had the laughing loveliness of a child's. One fancied the full scarlet lips could be as scornful as they were sensitive—as passionate as they were sweet. And those who knew Nora Marsh knew the warmth her proud heart held, the brilliance her brain harboured, the gentleness which was as much a part of her divine power as her beauty itself! Yes, he was making a perfectly proper choice. Would she be overwhelmed to be selected as the bride of a millionaire? To have a mansion in the country, a town house in Park Lane? There was a charming castle on a blue Scottish moor he would buy for her if she fancied a sojourn in the land of the heather. As for jewels—he smiled again there. All women loved jewels. How many men could offer to the chosen companion of his life such rare gems as he?

But, while he found himself the envied of all men, sailing beside her down the Adriatic—he had almost fixed on the Adriatic for their wedding trip—he used his language as the sapient Frenchman divined—to conceal his thoughts.

"That Mr. Cable seems a fine sort of a fellow. No end of talk about him at the clubs. He is the lion of the hour, they say."

"Oh, we quite claim Mr. Cable at our house! His every honour is a personal triumph for us."

"So good of you to say so!" Raymond was nothing if not complacent. "He ought to be very much flattered!"

A queer little look flashed at him from under the curling dark lashes.

"It is we who are flattered, Mr. Raymond!"

His laugh was leniency itself.

"The extent of your charity is only being revealed to me! I wonder if I may—if I might—plead for mercy for myself!"

They were driving slowly homeward through the silence, the crispness, the blueness, of a perfect February night.

"You! What could the gods give you that you have not?"

He was conscious of the tremor that went through the slight frame. A sense of his supremacy shook him. He had been right, then! All his golden anticipations were to be realised. Not that he had doubted for a moment that any girl in her right mind would refuse him—Reginald Raymond! His arm slipped confidently round her waist.

"The gods could give me nothing—unless you were theirs to give!"

"Ah!" she said softly. She moved a little until she was free from his arm. "You—you are quite sure——"

That was just where Raymond's bad quarter of an hour began.

"Sure—indeed, yes! I have not spoken hastily. I have given the matter—a weighty one as you will admit—due consideration." He adjusted his monocle. He wished the coachman would drive more slowly. "I recollect of what I owe to my family, to my position, to—if I may say so—to myself!"

"Yes," sighed a tender voice. "Oh—yes!"

"And I have made up my mind that you are the only woman I shall marry—you!"

He could again feel the tremor of the slender shape near. He put out a fat little hand. His touch was not tentative by any means. It was determined. There was no false modesty about Raymond. In the gloom of the carriage he almost forgot the charm, the beauty, the power of the girl. All these were engulfed in his own superb condescension—a condescension of which she was aware. Her choking voice when she spoke proved that.

"And I have decided it is you—you whom I have chosen for—my wife!"

"You have——" How overwhelmed she was!—"not spoken rashly?"

"My mind," he declared heroically, "is irrevocably made up!"

"You are sure you will not regret——"

He cut short the faltering voice. "Your timidity is uncalled for, dear. I never change my mind. When shall it be?—confound that coachman!"

The carriage door swung back. Raymond walked with Miss Marsh up the steps.

"Don't come in!" she intreated sweetly. "I have an engagement. And—I'm very sorry, you know and very grateful for the honour, of course, but I don't care for you—that way. Thank you ever so much! Take care! There's been a frost! The steps are quite slippery. I've had a most enjoyable evening. Good-night—good-night!"

Then her cheeks scarlet, her lips apart, and breathing hard she was in the library—was facing a man who had risen from his low chair in the light of the dying fire.

"Well?" he questioned hoarsely. He came slowly towards her. "Well? He proposed to-night. I knew he would. Get it over for Heaven's sake! When is it to be? When are you to give yourself—your sweet self—to any man's arms?"

She went straight towards him. Her colour had suddenly gone. She was white as the roses she carried. And her cheeks were wet and shining in the firelight.

"Whenever you will take me!" she said.

A THOUSAND DEATHS.

I HAD been in the water about an hour, and cold, exhausted, with a terrible cramp in my right calf, it seemed as though my last hour had come. Fruitlessly struggling against the strong ebb-tide, I had beheld the maddening procession of the water-front lights slip by; but now I gave up attempting to breast the stream, and contented myself with the bitter thoughts of a wasted career, now drawing to a close.

It had been my luck to come of good, English stock, but of parents whose account with the bankers far exceeded their knowledge of child-nature and the rearing of children. While born with a silver spoon in my mouth, the blessed atmosphere of the home circle was to me unknown. My father, a very learned man and a celebrated antiquarian, gave no thought to his family, being constantly lost in the abstractions of his study; while my mother, noted far more for her good looks than her good sense, sated herself with the adulation of the society in which she was perpetually plunged.

I went through the regular school and college routine of a son of parents well-to-do, and as the years brought me increasing strength and passions, my parents suddenly became aware that I was possessed of an immortal soul, and endeavoured to draw the curb. But it was too late; I perpetrated the wildest and most audacious follies, and was disowned by my people, ostracised by the society I had so long outraged; and with the thousand pounds my father gave me, with the declaration that he would neither see me again nor give me more, I took a first-class passage to Australia.

Since then my life had been one long peregrination—from the Orient to the Occident, from the Arctic to the Antarctic—to find myself at last, an able seaman of thirty, in the full vigour of my manhood, drowning in San Francisco Bay because of a disastrously successful attempt to desert my ship.

My right leg was drawn up by the cramp, and I was suffering the keenest agony. A slight breeze stirred up a choppy sea, which washed into my mouth and down my throat, nor could I prevent it. Though I still contrived to keep afloat, it was merely mechanical, for I was rapidly becoming unconscious. I have a dim recollection of drifting past the sea-wall, and of catching a glimpse of an up-river steamer's starboard light; then everything became a blank.

I heard the low hum of insect life, and felt the balmy air of a spring morning fanning my cheek. Gradually it assumed a rhythmic flow, to whose soft pulsations my body seemed to respond. I floated on the gentle bosom of a summer's sea, rising and falling with dreamy pleasure on each crooning wave. But the pulsations grew stronger; the humming louder; the waves larger, fiercer—I was dashed about on a stormy sea. A great agony fastened upon me. Brilliant, intermittent sparks of light flashed athwart my inner consciousness; in my ears there was the sound of many waters; then a sudden snapping of an intangible something, and I awoke.

He was inexorable. He was not a father, but a scientific machine.

The scene, in which I was chief actor, was a curious one. A glance sufficed to inform me that I lay on the cabin floor of some gentleman's yacht, in a most uncomfortable posture. On either side, grasping my arms and working them up and down like pump handles, were two peculiarly clad, dark-skinned creatures. Though conversant with most aboriginal types, I could not conjecture their nationality. Some attachment had been fastened about my head, which connected my respiratory organs with the machine I shall next describe. My nostrils, however, had been closed, forcing me to breathe through the mouth. Foreshortened by the obliquity of my line of vision, I beheld two tubes, similar to small hose but of different composition, which emerged from my mouth and went off at an acute angle from each other. The first came to an abrupt termination and lay on the floor beside me; the second traversed the floor in numerous coils, connecting with the apparatus I have promised to describe.

In the days before I had become a wanderer, I had dabbled not a little in science, and, conversant with the appurtenances and general paraphernalia of the laboratory, I appreciated the machine I now beheld. It was composed chiefly of glass, the construction being of that crude sort which is employed for experimentative purposes. A vessel of water was surrounded by an air chamber, to which was fixed a vertical tube, surmounted by a globe. In the centre of this was a vacuum gauge.

The water in the tube moved upwards and downwards, creating alternate inhalations and exhalations, which were in turn communicated to me through the hose. With this, and the aid of the men who pumped my arms so vigorously, had the process of breathing been artificially carried on, my chest rising and falling and my lungs expanding and contracting, till nature could be persuaded to again take up her wonted labour.

As I opened my eyes the appliance about my head, nostrils, and mouth was removed. Draining a stiff dose of brandy, I staggered to my feet to thank my preserver, and confronted—my father. But long years of fellowship with danger had taught me self-control, and I waited to see if he would recognise me. Not so; he saw in me no more than a runaway sailor, and treated me accordingly.

Leaving me to the care of the blackies, he fell to revising the notes he had made on my resuscitation. As I ate of the handsome fare served up to me, confusion began on deck, and from the chanteys of the sailors and the rattling of blocks and tackles, I surmised that we were getting under way. What a lark! Off on a cruise with my recluse father into the wide Pacific! Little did I realise, as I laughed to myself, which side the joke was to be on. Aye, had I known, I would have plunged overboard and welcomed the dirty fo'c'sle from which I had just escaped.

I was not allowed on deck till we had sunk the farallones and the last pilot boat. I appreciated this forethought on the part of my father, and made it a point to thank him heartily, in my bluff seaman's manner. I could not suspect that he had his own ends in view, in thus keeping my presence secret to all save the crew. He told me briefly of my rescue by his sailors, assuring me that the obligation was on his side, as my appearance had been most opportune. He had constructed the apparatus for the vindication of a theory concerning certain biological phenomena, and had been waiting for an opportunity to use it.

"You have proved it beyond all doubt," he said; then added with a sigh, "but only in the small matter of drowning."

But, to take a reef in my yarn—he offered me an advance of two pounds on my previous wages to sail with him, and this I considered handsome, for he really did not need me. Contrary to my expectations, I did not join the sailors' mess for'ard, being assigned to a comfortable state-room and eating at the captain's table. He had perceived that I was no common sailor, and I resolved to take this chance for reinstating myself in his good graces. I wove a fictitious past to account for my education and present position, and did my best to come in touch with him. I was not long in disclosing a predilection for scientific pursuits, nor he in appreciating my aptitude. I became his assistant, with a corresponding increase in wages; and before long, as he grew confidential and expounded his theories, I was as enthusiastic as himself.

The days flew quickly by, for I was deeply interested in my new studies, passing my waking hours in his well-stocked library, or listening to his plans and aiding him in his laboratory work. But we were forced to forego many enticing experiments, a rolling ship not being exactly the proper place for delicate or intricate work. He promised me, however, many delightful hours in the magnificent laboratory for which we were bound. He had taken possession of an unchartered South Sea Island, as he said, and turned it into a scientific paradise.

We had not been on the island long before I discovered the horrible mare's nest I had fallen into. But before I describe the strange things which came to pass, I must briefly outline the causes which culminated in as startling an experience as ever fell to the lot of man.

Late in life my father had abandoned the charms of antiquity and succumbed to the more fascinating ones embraced under the head of biology. Having been thoroughly grounded during his youth in the fundamentals, he rapidly explored all the higher branches so far as the scientific world had gone, and found himself on the no man's land of the unknowable. It was his intention to pre-empt some of this unclaimed territory, and it was at this stage of his investigations that we had been thrown together. Having a good brain, though I say it myself, I had mastered his speculations and methods of reasoning, becoming almost as mad as himself. But I should not say this. The marvellous results we afterwards obtained can only go to prove his sanity. I can but say that he was the most abnormal specimen of cold-blooded cruelty I have ever seen.

After having penetrated the dual mysteries of physiology and psychology, his thoughts had led him to the verge of a great field, for which, the better to explore, he began studies in higher organic chemistry, pathology, toxicology, and other sciences and sub-sciences rendered kindred as accessories to his speculative hypotheses. Starting from the proposition that the direct cause of the temporary and permanent arrest of vitality was due to the coagulation of certain elements and compounds in the protoplasm, he had isolated and subjected these various substances to innumerable experiments. Since the temporary arrest of vitality in an organism brought coma, and a permanent arrest death, he held that by artificial means this coagulation of the protoplasm could be retarded, prevented, and even overcome in the extreme states of solidification. Or, to do away with the technical nomenclature, he argued that death, when not violent and in which none of the organs had suffered injury, was merely suspended vitality, and that, in such instances, life could be induced to resume its functions by the use of proper methods. This, then, was his idea: To discover the method—and by practical experimentation prove the possibility—of renewing the vitality in a structure from which life had seemingly fled. Of course, he recognised the futility of such endeavour after decomposition had set in; he must have organisms which but the moment, the hour, or the day before, had been quick with life. With me, in a crude way, he had proved this theory. I was really drowned, really dead, when picked from the water of San Francisco Bay—but the vital spark had been renewed by means of his ærotherapeutical apparatus, as he called it.

Now to his dark purpose concerning me. He first showed me how completely I was in his power. He had sent his yacht away for a year, retaining only his two blackies, who were utterly devoted to him. He then made an exhaustive review of his theory and outlined the method of proof he had adopted, concluding with the startling announcement that I was to be his subject.

I had faced death and weighed my chances in many a desperate venture, but never in one of this nature. I can swear I am no coward, yet this proposition of journeying back and forth across the borderland of death put the yellow fear upon me. I asked for time, which he granted, at the same time assuring me that but the one course was open—I must submit. Escape from the island was out of the question; escape by suicide was not to be entertained, though really preferable to what it seemed I must undergo; my only hope was to destroy my captors. But this latter was frustrated through the precautions taken by my father. I was subjected to a constant surveillance, even in my sleep being guarded by one or the other of the blacks.

Having pleaded in vain, I announced and proved that I was his son. It was my last card, and I had placed all my hopes upon it. But he was inexorable; he was not a father, but a scientific machine. I wonder yet how it ever came to pass that he married my mother or begat me, for there was not the slightest grain of emotion in his make-up. Reason was all in all to him, nor could he understand such things as love or sympathy in others, except as petty weaknesses which should be overcome. So he informed me that in the beginning he had given me life, and who had better right to take it away than he? Such, he said, was not his desire, however; he merely wished to borrow it occasionally, promising to return it punctually at the appointed time. Of course, there was a liability of mishaps, but I could do no more than take the chances.

The better to insure success, he wished me to be in the best possible condition, so I was dieted and trained like a great athlete before a decisive contest. What could I do? If I had to undergo the peril, it was best to be in good shape. In my intervals of relaxation he allowed me to assist in the arranging of the apparatus and in the various subsidiary experiments. The interest I took in all such operations can be imagined. I mastered the work as thoroughly as he, and often had the pleasure of seeing some of my suggestions or alterations put into effect. After such events I would smile grimly, conscious of officiating at my own funeral.

He began by inaugurating a series of experiments in toxicology. When all was ready, I was killed by a stiff dose of strychnine, and allowed to lie dead for some twenty hours. During that period my body was dead, absolutely dead. All respiration and circulation ceased; but the frightful part of it was, that while the protoplasmic coagulation proceeded, I retained consciousness, and was enabled to study it in all its ghastly details.

The apparatus to bring me back to life was an air-tight chamber, fitted to receive my body. The mechanism was simple—a few valves, a rotary shaft and crank, and an electric motor. When in operation, the interior atmosphere was alternately condensed and rarefied, thus communicating to my lungs an artificial respiration without the agency of the tubing previously used. Though my body was inert, and, for all I knew, in the first stages of decomposition, I was cognisant of everything that transpired. I knew when they placed me in the chamber, and though all my senses were quiescent, I was aware of hypodermic injections of a compound to react upon the coagulatory process. Then the chamber was closed and the machinery started. My anxiety was terrible; but the circulation became gradually restored, the different organs began to carry on the respective functions, and in an hour's time I was eating a hearty dinner.

It cannot be said that I participated in this series, nor in the subsequent ones, with much nerve; but after two ineffectual attempts at escape, I began to take quite an interest. Besides, I was becoming accustomed. My father was beside himself at his success, and as the months rolled by his speculations took wilder and yet wilder flights. We ranged through the three great classes of poisons, the neurotics, the gaseous, and the irritants, but carefully avoided some of the mineral irritants, and passed the whole group of corrosives. During the poison régime I became quite accustomed to dying, and had but one mishap to shake my growing confidence. Scarifying a number of lesser blood vessels in my arm, he introduced a minute quantity of that most frightful of poisons, the arrow poison, or curare. I lost consciousness at the start, quickly followed by the cessation of respiration and circulation, and so far had the solidification of the protoplasm advanced, that he gave up all hope. But at the last moment he applied a discovery he had been working upon, receiving such encouragement as to redouble his efforts.

Another series of delightful experiments was with electricity. We verified Tesla's assertion that high currents were utterly harmless by passing 100,000 volts through my body. As this did not affect me, the current was reduced to 2,500, and I was quickly electrocuted. This time he ventured so far as to allow me to remain dead, or in a state of suspended vitality, for three days. It took four hours to bring me back.

Once he superinduced lockjaw; but the agony of dying was so great that I positively refused to undergo similar experiments. The easiest deaths were by asphyxiation, such as drowning, strangling, and suffocation by gas; while those by morphine, opium, cocaine, and chloroform were not at all hard.

Another time, after being suffocated, he kept me in cold storage for three months, not permitting me to freeze or decay. This was without my knowledge, and I was in a great fright on discovering the lapse of time. I became afraid of what he might do with me when I lay dead, my alarm being increased by the predilection he was beginning to betray toward vivisection. The last time I was resurrected, I discovered that he had been tampering with my breast. Though he had carefully dressed and sewed the incisions up, they were so severe that I had to take to my bed for some time. It was during this convalescence that I evolved the plan by which I ultimately escaped.

While feigning unbounded enthusiasm in the work, I asked and received a vacation from my unpleasant occupation. During this period I devoted myself to laboratory work, while he was too deep in the vivisection of the many animals captured by the blacks to take notice of my work.

It was on these two propositions that I constructed my theory: First, electrolysis, or the decomposition of water into its constituent gases by means of electricity; and, second, by the hypothetical existence of a force, the converse of gravitation which has been named "apergy." Terrestrial attraction, for instance, merely draws objects together but does not combine them; hence, apergy is merely repulsion. Now, atomic or molecular attraction not only draws objects together but integrates them; and it was the converse of this, or a disintegrative force, which I wished not only to discover and produce, but to direct at will. Thus the molecules of hydrogen and oxygen reacting on each other, separate and create new molecules, containing both elements and forming water. Electrolysis causes these molecules to split up and resume their original condition, producing the two gases separately. The force I wished to find must not only do this with two, but with all elements, no matter in what compounds they exist. If I could then entice my father within its radius, he would be instantly disentegrated and sent flying to the four quarters, a mass of isolated elements.

By two powerful batteries, connected with magnets constructed specially for this purpose, two tremendous forces were projected. Considered apart from each other, they were perfectly harmless; but they accomplished their work by focussing at an invisible point in mid-air. After practically demonstrating its success, besides narrowly escaping being blown into nothingness, I laid my trap. Concealing the magnets, so that their force made the whole space of my chamber doorway a field of death, and placing by my couch a button by which I could throw on the current from the storage batteries, I climbed into bed.

The blackies still guarded my sleeping quarters, one relieving the other at midnight. I turned on the current as soon as the first man arrived. Hardly had I begun to doze, when I was aroused by a sharp, metallic tinkle. There, on the mid-threshold, lay the collar of Dan, my father's St. Bernard. My keeper ran to pick it up. He disappeared like a gust of wind, his clothes falling to the floor in a heap. There was a slight whiff of ozone in the air, but since the principal gaseous components of his body were hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen, which are equally colourless and odourless, there was no other manifestation of his departure. Yet when I shut off the current and removed the garments, I found a deposit of carbon in the form of animal charcoal; also other powders, the isolated, solid elements of his organism, such as sulphur, potassium, and iron. Resetting the trap, I crawled back to bed. At midnight I got up and removed the remains of the second blacky, and then slept peacefully till morning.

I was awakened by the strident voice of my father, who was calling to me from across the laboratory. I laughed to myself. There had been no one to call him and he had overslept. I could hear him as he approached my room with the intention of rousing me, and so I sat up in bed, the better to observe his translation—perhaps apotheosis were a better term. He paused a moment at the threshold, then took the fatal step. Puff! It was like the wind sighing among the pines. He was gone. His clothes fell in a fantastic heap on the floor. Besides ozone, I noticed the faint, garlic-like odour of phosphorus. A little pile of elementary solids lay among his garments. That was all. The wide world lay before me. My captors were not.

THE LOVERS OF YVONNE

By RAFAEL SABATINI.

CHAPTER XIX.

Of my Return to Paris.

SCANT cause is there for me to tarry over the details of my return to Paris. A sad enough journey it was; as sad for myself as for my poor Michelot, since he rode with one so dejected as I.

Things had gone ill, and I feared that, when the Cardinal heard the story, things would go worse; for Mazarin was never a tolerant man, nor one to be led by the gospel of mercy and forgiveness. For myself I foresaw the rope—possibly even the wheel; and a hundred times a day I dubbed myself a fool for obeying the voice of honour with such punctiliousness, when so grim a reward awaited me. What mood was on me—me, Gaston de Luynes, whose honour had been long since besmirched and tattered until no outward semblance of honour was left it?

But swift in the footsteps of that question would come the answer—Yvonne. Aye, truly enough, it was because in my heart I had dared to hold a sentiment of love for her, the purest—nay, the only pure—thing my heart had held for many a year, that I would set nothing vile to keep company with that sentiment; that until my sun should set—and already it dropped swiftly towards life's horizon—my actions should be the actions of such a man as might win Yvonne's affections.

But let that be. This idle retrospective mood can interest you but little; nor can you profit from it, unless indeed it be by noting how holy and cleansing to the heart of man is the love—albeit unrequited—that he bears a good woman.

As we drew near Meung, where we lay on the first night of our journey, a light travelling chaise, going in the same direction, passed us at a gallop. As it flashed by I caught a glimpse of Eugène de Canaples' swart face through the window. Whether the recognition was mutual, I cannot say, nor does it signify.

When we reached the Hotel de la Couronne, half-an-hour later, we saw that same chaise disappearing round a corner of the street, whilst through the gateway the ostler was leading a pair of horses, foam-flecked and steaming with sweat.

Whither went Master Canaples at such a rate, and in a haste that caused him to travel day and night? To a goal he little looked for—or rather which in the madness of his headlong rush he could not see. So I was to learn ere long.

Next day I awoke betimes, and setting my window wide, to let in the fresh, clean-smelling air of that May morning, I made shift to dress. Save for the cackle of the poultry which had strayed into the courtyard, and the noisy yawns and sleep-laden ejaculations of the stable-boy who was drawing water for the horses, all was still, for it had not yet gone five o'clock.

But of a sudden a door opened somewhere, and a step rang out, accompanied by the jangle of spurs, and with it came a sharp, unpleasant voice calling for its owner's horse. There was a familiar sound in those shrill accents that caused me to thrust my head through the casement. But I was quick to withdraw it, as I recognised in the gaily-dressed little fellow below, my old friend Malpertuis, though I knew not what impulse made me draw back so suddenly.

From behind my curtains I watched Malpertuis riding out of the yard, saying, in answer to a parting question of the landlord, who had come upon the scene, that he would breakfast at Beaugency.

Then, as he rode down the street, he of a sudden raised his discordant voice and sang to the accompaniment of his horse's hoofs, and the burden of his song rang thus:

"A *Frondeur wind
Got up to-day,
'Gainst Mazarin
It blows they say."

I listened in amazement to his raven's voice.

Whither was he bound, I asked myself, and whence a haste that made him set out fasting, and with an anti-cardinalist ditty on his lips, and ride two leagues to seek a breakfast in a village that did not hold an inn where a dog might be housed in comfort?

Like Eugène de Canaples, he travelled also towards a goal that he little dreamt of. And so albeit the one went south and the other north, these two men were, betwixt them, drawing together the threads of this narrative of mine, as anon you shall learn.

We reached Paris at dusk, three days later, and we went straight to my old lodging in the Rue St. Antoine.

Coupri started and gasped upon beholding me, and not until I had reviled him for a fool in a voice that was passing human, he would believe that I was no ghost. He too had heard the rumour of my death.

I dispatched Michelot to the Palais Royal, where, without permitting his motive to transpire, he was to ascertain for me whether M. de Montresor was in Paris, whether he still dwelt at the Hotel des Cloches, and at what hour he could be found there.

Whilst he was away I went up to my room, and there I found a letter which Coupri informed me had been left by a lackey a month ago, before the report that I had been killed had reached Paris, and since lain forgotten. It was a delicate note, to to which still hung the ghost of a perfume; there were no arms on the seal, but the writing I took to be that of my aunt,

* The Frondeurs were members of certain factions in France during the minority of Louis XIV., who were hostile to the Court and the minister, Mazarin, and gave rise to a series of civil dissensions from 1648 to 1654.

the Duchesse de Chevreuse; and vaguely marvelling what motive she could have had for communicating with me, I cut the silk.

It was indeed from the Duchesse, but it contained no more than a request that I should visit her at her hotel on the day following that upon which she had written, adding that she had pleasing news for me.

I thrust the note into my pocket with a sigh. Of what could it avail me now to present myself at her hotel? Her invitation was for a month ago. Since then she would likely enough have heard the rumour that had been current, and would have ceased to expect me.

I caught myself wondering whether the news might have caused her a pang of regret, and somehow methought this possible; for of all my relatives, Madame de Chevreuse was the only one—and she was but my aunt by marriage—who of late years had shown me any kindness or even recognition. I marvelled what her pleasing news could be, and I concluded that probably she had heard of my difficulties, and wished once again to help me out of them. Well, my purse was hollow indeed at the moment; but I need not trouble her, since I was going somewhere where purses were not needed—on a journey to which no expenses are attached.

In my heart, nevertheless, I blessed the gracious lady who, for all the lies that the world may have told of her, was the kindest woman I had known, and the best—save one other.

I was still musing when Michelot returned with the information that M. de Montrésor was to be found at the Hotel des Cloches, whither he had gone to sup a few minutes before. Straightway I set out, bidding him attend me, and, muffled in my cloak, I proceeded at a brisk pace to the Rue des Fosses St. Germain, where the lieutenant's quarters were situated.

I left Michelot in the common room, and preceded by the plump little woman who owned the house, I ascended to Montrésor's chamber. I found the young soldier at table, and fortunately alone. He rose as I entered, and as the hostess, retreating, closed the door, I doffed my hat, and letting fall my cloak, revealed myself. His lips parted, and I heard the hiss of an indrawn breath as his astonished eyes fell upon my countenance. My laugh dispelled his doubts that I might be other than flesh and blood, yet not his doubts touching my identity. He caught up a taper, and coming forward he cast the light on my face for a moment, then, setting the candle back upon the table, he vented his surprise in an oath or two, which was natural enough in one of his calling.

"'Tis clear, lieutenant," quoth I, as I detached my sword from the baldrick, "that you believed me dead. Fate willed, however, that I should be restored to life, and so soon as I had recovered sufficient strength to undertake the journey to Paris I set out. I arrived an hour ago, and here I am, to redeem my word of honour, and surrender the sword and liberty which you but lent me."

I placed my rapier on the table and waited for him to speak. Instead, however, he continued to stare at me for some moments, and when at last he did break the silence, it was to burst into a laugh that poured from his throat in rich, mellow peals as he lay back in his chair.

My gorge rose. Had I travelled from Blois and done what I deemed the most honourable deed of my life to be laughed at for my pains by a foppish young jackanapes of his Eminence's Guards? Something of my displeasure must he have seen reflected in my face, for of a sudden he checked his mirth.

"Forgive me, M. de Luynes," he gasped. "For, alas! 'tis no matter for laughter, and albeit I laughed with more zest than courtesy, I give you my word that my admiration for you vastly exceeds my amusement. M. de Luynes," he added, rising and holding out his hand to me, "there are liars in Paris who give you an evil name—men who laughed at me when they heard that I had given you leave to go on parole to St Sulpice des Reaux that night, trusting to your word of honour that you would return if you lived. His Eminence dubbed me a fool, and went near to dismissing me from his service and yet I have now the proof that my confidence was not misplaced, since even though you were believed to be dead, you did not hesitate to bring me your sword."

"Monsieur, spare me!" I exclaimed, for in truth his compliments waxed as irksome as had been his whilom merriment.

He continued, however, his laudatory address, and when it was at last ended, and he paused exhausted alike in breath and brain, it was to take up my sword and return it to me with my parole, pronouncing me a free man, and advising me to let men continue to think me dead, and to withdraw from France. He cut short my half-protesting thanks, and calling the hostess bade her set another cover, whilst he invited me to share his supper. And as we ate he again urged upon me the advice that I should go abroad.

"For, by Heaven!" he added, "Mazarin has been as a raging beast since the news was brought him yesterday of his nephew's marriage."

"How!" I cried. "He has heard already?"

"He has indeed; and should he learn that your flesh still walks the earth, methinks it would go worse with you than it went even with Eugène de Canaples."

In answer to the questions with which I excitedly plied him, I drew from him the story of how Eugène had arrived the day before in Paris, and gone straight to the Palais Royal. M. de Montrésor had been on guard in the ante-chamber, and in virtue of an excitement noticeable in Canaples' bearing, coupled with the ill-odour wherein already he was held by Mazarin, the lieutenant's presence had been commanded in the Cardinal's closet during the interview, for his Eminence was never like to acquire fame for valour.

In his exultation of what had chanced, and at the manner in which Mazarin's castles in the air had been dashed to the ground, Canaples used little caution, or even discretion, in what he said. In fact, from what Montrésor told me, I gathered that the fool's eagerness to be the first to bear the tidings to Mazarin sprang from a rash desire to gloat over the Cardinal's discomfiture. He had told his story insolently, almost derisively, and Mazarin's fury, driven beyond bounds already by what he had heard, became a very tempest of passion 'neath the lash of Canaples' impertinences. And naturally enough that tempest had burst upon the only head available—Eugène de Canaples—and the Cardinal had answered his jibes with interest by calling upon Montrésor to arrest the fellow and bear him to the Bastille.

When the astonished and sobered Canaples had indignantly asked upon what charge he was being robbed of his liberty, the Cardinal had laughed at him, and answered with his never-failing axiom that "he who sings, pays."

"You sang lustily enough just now," His Eminence had added, "and you shall pay by lodging a while in a dungeon of the Bastille, where you may lift up your voice to sing the De Profundis."

"Was my name not mentioned?" I anxiously inquired when Montrésor had finished.

"Not once. You may depend that I should have remarked it. After I had taken Canaples away, the Cardinal, I am told, sat down, and, still trembling with rage, wrote a letter which he straightway dispatched to the Chevalier Armand de Canaples at Blois."

"No doubt," I mused, "he attributes much blame to me for what has come to pass."

"Not a doubt of it. This morning he said to me that it was a pity your wings had not been clipped before you left Paris, and that his misplaced clemency had helped to bring him great misfortunes. You see, therefore, M. de Luynes, that your sojourn in France will be attended with great peril. I advise you to try Spain. 'Tis a martial country, where a man of the sword may find honourable and even profitable employment."

His counsel I deemed sound. But how follow it? Then of a sudden I bethought me of Madame de Chevreuse's friendly letter. Doubtless she would assist me once again, and in such an extremity as this. And with the conception of the thought came the resolution to visit her on the morrow. That formed, I gave myself up to the task of drinking M. de Montrésor under the table with a freeness of heart which had not been mine for months. In each goblet that I drained methought I saw Yvonne's sweet face floating on the surface of the red Armagnac; it looked now sad, now reproachful, still I drank on, and in each cup I pledged her.

CHAPTER XX.
Of how the Chevalier de Canaples became a Frondeur.

It wanted an hour or so to noon next day as I drove across the Pont Neuf in a closed carriage and was borne down the Rue St. Dominique to the portals of that splendid palace facing the Jacobins which bears the title of the Hotel de Luynes, and over the portals of which is carved the escutcheon of our house.

Michelot, in obedience to the orders I had given him, got down, only to be informed that Madame la Duchesse was in the country. The lackey who was summoned did not know where the lady might be found, nor when she might return to Paris. And so I was compelled to drive back almost despairingly to the Rue St. Antoine, and there lie concealed, nursing my impatience, until my aunt should return.

Daily I sent Michelot to the Hotel de Luynes to make the same inquiry, and to return daily with the same dispiriting reply, that there was no news of Madame la Duchesse.

In this fashion some three weeks wore themselves out, during which period I lay in my concealment, a prey to weariness unutterable. I might not venture forth save at night unless I wore a mask, and as masks were no longer to be worn without attracting notice, as during the late king's reign, I dared not indulge the practice.

Certainly my ennui was greatly relieved by the visits of Montrésor, which grew very frequent, the lad appearing to have conceived a fondness for me; and during those three weeks our fellowship at nights over a bottle or two engendered naturally enough a friendship and an intimacy betwixt us.

I had written to Andrea on the morrow of my return to Paris, to tell him how kindly Montrésor had dealt with me, and some ten days later the following letter was brought me by the lieutenant, to whom, for safety, it had been forwarded:

"My very dear Gaston,

"I have no words wherewith to express my joy at the good news you send me, which terminates the anxiety that has been mine since you left us on the disastrous morning of our nuptials.

"The uncertainty touching your fate, the fear that the worst might have befallen you, and the realisation that I, for whom you have done so much, might do naught for you in your hour of need, has been the one cloud to mar the sunshine of my own bliss.

"That cloud your letter has dispelled, and the knowledge of your safety renders my happiness complete.

"The Chevalier maintains his unforgiving mood, as no doubt doth also my Lord Cardinal. But what to me are the frowns of either so that my lady smile? My little Geneviève is yet somewhat vexed in spirit at all this; but I am teaching her to have faith in Time, the patron saint of all lovers who follow not the course their parents set them. And so that Time may be allowed to intercede and appeal to the parent heart with the potent prayer of a daughter's absence, I shall take my lady from Chambord some three days hence. We shall travel by easy stages to Marseilles, and there take ship for Palermo.

"And so, dear, trusty friend, until we meet again fare you well, and may God hold you safe from the wickedness of man, devil, and my Lord Cardinal.

"For all that you have done for me no words of mine can thank you; but should you determine to quit this France of yours and journey to Palermo after me, you shall never want a roof to shelter you or a board to sit at so long as roof and board are owned by him who signs himself, in love at least, your brother,

"Andrea de Mancini."

WHY REMAIN TOO FAT?

You can be Permanently Cured!

Permanently? the reader will exclaim interrogatively. Yes, reader, permanently; that is the secret of the "Russell" treatment for the cure of corpulency. Yet it is not wholly a secret, for in "Corpulency and the Cure," the book which lies before us, Mr. F. C. Russell, the author of this remarkable work, and the founder of the still more remarkable treatment which bears his name, gives, coram populo, the RECIPE of the compound which forms the basis of his treatment. This compound, a liquid tonic pleasant to the palate is purely vegetable and perfectly harmless to the most delicate subject, as our stout readers may see for themselves if they care to procure a copy of the book by sending three penny stamps to Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., who will despatch the same by return post, under plain sealed envelope. The "Russell" system differs from other systems, not only by reason of its permanent reductive results, but because it entails no disagreeable restrictions, dietetic or otherwise—none but what any rational person anxious to disburden himself or herself of an excessive couche of subcutaneous fat would inevitably adopt. No violent exercise is necessary, nor is there any need for cathartics in any form. As to the semi-starvation methods that prevail, these are totally opposed to the "Russell" treatment, which, indeed, promotes appetite, and requires that the increased appetite shall be satisfied. This seems paradoxical, but is easily explained. The rapid elimination of the unwholesome fatty deposits from the system would be weakening under ordinary starvation methods, but the "Russell" treatment helps to give nourishment to the body, thus forming new blood and muscle, so that the strain upon the system is amply counteracted, and the whole organism restrengthened and revitalised.

Readers of "Corpulency and the Cure" will be very interested in the testimony of patients who have followed the "Russell" treatment. A section of the book contains a thousand extracts from letters written to him by Mr. Russell's grateful patients, and these expressions of opinion bear out to the full all the claims for his system advanced by the gifted author. We should say here that the reductive process begins within twenty-four hours of beginning the treatment, the decrease being (as the weighing machine will show) from ½lb. to 2lbs., even as much as 4lbs. in very extreme cases of fatness. This reduction is steadily maintained day by day until the required condition of slimness is reached, when the treatment may be abandoned. Let it be distinctly understood that the decrease is not merely abdominal, but manifests itself over the entire body, so that perfect and permanent symmetry and grace are attained. These facts are corroborated by the eloquent testimony alluded to above. We remark several extracts headed "One day test" (which might, with more lucidity, be called "First day test") in which the reduction brought about within the first twenty-four hours is stated to be the full 2lbs. There, stout friends, go you and do likewise! First of all, get the book.

With a sigh I set the letter down. A sigh of love and gratitude it was; a sigh also of regret for the bright, happy boy who had been the source alike of my recent joys and sorrows, and whom methought I was not like to see again for many a day, since the peaceful vegetation of his Sicilian home held little attraction for me, a man of action.

It was on the evening of the last Sunday in May, while the bell of the Jesuits, close by, was tinkling out its summons to vespers, that Montrésor burst suddenly into my room, with the request that I should get my hat and cloak and go with him to pay a visit. In reply to my questions, "Monseigneur's letter to Armand de Canaples," he said, "has borne fruit already. Come with me and you shall learn how."

He led me past the Bastille and up the Rue des Tournelles to the door of an unpretentious house, upon which he knocked. We were admitted by an old woman to whom Montrésor appeared to be known, for, after exchanging a word or two with her, he himself led the way upstairs, and opened the door of a room for me.

By the melancholy light of a single taper burning upon the table, I beheld a fair-sized room, containing a curtained bed.

My companion took up the candle, and stepping to the bedside he drew apart the curtains.

Lying there, I beheld a man whose countenance, despite its pallor and the blood-stained bandages about his brow, I recognised for that of the little spitfire Malpertuis.

As the light fell upon his face the little fellow opened his eyes, and upon beholding me at his side, he made a sudden movement which wrung from him a cry of pain.

"Lie still, Monsieur," said Montrésor quietly.

But for all the lieutenant's remonstrances, he struggled up into a sitting posture, requesting Montrésor to set the pillows at his back.

"Thank God you are here, M. de Luynes!" he said; "I learnt at Canaples that you were not dead."

"You have been to Canaples?"

"I was the guest of the Chevalier for twelve days. I arrived there on the day after your departure."

"You!" I ejaculated. "Pray what took you to Canaples?"

"What took me there?" he echoed, turning his feverish eyes upon me almost with fierceness. "The same motive that led me to join hands with that ruffian St. Auban when he spoke of waging war against Mancini; the same motive that led me to break with him when I saw through his plans, and when the abduction of Mademoiselle was on foot; the same motive that made me come to you and tell you of the proposed abduction so that you might interfere if you had the power, or cause others to do so, if you had not."

I lay back in my chair and stared at him. Was this, then, another suitor of Yvonne de Canaples, and were all men mad with love of her?

Presently he continued, "When I heard that St. Auban was in Paris, having apparently abandoned all hope in connection with Mademoiselle, I obtained a letter from M. de La Rochefoucauld, who is an intimate friend of mine, and armed with this I set out. As luck would have it, I got embroiled in the streets of Blois with a couple of cardinalist gentlemen who chose to be offended by a lampoon of the Fronde that I was humming. I am not a patient man, and I am even indiscreet in moments of choler. I ended by crying, 'Down with Mazarin and all his creatures,' and I would of a certainty have had my throat slit had not a slight and elegant gentleman interposed, and, exercising a wonderful influence over my assailants, extricated me from my predicament. This gentleman was the Chevalier de Canaples. He was, strangely enough, in a mood to be pleased by an anti-cardinalist ditty, for his rage against Andrea de Mancini, which he took no pains to conceal, had extended already to the Cardinal, and from morn till night he did little else but revile the whole Italian brood, as he chose to dub the Cardinal's family.

I had only been there three days before I sustained a shock by the unexpected appearance at Canaples of St. Auban. The Chevalier, however, refused him admittance, and, baffled, the Marquis was forced to withdraw. But he went no further than Blois, where he hired himself a room at the Lys de France. The Chevalier hated him as a mad dog hates water; almost as much as he hated you. He spoke often of you, and always bitterly."

Before I knew what I had said, "And Mademoiselle?" I burst out. "Did she ever mention my name?"

Malpertuis looked up quickly at the question, and a wan smile flickered round his lips.

"Once she spoke of you to me, pityingly, as one might speak of a dead man whose life had not been good."

"Yes, yes," I broke in. "It matters little. Your story, M. Malpertuis."

"After I had been at the Chateau ten days, we learnt that Eugène de Canaples had been sent to the Bastille. The news came in a letter penned by his Eminence himself—a bitter, viperish letter, with a covert threat in every line. The Chevalier's anger went white hot as he read the disappointed Cardinal's epistle. His Eminence accused Eugène of being a Frondeur: M. de Canaples, whose politics had grown sadly rusted in the country, asked me the meaning of the word. I explained to him the petty squabbles betwixt Court and Parliament, in consequence of the extortionate imposts, and of Mazarin's avariciousness. I avowed myself a partisan of the Fronde, and within three days the Chevalier, who but a little time before had sought an alliance with the Cardinal's family, had become as rabid a Frondeur as M. de Gondi, as fierce an anti-cardinalist as M. de Beaufort.

"I humoured him in his new madness, with the result that, ere long, from being a Frondeur in heart, he thirsted to become a Frondeur in deeds; and he ended by begging me to bear a letter from him to the Coadjutor of Paris, wherein he offered to place at M. de Gondi's disposal, towards the expenses of the civil war which he believed to be imminent, as indeed it is, the sum of sixty thousand livres.

"Now albeit I had gone to Canaples for purposes of my own, and not as an agent of M. le Coadjuteur, still for many reasons I saw fit to undertake the Chevalier's commission; and so, bearing the letter in question, which was hot and unguarded, and charged with endless treasonable matter, I set out four days later for Paris, arriving here yesterday.

"I little knew that I had been followed by St. Auban. His suspicions must have been awakened, I know not how, and clearly they were confirmed when I stopped before the Coadjutor's house last night. I was about to mount the steps, when of a sudden I was seized from behind by half-a-dozen hands, and dragged into a side street. I got free for a moment and attempted to defend myself, but besides St. Auban there were two others. They broke my sword, and attempted to break my skull, in which they went perilously near succeeding, as you see. Albeit half-swooning, I had yet sufficient consciousness left to realise that my pockets were being emptied, and that at last they had torn open my doublet and withdrawn the treasonable letter from the breast of it.

"I was left bleeding in the kennel, and there I lay for nigh upon an hour, until a passer-by succoured me, and carried out my request to be brought hither and put to bed."

He ceased, and for some moments there was silence broken only by the wounded man's laboured breathing, which argued that his narrative had left him fatigued. At last I sprang up.

"The Chevalier de Canaples must be warned," I exclaimed.

"'Tis an ugly business," muttered Montrésor. "I'll wager a hundred pistoles that Mazarin will hang the Chevalier if he catches him just now."

"He would not dare!" cried Malpertuis.

"Not dare!" echoed the lieutenant. "The man who imprisoned the Princes of Conde and Conti and the Duke of Beaufort not dare hang a provincial knight with never a friend at Court! Pah! Monsieur, you do not know Cardinal Mazarin."

I realised to the full how likely Montrésor's prophecy was to be fulfilled, and before I left Malpertuis I assured him that he had not poured his story into the ears of an indifferent listener, and that I would straightway find means of communicating with Canaples.

EASY WHEN UNDERSTOOD.

"In a country hotel, where I had stopped for supper," said a traveller, "I saw on the table some boiled eggs. As I reached for them the waitress said:

"'Do you like them hard or soft boiled?'

"'Soft,' I said.

"'The soft boiled are in the other dish,' said the waitress.

"Then, as I looked the other way on the table, I saw another dish of eggs. But they looked precisely like those in the first dish, and I wondered how anybody could tell them apart if they should ever get mixed up. As long as they were kept at the ends of the table where they were first placed it would be very simple, but suppose some polite guest should say to his neighbour:

"'Will you have the eggs?'

"And suppose the man should say 'Yes, thank you,' and take them, and suppose one dish in this way worked along the table until it was alongside the other; or, for that matter, suppose the dishes should change places, as they might easily do, who could tell then which were hard and which soft? I found myself rather amused by this idea, and I asked the waitress how they could tell which was which.

"'Why, the soft boiled are in the square dish and the hard boiled are in the oval dish.'

"Then I stopped talking for quite a while, for it seemed clear to me that I was, in some things, not an intellectual giant."

A SALVATIONIST'S REMARKABLE EXPERIENCE.

COLD CHILLS, DEBILITY, AND FAINTING FITS NEARLY ENDED HER DAYS.

MARVELLOUS BILE BEAN CURE.

"I began to have cold chills which ran through me as if cold water had been poured over my skin."

The speaker, Mrs. E. Sheldon, of 6 Bright Street, New Brighton, Morley, was telling a reporter the marvellous rescue from a serious illness by Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness.

"It is four or five years ago," continued Mrs. Sheldon (now the picture of health), "that I first became ill. I had these cold chills; and got so weak and languid that I could not do my work. My appetite fell off; and even when I got something tempting to make me eat I had no relish for it. Doctors gave me medicine, which, however, did not bring me round. Eventually I got a "recommend" for the Cookridge Hospital, and stayed there under special treatment for three weeks. At the end of that time I was a little better, but upon my return home I soon drifted back into my old state.

"Then, three years ago, I began to have fits. I was at the sink one day when I thought there was such a terrible noise outside I could not make it out, so I went to the door. Directly I opened it I was overcome by a death-like sensation. I shouted out, and then I remember no more till I found myself lying down in bed with my friends gathered round me. The "noise in the street" only existed in my own head; and I had fainted immediately I reached the door.

The doctor was fetched, and said it was owing to my age, but another who attended me later said it was colic. A third described it as an epileptic fit. I was very ill in bed for several days; and suffered intense agony from flatulence. My body was swollen to a shocking extent; and when I took food it only made my condition worse. The fits continued, and as a rule I had them every few weeks. They made me a helpless invalid and kept me to my bed for ten days at a time.

"A strange thing occurred to me about this time, I lost my memory; my hearing was also affected, and my sight. I had to wear glasses to thread an ordinary needle; and without them I could not read a paper. I appeared to get worse in general health, losing flesh until I seemed all skin and bone. My nerves became quite shattered, and so afraid was I of being overtaken by a fit that I never dared go out without a bottle of sal volatile, or some stimulant handy for emergency.

"I am a member of the Salvation Army, and when I went to the meeting I always felt more at ease when I had someone for company who knew where to find the stimulant, should I go off in a fit.

Early this year I had a slight attack of English Cholera; and I think that the consequent weakness brought on a very bad fit.

"I was weeks bad after that, and could scarcely remember or see anything. I was in this condition when I heard of a man at Rothwell—where we used to live—who had benefited by taking Chas. Forde's Bile Beans. I was anxious to try them; and I determined to go in for a course. My condition was too serious for me to observe any decided change at first; but I felt sure they would do me good if I persevered.

"I followed carefully all the directions, and at the end of ten days I was able to crawl down stairs. I persevered with the Beans and my strength seemed to come back to me. My appetite also returned, and I was soon able to take many things I dared not touch before. I still went on with the medicine until cured. I have now no longer the fear of the fits, and I have benefited in every possible way. I have increased in weight, have regained my sight, my memory, and my hearing. The strange noises in my head, the wind, dizziness, the weakness, and all the other distressing symptoms of my case have, after these long years, completely given place to health, strength, and renewed vitality. For this I have Chas. Forde's Bile Beans alone to thank, and I never tire of recommending them to my friends."

Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness may be obtained from any chemist, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co.'s Head English Depot, 119 and 120 London Wall, London, E.C., upon receipt of prices, 1/1½ or 2/9. (2/9 box contains 3 times 1/1½ size.) Bile Beans are sold only in sealed boxes, never loose.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, February 10th. Post-cards only, please.

Take it Now.

HOTEL WAITER: "Shall I take your order now, missy, or will you wait till your mamma comes in?" Little Girl: "I wish you'd take it now. Mamma never orders anything 'cept what's good for me."

How Nice for Hubby!

BRIDE (after return from honeymoon); "I see by this medical work that a man requires eight hours' sleep and a woman ten." Bridegroom: "Yes, I've read that somewhere myself." Bride: "How nice. You can get up every morning, and have the fire made and the breakfast ready before it is time for me to get up."

It Makes No Difference.

"I SUPPOSE you don't believe in courtship," said the paragraphist laughingly to the manager of the gas company. "Why not?" asked the manager. "Because lovers always turn the gas down, you know. Ha! ha! ha!" "Oh, that makes no difference," said the manager. "The meter gets in its work all the same."

Waiting for Each Other.

"GABRIEL," said the doctor's wife, "have you settled yet with Lawyer Sharp for conducting that case for you in court last year?" "No," said the doctor. "It was about that time, you remember, that I performed an operation on him, and I want to know what his bill is before I make out mine. I suppose he's waiting for the same reason."

An Ambitious Boy.

LITTLE BOY: "Papa, may I study elocution?" Proud Papa: "Indeed you may, my boy, if you wish. You desire to become a great orator, don't you?" "Yes, that's it." "And some day, perhaps, have your voice ringing through the halls of Westminster?" "I shouldn't care for that. I want to be an after-dinner speaker." "Ah, you are ambitious for social distinctions, then?" "No, I want the dinners."

One on the Landlady.

THE landlady was in a sentimental mood. "This is the anniversary of the death of my poor dear old Uncle John," she sighed. "He was a sea-captain and went down with his ship this day five and thirty years ago. I was only a child when he went away, but I remember he gave me a pet lamb as a parting gift." "And you've killed it at last!" said the star boarder reproachfully, picking up a piece of mutton on his fork and regarding it with mournful interest.

A Reasonable Conclusion.

LITTLE DOT: "Mamma is going to take me with her when she visits Aunt Jenny." Little Dick: "She goin' to take me, too." "Did she say so?" "No." "Then how do you know?" "She'll never leave me here with that cupboard full of jam."

Took it as an Insult.

A MANCHESTER firm that has recently introduced a typewriter into their correspondence department received a letter from an indignant customer the other day, saying: "I want you to understand that you needn't print letters sent to me. I can read writing—even yours—and I don't want to be insulted by reflections on my education."

A Check on the Post-Office.

AN old woman living near Pitlochry, N.B., drew her money out of the post-office savings-bank the other day. Having been paid the sum standing in her name, she took it to the corner of the post-office, laboriously counted it several times, and then, returning to the counter, handed if back again, saying: "Take it, mon, and go on keeping it. I only wanted to see if it was a'richt."

The Merchant's Test.

A PARISIAN merchant, who has been several times robbed by unfaithful cashiers, has invented an infallible test of competency. The cashier presents himself, offers his services, shows his references. Then the merchant says: "Show me how you could erase a mistake in your figures." The aspiring cashier sets to work with scraper, ink-eraser, and what not, and, if he succeeds in destroying all trace of the erasure, he is invited to take his hat and leave.

He Wanted it Repeated.

TEACHER: "Boys, I would like to impress upon your young minds the necessity of forgiving and forgetting. Forgive the injury your companions may have done you, and forget the feelings of revenge that have filled your hearts." Small Boy (whispering to teacher): "Teacher, won't you please say that over again? Jimmie Pease says he's going to wollop me within an inch of my life after school, and I want him to forget all about it, 'cos he's too big for me."

A Talented House Agent.

MRS. HOMESEEKER: "You certainly don't expect anybody to take this house? Why, the floors all run down-hill." Agent (a smart man): "It was built in that way on purpose, mum, to keep peace in the family. Greatest invention of the age, mum." Mrs. Homeseeker: "Keep peace in the family? What do you mean?" Agent: "It's all right, mum—nothing like it. Whenever your husband drops his collar-studs they'll roll down to that wall, and he'll always know where to find 'em."

"TATCHO"

THE GREAT HAIR RENEWER.

WHAT PEOPLE THEMSELVES ARE SAYING:

"A PEARL BEYOND PRICE."—35 Aberdeen Road, Cotham, Bristol. December 23rd, 1901. Mrs. E. C. Parsons regards "Tatcho" as a pearl beyond price. In her opinion everybody desiring to cultivate, improve, or retain a good head of hair should try it.

"3 SEPARATE HAIRDRESSERS."—Rostherne, St. Stephen's Road, Bournemouth, November 30th, 1901. Mrs. Lloyd wants to give three bottles of "Tatcho" to some friends here, as a lady in the house is strongly recommending it, and says that three separate hairdressers tell her what a wonderful growth of new hair she has.

"A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY."—Lyss Place, Liss, Hants, November 30th, 1901. I find "Tatcho" almost excellent and pleasing application for the hair; in fact, a wonderful discovery which ought to be very widely known.—H. PELHAM PAPILLON.

CUT THIS OUT AND POST TO-DAY. If your Local Chemist or Store is unable to supply the large Trial Bottle. THIS COUPON ENTITLES THE SENDER TO A LARGE TRIAL BOTTLE SIZE FOR 4/6 1/10 Direct from the "Tatcho" Depot, Carr. Paid.

S.S. ..... 1902.

In making this unique offer the Company is acting with the knowledge that such distribution of large Trial Bottles is making the preparation even more widely known, and is introducing it to every home in a more satisfactory manner than could be effected by any other system of advertising.

"TATCHO" is a brilliant, spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease.
"TATCHO" is not a dye, and contains no colouring matter or any harmful ingredient.
"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world in bottles at 1s., 2s. 9d., and 5s.

Conducted by MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.—MADGE MORRIS.]

A brave little girl is "Elsie." She is only thirteen years old, and yet looks after the house for her father, and has entire charge of three little children. She writes to ask me what she can do to prevent the little boy from tearing his clothes, and falling down in the mud. Never mind the mud, "Elsie," one day's dirt never did a child any harm. Little legs are apt to be unsteady at four years old, and boys will be boys. Certainly you are old enough to be one of my friends.

"Grannie" writes to say that she would like to know of a seaside place which will suit her daughter, who has a delicate chest. She is fond of a certain amount of gaiety, and does not care about going abroad?——The best I know of, "Grannie," is Bournemouth. It is on the south coast, and the air and the smell of the pine trees are especially good for the chest. There is always plenty going on in the Winter Gardens and elsewhere. Thank you for your cheery letter and good wishes.

"A Girl Wife" asks what is the reason that she feels so awkward and ill at ease whenever her husband brings any friends of his into tea or supper. She feels ready to cry, and, for the life of her cannot think of anything to say, and it vexes her husband more than a little. It is a very common type of nervousness, "Girl Wife."——Try and think less about your feelings, and remember that you, as hostess, should be the one to try and put your visitors at their ease. In time you will get over it, and forget that you ever were so shy.

"Sailor's Lass" is in doubt as to which of two men she should keep company with: the sailor lad who is short-tempered, or the country lad who is reckless. The sailor lad has been keeping company with her for seven months, and last week the other came to see if she would keep company with him. His companions give him a bad name, so she does not know what to do.——From the tone of your letter, "Sailor's Lass," I should say the sailor is the one you love the better, and if so, I should stick to him. Tell the country lad that he must not keep coming to see you, as you are keeping company with the sailor.

"Darby and Joan" write me a joint letter and this is what they say: "We are the happiest couple alive, and yet both of us are dreading the hour when one shall be called to rest and so leave the other alone! We are eighty-three years old."——I quite understand your feeling anxious, "Darby and Joan," but you say you are the happiest couple alive, and surely this is something to be very thankful for. When the call comes, I am sure the one left will have hope and faith enough to feel that the other is waiting with hands outstretched in welcome. So try and forget all but this! Life is so short that it should be happy, and if possible free from care.

"Daisy Bell" asks me what I must confess is a very silly question. "I love a young man deeply," she says, "but I have only seen him once. He is tall and dark, and has a lovely drooping moustache. How can I get to know him, and is he the man I shall marry?" Now, "Daisy Bell," how do you suppose I should know whom you are going to marry? As to "loving a man deeply" whom you have only seen once, that is utter nonsense. Fifteen is far too young for you to be thinking about love at all, so forget all about him, and in years to came you may meet with some man who will take a fancy to you and make you happy.

"F. H. T." says: "I have two girls, one in England and one in America; the one in England is very jealous even if I kiss her married sister, and I have had a quarrel with her. The American never quarrels with me, is not jealous, and loves me more. Which one shall I be engaged to?"——From what you tell me, "F. H. T.," I should certainly advise you to get engaged to the American girl, but, at the same time, remember to be jealous shows that the English girl loves you too. America is a long way off, but a girl who is not jealous is seldom met with, so I think you would be happiest if engaged to her. Jealousy is the ruin of many a happy home.

"Mrs. X.," a lady who has never touched an intoxicant, hears that Mrs. Z has told a certain person that she drinks. How can this slander be refuted?——Get the person to whom the untruth was told to invite the slanderer to his or her house on a certain day. Arrange to call in yourself at the same time. In a tactful way tell the other lady that you have heard that a certain statement has been circulated about you, and ask on what authority. If the thing is pure invention, then you will have brought her to book in a more effectual way than by unpleasant legal measures. If the lady in question is clearly proved to have been malicious, then you are justified in terminating the acquaintance.

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium, Nos. 37—42," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, February 17th, 1902.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 13st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weigh was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since Send me a box for my mother."

EDWARD FARRELL CHEMIST

By Philip Moon.

I.—THE WALLINGTON SUCCESSION.

EDWARD FARRELL drew his chair a little nearer to the bench upon which stood the beaker, the boiling contents of which he was watching.

His laboratory was a fairly large one, and was equipped in the most complete manner.

The shelves were crowded with chemicals and unguents, and on every hand were to be seen the most up-to-date apparatus and instruments.

It was a laboratory that must have filled less favoured scientists with envy, and Edward Farrell was its king—and he, the king, loved and worshipped his little kingdom.

One might almost say of Farrell that he was a chemist first, and a man after—almost, but not quite.

Now Farrell was not old or grey, neither had he the scholarly stoop one is so apt to associate with wide learning.

Yet his was a name known and honoured among scientists—a name that carried its own patent of nobility to those who were most advanced in the intellectual life of the century.

He was to the casual observer just a good average specimen of our best British manhood—well-built, muscular, and pleasant.

To those, however, who cared to observe him more closely, the steady blue eyes, the fine mouth, and the fine development of forehead told of a man of keen insight, of noble purpose, and of indomitable will.

He was about thirty years of age, and from his childhood had always been passionately fond of science. He had studied under Bunsen and Haffman in Germany, and when two years previously he had become heir to a fine fortune, he had established his present laboratory in the West-end of London. Nothing that money could buy was wanting, and with this splendid equipment at his disposal, he conducted his researches and took a keen interest in any outside practice that seemed likely to yield him interest or experience.

Farrell rose and gave the contents of the beaker he was watching a swirl, held it to the light and examined it critically, and then, with a sigh of comfortable satisfaction, as he listened to the storm without, sank back into his chair.

It was indeed a wild night. The wind howled and raged among the chimneys as though it were paying off some old and cherished score, while the rain pattered in strong gusts against the windows, and made Farrell thankful that he was well out of its reach.

"At any rate," he said, "I shall get a little quiet work this evening, for no one will bother me such a wretched night as this."

Almost as soon as the unconsciously spoken words had left his lips, however, a jingle of a hansom was heard in the street below, and a minute later, Mrs. Cook, his housekeeper, knocked at the laboratory door, and announced "Mr. Varley," a tall, good-looking young fellow of about twenty-five, who followed her closely up the stairs.

"Well, Farrell, old fellow! I am glad to find you in," the newcomer said, in a tone of unmistakable relief. "Can you spare me half-an-hour or so now, and—well, after that we'll see."

Farrell glanced reluctantly at his beaker.

"It's rather hard lines," he laughingly said, "just as I had been congratulating myself on the fine evening's work I was going to do. However," as he saw the anxious look on the other's face, "I suppose I must humour you. There you are! Out goes the gas, and now let us adjourn to the 'den' and have a smoke."

"Well!" said Farrell, when they were comfortably seated in the cosy sitting-room he called his "den," "Now let's listen to your tale of woe."

Fred Varley sat thinking for a minute, then he said:

"Of course you have heard of the Wallington succession?"

"Yes. A most lamentable affair," answered Farrell; "and by-the-way, they were close relatives of yours, how stupid of me to forget—that is why you are looking so worried. My dear fellow, I am awfully sorry for you!"

"Well, Farrell, to tell you the truth, it is about this unhappy business I have come to speak to you. Two months ago my uncle, Sir Edward Wallington, was as hale and hearty as either you or I at the present moment.

"Full of vigour, taking a keen interest in all around him, possessed of a splendid estate, and an unimpaired fortune, one could safely have predicted that he had the best of his life before him.

"Yet within three weeks comes a startlingly rapid, and quite unaccountable breakdown in his health, and he suddenly dies—as the doctors all agree—of heart disease.

"It seems so unaccountable, because, to my certain knowledge, he had never in his life before had the slightest indication of any heart trouble.

"This, however, would not in itself have seemed so strange but for what followed.

"My cousin, Captain Wallington, my uncle's next of kin, went down to Wallington Hall to settle my uncle's affairs and take possession of his heritage; and now he, too, is dead, and the same strange breakdown and failure of the heart that carried off my uncle have been the cause of his death.

"I am next in the succession, and now heir to the estate. I suppose I ought to consider myself a fortunate man, yet I can assure you, Farrell, when I received the letter from the solicitors asking me to go down and take possession, it was like receiving my death warrant.

"I am not a superstitious man, and yet I would give much to find a decent excuse to keep away.

"It may be very silly, and probably is nothing but fancy; yet there the fact remains. However, I don't intend to shirk my duty, much as I should like to do so.

"I intend to face the music; and the long and the short of the whole matter is—I want you to go with me!

"You know, Farrell," young Varley continued appealingly, "you used to be my 'guardian angel in trousers' at school, and you surely cannot find it in your heart to refuse me now—even if you would?"

Farrell had been looking thoughtfully into the fire during the whole of Varley's recital, and now appeared to rouse himself with an effort from the train of thought into which he had fallen.

"Tell me, Varley—did you see your uncle and cousin after they were dead?" he said, apparently ignoring Varley's last appeal.

"Yes."

"Well, did you notice anything at all striking about them. I mean beyond what you would expect to see in a dead body?"

"No, I can't say that I did. You see I have seen so few dead bodies that I can hardly judge. Their eyes looked rather prominent, I thought, and rather dark—although not very noticeably so—and even that may be my fancy, for I did not look closely at them—or at anything else, for the matter of that," and Varley shuddered.

"Did they both die at Wallington Hall?"

"Yes. In the same room, I think."

"Ha! Who succeeds you if you die without issue?"

"The estate reverts to a distant branch of the family represented now by my cousin—Dr. Elyss."

"Did he attend your uncle or cousin professionally?"

"No. He was only called in to consult when death seemed inevitable. He lives at Banford, a few miles from Wallington, and troubles very little about a 'practice,' for he has a very decent fortune I believe. In fact, he spends as much of his time at the Hall as anywhere. But, hang it all, old fellow, why all this cross-questioning—you haven't answered me yet. Say you'll come, and then you'll see things for yourself."

"Just a little patience and one more question, my impetuous young man, and then I have done. Has your cousin, Dr. Elyss, ever been in India?"

"Yes. He took a fancy to go to Bombay to study the plague, and then wandered up country for some time before returning home; but will you come, Farrell? For goodness' sake don't sit there calmly asking questions, when I am just burning with impatience. Now will you come?"

Surely there was a tone of suppressed excitement in Farrell's voice as he answered his friend. Yet Farrell was not easily moved.

"Yes, Varley, I'll come, with all my heart; only don't mention your suspicions to anyone—all depends on that."

"Then you think there has been foul play, Farrell?" cried Varley excitedly. "Tell me! What do you think it was—whom do you suspect?"

"All in good time," replied Farrell quietly. "I can say nothing yet, for I know nothing. Now just listen to me, and when I have had my say, I should be greatly obliged if you would 'clear out' and leave me to my thoughts. All right — no thanks — but just listen. You may expect me at Wallington three days after you arrive—that will be Thursday. Meet me at the station yourself, and only speak of me as a casual friend.

"Remember, don't mention your suspicions to anyone—more depends on that than anything; have my room next to yours if you can, and in the meantime keep you eyes open and your mouth shut. And now, my dear fellow—good-bye!"

As the jingle of Varley's cab was lost in the driving storm without, Farrell took an old ragged book tenderly from his bookcase. Then he sat quietly reading and musing before the fire, but there was a terribly grim look upon his face.

* * * * *

"Thank Heaven, you've come, Farrell!" said Varley, as they climbed up into the trap and went bowling along towards Wallington Hall.

It was Thursday. Varley looked white and shaken; and when Farrell saw him, his lips tightened and the stern look in his eyes deepened.

Varley broke the silence again.

"The place is bewitched, Farrell, I tell you. Last night I woke as from a nightmare, gasping for breath, with beads of perspiration on my brow, and a horrible frightened feeling all over me.

"There was no one in the room, I'll swear, for I had carefully locked the door, and yet there was that awful uncanny feeling all around. I was like a ghost when I looked into the glass this morning, and I've been on the shake ever since.

"Every one tells me how queer I look; and Elyss even laughingly threatens to send round old Doctor Jones to see me.

"It's terrible, Farrell. I feel just an arrant coward. The place is bewitched, or haunted, or something!" and the poor fellow looked up piteously at the scientist seated beside him.

Farrell was moved, but he only said:

"Have you arranged the bedrooms as I asked, Varley?"

"Yes," answered he, "yours is opposite mine, and our two are the only ones occupied on that floor just now. The servants are in another wing; young Stanley, who is staying with us, and Doctor Elyss are sleeping under us, so that we are quite alone. I wish that you would turn in with me to-night, though, Farrell. I am as nervous as a kitten?"

He tried to carry off his request with a laugh, but failed miserably.

"I fully intend to be with you, Varley," answered Farrell, "only no one must know it. Leave your door unlocked, and half-an-hour afterwards I will join you. Don't undress, but lie down as you are and wait for me.

"Then I think—— What! is that the Hall? What a fine place—and that is young Stanley and Doctor Elyss, is it? Well, you can climb down and introduce me. How do you do, Doctor Elyss? Pleased to meet you. What do you say, Varley? I shall be late for dinner if I stand chattering here? What an unpardonable offence! Excuse me, gentlemen, I must run off and dress, or else I shall incur your everlasting displeasure."

What a change had come over him! Could this laughing, breezy, jovial society man be the same grim-looking, serious Edward Farrell of two minutes before!

Yet, throughout the evening it was the same. He was the life and soul of the party; and when they retired for the night young Stanley mentally decided that "he was a jolly decent fellow, don't you know!" Even Elyss remarked to Varley that Farrell wasn't half a bad sort, only 'there was a good deal of ffoth' about him."

Varley himself was filled with astonishment, and as he closed his room door, he wondered how much help he was to expect from such a light-hearted and frivolous individual as Farrell. Yet he carried out Farrell's instructions to the letter, and after what seemed a dozen hours to the anxious watcher, the door of the room crept slowly open, and Farrell entered. He had a small, partially-shaded bull's-eye lantern in one hand, and what appeared to be a gladstone bag in the other.

He whispered quietly across the darkness of the room to Varley, and told him to sit still on the bed—made sure that the blinds were closely drawn, locked the door, and then commenced quietly and cautiously to unpack his bag by the dim light of the lantern.

Varley watched all his movements with speechless wonder. What could it all mean? but his first whispered inquiry was met by a stern, low "Hush!" from Farrell.

Farrell first took from the bag two cases with back straps, that looked in the flickering darkness for all the world like the wallets worn by tourists, only from the top came a small flexible tube ending in a funnel-shaped mouthpiece.

One he fastened deftly on his own back, and the other on Varley's.

"When I give you the signal," he whispered, "fasten the funnel over your mouth with this india-rubber band and draw your breath through the apparatus."

Next he took from the bag a packet of white blotting-paper strips and a bottle containing some solution.

He carefully soaked each strip in the solution and then commenced to hang them about the room.

One he pinned just above the key-hole, another on the hangings at the head of the bed, another on the curtains, four on the floor at different places, and yet another near the ceiling.

This finished, he looked at his watch, it wanted ten minutes to two; he darkened his lantern and softly crept to the bed and sat down in the darkness at Varley's side.

Varley sat still on the bed.

Varley shuddered as the light disappeared. What were they to expect? How black and creepy the darkness seemed!

What did all this mysterious preparation mean? What were they waiting for?

He could have shrieked aloud.

The long minutes crept by and no sound save their own breathing broke the deadly stillness of the night.

Then somewhere a distant clock struck two.

Farrell turned up his lantern and crept round the room. He threw a pencil of light on every strip in turn; but whatever he expected to find, he was apparently disappointed, for he darkened his light again, and again crept noiselessly to Varley's side.

To Varley the next ten minutes seemed like so many hours. Would nothing happen? Anything rather than such intolerable suspense.

Once, from somewhere in the house, came an unmistakable "click," then all was silent once more.

Again, after a further pause, Farrell crept round to his strips.

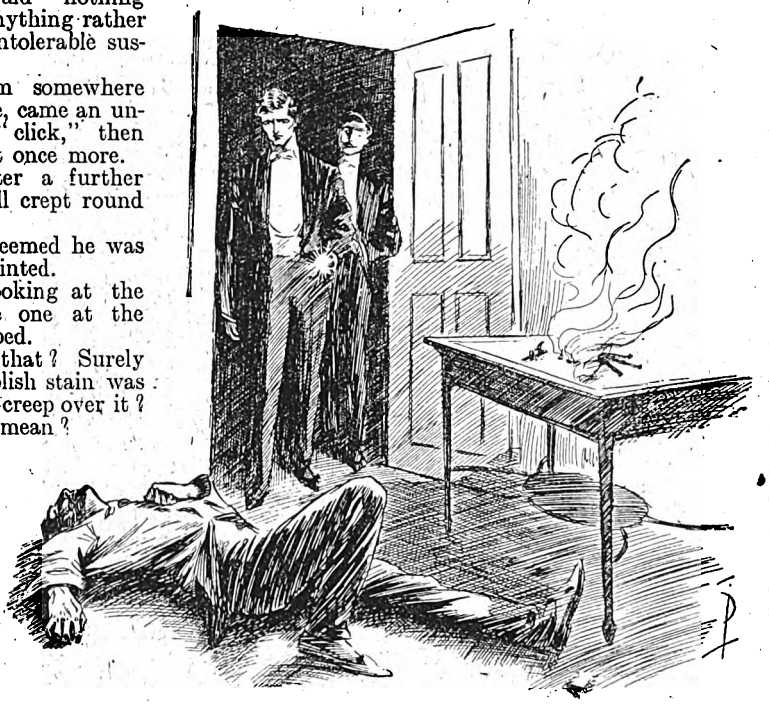
Again it seemed he was to be disappointed.

He was looking at the last one—the one at the head of the bed.

What was that? Surely a faint, purplish stain was beginning to creep over it? What can it mean?

The effect on Farrell was electric: his eyes sparkled, he looked an enthusiast.

"Quick, Varley!" he whispered, "on with your respirator!" and he himself set the example by fastening his funnel over his mouth.



On the ground at the side of the table lay the figure of a man.

Then with a penknife he quickly, but still with caution, cut down the curtain and revealed the wall behind. As the beam of light flashed over its surface—low down, near the pillow—it lit on what looked like a piece of old lead gas-piping projecting about an eighth of an inch from the wall.

Farrell put his hand before it; then seized Varley's and held it there too.

What could it mean? A slow stream of gas or vapour of some sort was issuing from it. Surely there was no gas in that old country house.

Besides, it was distinctly warm.

Varley looked questioningly to Farrell, but he had darted across the dark room to his bag.

He returned with a tiny rubber stopper in his hand, and quickly jammed it into the pipe.

His face was stern—suppressed excitement gleamed from his eyes—and as the dim reflected light of the lantern shone on him, he looked a weird and terrible figure.

He held the stopper tightly in the tube and was listening intently. How their hearts beat! How dark and silent everything seemed! What was happening? Why did Farrell look so anxious?

The seconds crept by—ten—twelve—how they dragged. Hark! What was that?

Downstairs somewhere there was a sharp "pop," like the opening of a ginger-beer bottle. Then a most unearthly shriek of agony rang out through the silent house and died away in a gasping wail.

Then a low thud; and after there was a silence which was as dead as of the grave.

Farrell seemed to have been expecting something of the sort, for he now left the pipe, rushed to the window and opened it wide.

"Downstairs after me, Varley, as fast as you can!" he said, removing the funnel from his mouth for a moment, "and be sure and use your respirator!"

Out into the corridor they rushed, and down the stairs.

Varley's heart was in his mouth, for he knew not what dread thing to expect.

Farrell was as cool and firm as if he were in his own loved laboratory, but then he knew and knowledge drives away fear.

From under one of the doors on the next landing a lurid light showed.

Farrell tried the door, It was locked. He seemed to expect as much, and stepping back a pace or two, he crashed it open with his shoulder.

As the door swung backwards a scene was revealed that Varley will remember to his dying day.

On a writing-table at the side of the room the fragments of a broken flask were lying; a spirit lamp, burning under the tripod that had supported the flask, had set fire to its spilt contents, and these in turn had fired the table cover.

From the broken neck of the flask a tube ran to the wall and disappeared near the ceiling.

On the ground at the side of the table lay the figure of a man dressed in pyjamas; blood was streaming from his face, but it was nevertheless easily recognisable—it was the face of Doctor Elyss.

Farrell sprang to the table and smothered the flames; flung the window wide open; and then came and carefully examined the senseless man.

After a brief examination he arose, removed his respirator, and said:

"I don't think he'll cheat the gallows after all, Varley.

You can take off your funnel now, the room is pretty well clear. You, Stanley"—for that youth had just appeared at the door with white face and quaking limbs—"you can send one of the servants for the police, and also the gardener to watch this fellow, when he comes to.

"Now what do you say to a smoke, Varley, till the inspector comes?"

* * * * *

"How do I explain it all? Easy enough! Your cousin and uncle each died very suspiciously. The symptoms were exactly those of an obscure Eastern poison, known, I suppose, to less than half-a-dozen people in Europe.

"The action of the poison it is quite impossible to detect, and the death of the victim appears quite natural to the unknowing medico.

"It is extremely volatile, and, as in your uncle's and cousin's cases, its action was spread over at least a fortnight—the only available time for its application seemed to be the night—and then only in diluted doses.

"What more easy than to project its vapour into the air of the sleeping chamber?

"Furthermore, the only country where the poison is more widely known is India.

"Hence my suspicions crystallised round Elyss. Once on the trail, it was easy to follow it up. Judicious inquiries revealed the fact that all Elyss' fortune had been lost by rash speculation, and he must have been well-night desperate.

"The rest you know. The respirators were filled with chemicals to purify our air so that we were not overcome by the poison before we could locate its inlet. The prepared test slips helped us to do that. Then when I stopped the tube the pressure accumulated in the thin flask in the murderer's room, and eventually burst in his face—overpowering and betraying him.

Couldn't Take it Back.

Proprietor: "What are you taking back there?" Waiter: "Customer sent this beefsteak back. Says he couldn't cut it." Proprietor (examining it): "Take it back to him and tell him he'll have to pay for it. We can never use it again; he has bent it out of shape."

That Altered It.

Doctor: "Yes; the symptoms are very serious. You must go to bed at once, and I will call and see you twice a day." Patient: "In that case it's lucky I joined the club last week." Doctor: "A club case! Good gracious! Why didn't you say so? Take a pennyworth of Epsom salts; you'll be all right to-morrow."

A New Metal-Polish.

The other day a lady discovered her servant girl trying to clean the fender with a copy of Short Stories. "Bridget!" exclaimed the astonished lady, "whatever are you doing with my paper? You know I only bought it this morning." "Oh!" replied Bridget, "you said that it always brightened you up, and so I am trying it on the fender."

He Didn't Pay.

An old Scotsman, not feeling well, called upon a doctor. The doctor gave him some verbal instructions as to how to regulate his diet, advising him among other things, to drink no spirits for a time. The Scotsman rose to leave, when the doctor said: "I am in the way of charging for my advice. I will trouble you for half-a-crown." "Oh, maybe," said the patient, "but I'm no gaun to tak' yer advice!"

An Army Contract.

Passing along Princes Street, Edinburgh, one day a herculean Scots Grey stopped at the post-office, and called on a street arab to polish his boots. The feet of the drag on were in proportion to his height, and looking at the tremendous boots before him, the arab knelt down on the pavement, and shouted out to his chum across the roadway: "Jamie, come ower an' gie's hand; I've got an army contract."

After the Opera.

Excited Auditor: "I declare, I never saw such wretchedly bad taste—such a scandalous violation of the dramatic unities—such an outrage on all sense of propriety!" Friend: "What's the matter, old man? Some of 'em been gagging again?" Excited Auditor: "Gagging isn't a circumstance to it. The opera was William Tell—a grand thing, you know—and just as the curtain rose on the scene displaying the hat of the tyrant Gesler on a pole, to which the hero refuses to bow, what does that wretched orchestra do but strike up 'Where did you get that hat?' Destroyed all the romantic illusion of the piece. Soulless brutes!"

The Worst Kind of Bargain.

A theatrical manager told a story against himself the other day. An actor came to him and applied for an engagement. There did not seem to be much need of him, but his demands in the way of salary were very modest, and the manager said to him: "Well, you may consider yourself engaged. I fancy I can find something for you to do." The newly-engaged man looked at the manager questioningly. "How about a contract," he asked. "Oh, never mind a contract. We'll have a verbal contract." There was a look of mild reproach in the eyes of the man as he answered sorrowfully: "Sir, the last time I made a verbal contract I drew a verbal salary."

A Whistling Girl.

They carried him in from the surgeon's room and laid him on the narrow little bed that the nurse had made ready. Her eyes were wide, and her face was pale to the lips, but her step was steady and her manner calm as they withdrew and left her alone with him. A suppressed sob shook her frame as she lightly touched the bandages over his eyes, those honest grey eyes in which she had read nothing but loyalty and devotion. But Annie Morton was a trained nurse, and she forced down the rising tide of emotion and sat beside her patient, quietly waiting for him to regain consciousness. When he stirred, her hand was on his breast in an instant holding him steady.

"Only the nurse," she said, in a low even tone. "You are to remain perfectly quiet."

The meaning of her words came to him slowly as the effect of the anæsthetic wore off.

"Nurse," he suddenly asked, "why are my eyes bandaged?"

"They have been injured," she explained, "but we think not seriously. The only way to be sure that we shall save your sight is to keep the eyes bandaged for a time."

Her quiet manner subdued him, and he was silent, but only for a moment.

"Tell me first," he said, "have you seen my brother, Jim Curtis?"

A shudder ran through the girl. Yes, she had seen him stretched out in eternal quiet.

"All is well with him," she answered; "but you must be quiet now."

"He didn't see me until the last minute," went on the man, "and I had thought that he was a thousand miles away. We were fighting our way across the clearing when I saw a big fellow strike at a man just ahead of me. The man turned to parry the blow and I saw his face. It was Jim! I remember throwing myself between the fellow and my brother, but after that I don't remember anything."

"I know," she said. "A shell burst almost in front of your face. It was Captain Jim Curtis who led the men across that clearing. It was reckless work——"

"Yes, but that's Jim, though," said the man. "Why, he'd dare anything. How proud she'll be to hear of his courage in this affair! Nurse, couldn't he come in to see me?"

"No, not under any circumstances," was the decided answer. "You've talked too much now——"

"I'll be quiet, nurse, but won't you ask him to give me a whistle as he passes by? He has the prettiest whistle in the world. It's like a flute. Wait till you hear it!"

A swift rush of tears blinded the nurse. She was only a woman, and it meant much to her that the playmate of her childhood's days was even then being carried away to lie for ever silent in a soldier's grave.

"Ask him to whistle just once. He'll surely come to ask about me."

"I'll see about it," she answered at length, "if you think it will not excite you too much."

"Oh, nurse"—the big man's voice had grown tremulous—"I haven't heard that whistle for five years! You'd know what he is to me if you knew what I've given up for him."

The nurse caught her breath. "We'll see about it to-night when I go to make my report," she said. "Rest now, so that the report may be a good one."

The man obeyed. It was some time before he spoke again.

"I don't know why you should remind me of her," he said. "You're such a little, soft-voiced thing, and Annie is a big country girl, with a voice that makes the room ring when she laughs or sings. She does both, bless her! She can whistle, too, as well as any fellow I ever knew. Jim taught her, and I used to tease her about being a whistling girl."

A sad little smile passed over the face of the tall nurse as she bent above him to arrange the pillows.

"I must leave you now to make my report," she said. "Be very quiet, and I will not forget your message."

The man lay still, wondering how long the darkness would last. He felt lost, lying there alone, but suddenly through the stillness there came a clear high whistle, another and then a succession of bird calls. The man lay tingling with delight at the sounds.

"Jim!" he whispered. "God bless you, lad! Thank Heaven that I was with you in time!".

When the nurse came in again, she found him tranquilly smiling.

"He did whistle, nurse, the same merry old whistle. Couldn't you ask him for me how Annie is? Only that."

"I can't ask him anything," replied the girl, with forced calmness. "I shall not see him again."

The man sighed.

"Well, I won't trouble you, nurse. I'd like to know how she is, though. There isn't another woman in all the world like our whistling girl."

The nurse did not dare to speak.

"You're a stranger to me, nurse," he went on, "and yet I can't help telling you all about it. She lived near us all her life, but it wasn't till Jim came to me with his hopes that I realised what she was to me. I never told her. I could see that she and Jim were made for each other, but I couldn't stay there and tamely wait for the end. I——"

The man was trembling from head to foot, but the nurse had sunk down beside the bed and buried her face in the covers.

"I went away," he resumed, "and I haven't heard a word from them since. I hope she's happy. I'd like to ask Jim why he's here and not with her. But she has spirit and courage. She's not the one to bid him stay idle at home in these times. Nurse, was that a tear on my hand? There—I didn't make you cry, did I?"

The nurse choked back the tears and replied in her habitual half-voice:

"It was the lotion that I used for your bandages. No more talking to-night, please."

"No more, nurse; but you know now why I wished to hear Jim's whistle. To hear him is to know that he is safe and that no sorrow will come to Annie."

The whistle floated up to him each morning and evening at the hour that the nurse went to report.

The old airs that were familiar about his far-away home came to the patient listening in the darkened room. He grew stronger as the days went by, and the nurse watched him with dreamy happiness.

She had been away from him one morning, and when she returned she met the doctor at the door. He was talking with a friend, and as she stepped past him the words rang clearly into the quiet room.

"To replace Captain Jim Curtis, who was killed in that skirmish on the 18th."

"Who—was—what?" The patient had started up in bed, his face white with horror. The nurse sprang to him. He fell back as she reached him. He stiffened in her arms, and the blackness of despair settled down upon the heart and the hopes of the whistling girl.

The doctor's abrupt commands roused her. She was the nurse again, not the stricken woman. Together they worked to bring the patient back out of the shadow, and presently she was alone with him again.

"Nurse," he said, with a sob in his voice, "I suppose I must have been dreaming or may not be quite sane, but I'll swear I heard that whistle. It was Jim's signal, I know. But Jim is dead! Oh, Annie!"

The nurse was down on her knees beside him. Her strong, soft hands held him; her voice was steady and sweet.

"Listen, dear," she said. "Annie is—Annie is here! You couldn't know me while your eyes were bound, but, dear, you were more blind before. It was never Jim; it never could be. It was you then; it is you now. Oh, my love, you have lost much, but will you not be brave for my sake, for the sake of a day that may be?"

A light of understanding settled slowly upon his changing face. His hands closed tightly upon hers.

"Annie," he whispered, "is it a dream?"

The nurse laughed in spite of the tears that would flow.

"Oh, doubting one," she said, "how could this be a dream?" And light as an elf's caress, he felt her kiss upon his lips.

C. A. Canty.

The Happy Ending.

"And so, Mr. Mortimer, divested of all its flowery compliments, your letter means that you're not going to accept my story, does it?" observed Muriel Elliott reproachfully.

The editor of the Empire Magazine fidgeted uneasily in his chair.

"My dear Miss Elliott," he commenced hesitatingly, "I'm really very sorry indeed, but—er——"

"Yes, I've no doubt you are," was the answer. "Still, you're not half so sorry as I am. Ah, Mr. Mortimer!" she went on in a different voice; "after all you'd said about wanting to help me, I did count on your accepting my story. I wish you'd tell me why you're declining it, though. Don't you like it?"

"Oh, yes! I like it very much indeed," returned the other hastily, seizing, as it appeared to him, the chance of appeasing his visitor's anger.

"You like it very much indeed?" she echoed wonderingly. "Then, Mr. Mortimer, why on earth did you send it back again? Surely you are the editor of the Empire Magazine?"

"Now, look here, my young friend," he went on, taking up a manuscript from the pile of papers before him, "this is your story. You call it, I see, 'The Love that Lasts.' Now, that's not the very best title imaginable. Still, that scarcely matters; it's the treatment of your plot that I object to. You've worked it out in such a depressingly sad manner that it's quite useless for our pages. Readers of the Empire insist on having only lightness and brightness, or, at any rate, in all the stories having at least a 'happy ending.' Now, if you take the manuscript away and rewrite it so that it fulfils this necessary requirement, perhaps I might be able to use it later on."

"But the world is full of sad stories, Mr. Mortimer," protested the girl.

"Yes; and that's just why we don't want any of 'em in the pages of the Empire Magazine," was the answer.

At eight o'clock on the evening of the day on which she had had her interview with the editor of the Empire Magazine, Muriel Elliott sat down to try and give her rejected story the attraction suggested by Mr. Mortimer.

'How can Mr. Mortimer expect me to give a story like this a 'happy ending'?" she exclaimed tearfully, as she realised that her labour had been wasted.

"Whom do you blame then, Muriel?" demanded her sister, looking up inquiringly, in order to detect the cause of the outburst. "I suppose you do allow yourself the luxury of blaming some one?"

'Yes I do, May; I blame Dick Hilton, of course—and I'll blame you, too, if you take his part against me!" she added.

"Don't distress yourself about me, dear," laughed the elder girl. "I've got quite enough troubles of my own to smooth over, without worrying about yours. All the same, I believe it's far more your fault than Dick's that there's this quarrel between you."

"Really, May! how can you say that?" demanded Muriel indignantly. "If Dick—I mean Mr. Hilton—isn't to blame, what does he keep away for?"

"Well, considering you told him you never wished to see him any more, I don't see what else you could expect the poor man to do."

"Well, he ought to have known that I didn't mean it—or, at any rate, he might have asked me again," she protested.

"Being merely a man, he hasn't been gifted by Providence with feminine perception," was the answer. "As a natural consequence, he doesn't understand that when a woman says 'no,' it's only a preliminary to saying 'yes' later on. He's a nice boy, though," she continued, "and I think you made a mistake to quarrel with him."

"It was all his fault, May. He let that horrid Barrington girl make violent love to him in public, when all the time he was engaged to me."

"My dear," returned the other quietly, "I wouldn't let that trouble me if I were you. It couldn't really have been serious, either, because Edith Barrington was also engaged herself at the time, and was actually married three days after she met Dick."

"Really, May? How do you know?" cried Muriel eagerly. "I never heard of it."

"Well, on the day that you quarrelled with poor Dick, you went away for a month, if you remember, to occupy yourself with your writing, and never saw a newspaper all the time. It didn't occur to me to mention the matter when you returned to town. Surely Dick told you of that, though? Why, I remember his telling me that he wrote to you about it. Didn't you get it?"

"Yes, but I sent his letter back, May. I'd said I wouldn't have anything more to do with him, and so I returned it unopened."

"That was scarcely brilliant of you, dear," observed her sister, "considering the result."

"I don't care!" answered the other defiantly. "I don't care a bit!"

"H'm!" reflected the other, as she watched the tell-tale tears starting to the speaker's eyes. "You may say you don't care, but you'll never make me believe it."

In the distress that her sister's unexpected revelation had occasioned her, the girl had almost entirely neglected the literary work that had hitherto absorbed so much of her time. It was quite useless, she soon realised by dint of trying, to do anything of the sort now, for, until her mind was at rest again, she felt quite unable to compose a line. Consequently, the story in which, under the title of "The Love That Lasts," she had attempted to relieve her feelings, on the discovery of her fiancé's supposed defection, remained unaltered. Her friend, Mr. Mortimer, had written once or twice about it, but even this incentive had failed to spur her to fresh efforts.

One afternoon, however, about three months from the date of her last interview with him, she suddenly met him in Fleet Street.

"Hullo, Miss Elliott!" he exclaimed, genially; "why have you been avoiding me in this reprehensible fashion of late? The pages of the Empire Magazine are simply yawning for you. Haven't you managed to find a satisfactory conclusion for 'The Love That Lasts' yet? I've been keeping a space for it for the last three months, you know."

"No, Mr. Mortimer," returned the girl wearily, "I haven't finished the story, and I'm not likely to, either. I can't find the 'happy ending,' somehow."

"Dear me!" returned the editor sympathetically, struck by the woebogone face looking up to him; "that's bad—very bad indeed! Now, look here, my young friend," he added briskly, as a sudden thought struck him, "never mind the story just now. I've something else for you to do. There's a dress rehearsal at the Lyceum at 4.30 this afternoon. I want you to go and write an article for me about it. Here's a ticket for a box. You will go? That's right. Good-bye."

He watched her drive away in a hansom to execute his commission, and then continued his journey.

"Poor little girl!" he murmured to himself as he walked along; "so she's like a good many other people in this world—can't find the 'happy ending.' What a pity she quarrelled with young Hilton, and what a much bigger pity it is—now that he's back in England—that he doesn't make it up to her! I wish I could bring them together again."

Suddenly an idea occurred to him. As it did so, he gave vent to such a peal of laughter that the passers-by turned round in surprise to see what could be amusing this middle-aged, good-humoured-looking gentleman who was walking so fast along the pavement.

"By Jove! I'll do it!" he exclaimed excitedly. "If I telephone at once it will be in time."

As Muriel Elliott sat in the corner of her box, twenty minutes later, she thought it was impossible to discover anything more depressing than to watch a rehearsal.

As she leant back in the shadow of the curtains the remembrance of the last occasion when she had been in the theatre occurred to her. It was only three months ago, she reflected. She had had a box—the very box she was in just now, she noticed with a start—for Irving in Hamlet, and Dick Hilton had been one of the party occupying it with her. Every incident of that memorable evening came back to her with a startling vividness; she seemed to be living it over again this afternoon. When the performance was over they had gone to the Savoy for supper, and he had shared the hansom that took her back, tired but very happy, to South Kensington afterwards. What a long time ago it all seemed now! She wondered if she would ever be really happy again.

So occupied was she in her reflections that she did not hear a tap at the door behind her. Nor, when it opened, and an attendant ushered someone into the box did she turn round. It was only through hearing, a moment later, a chair being moved beside her, that she became conscious that she was not alone. She looked round with a start at the discovery. As she did so she saw that the newcomer was a man. His face was turned from her, but, despite the gloom enveloping the box, she recognised, as she thought, something strangely familiar in the visitor's outline. A sudden impulse prompted her to touch his hand gently, and, scarcely conscious of what she was doing, she leant back for the purpose.

The man turned his head at the movement. A sudden light leapt into his eyes. Half-rising from his seat, he held out both his hands in welcome. "Muriel!" he cried. "So you are here, after all?"

"Dick—Dick! Is it really you at last?" she answered. "Have you come back to me again?"

He leant forward and kissed her by way of reply.

"But how did you know I was here?" she demanded a moment later.

"George Mortimer—bless him!—telephoned to me at the club half-an-hour ago that it was most important that I should go to box 'A' at the Lyceum this afternoon. He said I'd know why when I got there."

"And do you, dear?" she whispered softly.

His answer seemed to satisfy her, for at six o'clock the editor of the Empire Magazine received the following telegram: "Can finish the story, after all. I have found the 'happy ending.' Muriel Elliott."

The Big Blue Diamond.

THE EXPERIENCES OF AN "I. D. B."

CHAPTER I.

Zulu Pete, from Kimberley.

I, GERALD WETTON, and my partner, Jack Lane, were eating and resting, at the close of the toughest day's work we had known since we had pitched, three months before, at Waaisveld, on the Transvaal border.

To make it worse we had taken—just nothing. Other days, a few sparklets, perhaps, or diamond clippings, had rewarded our efforts, but this day—nothing!

"Jack," said I despondingly, "this will never do! Old Viljoen knew what he was about when he sold us this rotten claim as being richly diamondiferous—and then trekked."

"I'd wring his neck if I had him here now," replied Jack grimly. "It's only that pretty daughter of his, Minnie, that would save him."

"Well, it's no use crying over spilt milk," said I. "I vote for a hark back to Kimberley in the morning."

"Just as you like, my boy!" said Lane. "I'm willing to follow my leader—meaning you—to Prester John's Land, if needs be, and if you only know where it is."

I do not suppose that the bag of stones we had actually "mined" would have fetched more than three hundred pounds in open market; though that is not to say that we were unpossessed of diamonds—some of them grand stones—got in another way.

Indeed, I make no secret of the fact that I bought stones of the blacks who passed by our claim at Waaisveld, on their way back to their several tribes.

These stones were, of course, in the first instance, stolen, and then concealed in the hair, beneath the skin, and in many another way. Equally, of course, I was acting illegally in thus illicitly purchasing; but when, as often happened, a fine stone was offered me at a price so absurdly below its real value that it amounted almost to a free gift of the gem, it was a temptation hard of resistance.

On this particular evening when, our meal finished, and everything, including our waggon and oxen, made snug for the night, we sat smoking our pipes, each of us thinking his own thoughts, a peculiarly weird-like hail came faintly up the valley from the south-west.

"Doesn't sound 'white,'" said Jack, listening intently. "More like a Zulu shout than anything else, and half-choked at that."

"It's certainly not 'white,'" I said. "Hark! there it is again!"

It was nearly dark, and though our fire cast a fairly big circle of light, we could not see more than a few yards in any direction.

Startlingly sudden, then, was the almost noiseless intrusion into the light-circle of a miserable, half-starved-looking Zulu.

He did not speak, but pointed, with skinny finger, to his mouth.

"The beggar's hungry," said Jack.

The newcomer seemed to understand, and made a ghastly attempt to smile.

"Here!" I said, reaching out for some of the remains of our own meal, and pushing them towards him. "Get that into you!"

He did not eat; he ravenously tore at, and bolted the food.

"Hasn't had anything to eat for a week, I should say!" said Jack.

The wretched-looking object nodded energetically in acquiescence.

His only clothing was a tattered waist-cloth and a broken, crownless old straw hat.

From the first I noticed a strange thing about him. An intermittent, half-turning of the head in a listening way.

Then I spoke to him.

"Where from, matey?"

But he only shook his head.

"Are you dumb, or what's the matter with you?" said Jack impatiently.

The only answer was a broader grin and a wider shake of the head. Then something seemed to strike him, for he opened wide his naturally enormous mouth and we saw, by the light of the fire, that the man's tongue was gone; a harsh, guttural throat-sound being all that he was capable of.

"Poor beggar!" said Jack. "He's either been punished at the mines for diamond stealing, or at some previous time for something else by his chief. Anyway, it's a beastly brutal way of doing things."

"Yes," I said; "but I wonder what he's so worried about behind him. D'you see how he keeps his ear cocked in the direction he's just come from?"

"Yes," said Jack. "And look at him now?"

The black had suddenly sunk on to the ground in an apparent agony of terror. There he lay cowering, and emitting the most fearful noises that it is possible to conceive.

The cause of it all was soon revealed.

"Anybody at home?" came out of the darkness, valleywards, but close at hand, in strong nasal tones.

The query was followed up almost directly by the appearance at the fire-side of a tall, spare man, leading by the bridle a black Arab mare.

That is, the man was spare in a way only, being, as a matter-of-fact, well-knit and muscular.

"I reckon this to be the very luckiest thing I've struck any time these five days!" he said, the while hobbling his horse, and making himself comfortable as close to the embers as possible.

"Hullo!" he suddenly exclaimed, as his eye lit on the crouching figure of the Zulu. "Where did you spring from—you miserable dog of a diamond-thief?"

The poor wretch heard him, but took no notice.

"What's the trouble?" asked Jack. "Do you know the chap?"

"Know him! Where is the Kimberley miner who doesn't know 'Pete, the Zulu'? Why, he's stolen more stones than all the rest of the black trash at the mines put together."

"Suspected now?" I asked.

"Well, Mr.—er——"

"Wetton."

"Well, Mr. Wetton, it's like this, and darned strange, too—the beast has always managed somehow to secrete his swag, and no power on earth has ever succeeded in finding it. It's known that he's had the sparks, but he's smart enough not to let a chip even be found within a mile of his dirty person."

"Yes," I remarked, "if he's worked it that way, Mr.—er——"

"Crafte—Siever Crafte, of Chicago, City of Illinois."

"Well, Mr. Crafte, if he's worked it, as I have said, in that way he is smart and deserving of a certain amount of credit."

"Think so?" said our latest guest, with a peculiar screw-up of his left eye. "I think it's a matter of opinion, and my opinion is, that a short shrift, without judge or jury, is just the one thing he needs; and he should have it if I had my way."

"Sorry to say I don't agree with you," said Jack, quietly filling his pipe. "Wetton's right; and I don't care who hears me say so."

It was at this point in the conversation that I saw the black moving away, snake-like, upon his stomach.

Crafte saw him too, and made to spring up. Jack, however, caught hold of the Yankee by the right wrist, and kept him from rising.

"Let the poor beggar alone," said Jack. "If he has got anything belonging to you (which I very much doubt); you're not going to lynch him on our lot!"

"I'll put lead into him!" yelled the other, literally foaming at the mouth with rage.

Before either of us could prevent it, he had whipped out a six-shooter with his disengaged left hand.

Two almost simultaneous reports—a sharp cry—and then—silence.

Only for a moment, however. Jack released his hold on Crafte; all three of us then rushing round to the other side of the fire.

The Zulu was gone!

The only sign of him was a little pool of blood, and a trail of the same, leading away to the northward; close by the pool, as if dropped in the moment of agony and hurried escape, was a small, dirty piece of rag, evidently inclosing something.

Upon this Crafte sought to pounce, and would have succeeded in securing it had not I smartly put my foot upon it.

"It belongs to me! I tell you! It is mine! He stole it from me!"

"I've only your word for that," said I quietly; "and as I am not disposed to take your word as being sufficient evidence of your right of ownership in—in whatever this piece of rag may contain, why, I shall hold on—eh! Jack!"

"Certainly!" said Jack, playing warningly with his own revolver.

"You're a couple of dead beats!" hissed Crafte, almost inarticulate with disappointed spleen. "But don't think you'll score on the odd trick. I'll have it! mark you!—I'll have it—and that within forty-eight hours!"

He made a half-movement as if to fire at one or both of us, but Jack covered him with his own weapon, and he thought better of it.

Unhobbling his horse he sprang into the saddle, gave a vindictive cut with his heavy whip on the animal's flanks, and a still more cruel dig of his spurs into its sides, and galloped off at breakneck speed down the valley, in the direction he had come.

We looked at one another, Jack and I; then I lifted my foot, and picked up the dirty little parcel.

It was hard, and, with the covering, about the size of an ordinary hen's egg.

Slowly I unwrapped the casing of filthy linen.

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Jack, as a curiously coloured rough stone was revealed.

It was a big blue diamond!

CHAPTER II.

The Siege of Viljoen's Farm.

It was towards the close of the day following our big "find," that Jack and I rode up to the "stoep" of the low-pitched frame building that old Viljoen had set up for a homestead on his new land.

We were both of us tired out with our long ride; but Jack, with thoughts of pretty Minnie Viljoen in his heart, had been a spur to my laggard journeying. And now, as if it were a reward for his brave persistency, Minnie herself was out there to greet us.

She was as winsome a specimen of Dutch beauty as could be found in a day's march. Her hair was a rich flaxen, and in such abundance that it was rather a trouble to her than otherwise. Her eyes were so tender of expression that it is not to be wondered at that Jack was magnetised by them beyond redemption.

I left the two together while I sought the farmer and his "vrou."

Old Viljoen was not a bad sort of old chap in his way, though we fancied that he had overreached us a bit in the bargain for Waaisveld.

When I had explained to him the object of our surprise visit, he expressed himself pretty strongly upon one or two points.

"This American!" he said. "I think I know him. If he is the man I saw in Kimberley six months ago, then you had better look out. He's dangerous; and would think no more of killing you to get that stone than he did when he cut poor Pete the Zulu's tongue out, two years ago, by way of revenge."

"Did he do that?" I cried. "Then, if I ever meet him again, I'll shoot him in his tracks, as sure as my name is Gerald Wetton! Why, the man's a fiend!"

"He's just that!" said the old Dutchman, nodding his head vigorously. "But he's hard to trap. They tried at Kimberley to make him answer for his treatment of Pete, but he wriggled out of it. He's got sacks of money; but he's greedy—he's greedy! and if he's made up his mind to have this stone you've got—why, he'll play every trick he knows to get it."

"Well, Mr. Viljoen, my idea is this—we will intrust this diamond to you so long as we think necessary; you undertaking to hand it over only to me or Jack Lane. If this fellow Crafte follows us up, expecting to find it on or about us, he'll be disappointed. There may be trouble—there probably will; but—he won't get the stone."

"Ah! good! You trust me! Yes. I am Viljoen's—a rough old Dutchman; but he wouldn't rob you of a 'schilling's' worth. No! he would die rather!"

And so it was settled. We were to stop and sleep at Hagspruit that night, and were to return to Waaisveld in the early morning.

After supper I handed the stone to our host, who, for the moment, put it into an inner pocket of his coat.

"Ah!" cried Minnie, who was helping the maid to clear away. "Look!—a man's face at the window!"

We all of us ran outside on to the "stoep," but could see no one. All was silent as the grave.

"I am sure I saw a face," said Minnie, when we had come indoors again. "A long thin face, with no hair or beard on it."

The old farmer laughed, and told his daughter she was love-dreaming, whereat both she and Jack looked confused, and, it must be confessed, a bit foolish.

I should fancy that it must have been between one and two in the morning that Jack woke me, saying that he heard men's voices, and the tramping of feet round about the house.

I sat up and listened.

"By George! you're right, Jack! there's something wrong!"

As I spoke I sprang out of bed, Jack doing the same, and rapidly putting on my boots and trousers, approached the window to look out.

I suppose my white shirt afforded the mark, for immediately two bullets splashed on the side frame.

The two reports woke the old farmer, whom I heard shouting to the three hired men to get up and help him to see what was the matter.

"Va! va! you lazy rascals! the place will be burnt before you move! My 'sjamjok' shall be about your shoulders, if you're not out of it!"

Then all was hurly-burly.

Finding themselves discovered, the assailants—one or two of whom we could see were whites—directed a furious fusilade against the house.

The three women—old Mrs. Viljoen, Minnie, and the Dutch servant—remained in a small room at the back of the house used as a store-place.

But Minnie did not long keep out of danger. Before Jack could prevent her, she was in amongst us, handing ammunition, and even loading the rifles and revolvers.

"That's got one!" said Jack excitedly, as the flash of a torch outside showed a big man, in high boots, grey shirt, and a broad-brimmed felt hat, throw up his arms, as Jack's bullet reached him and fall on his face.

At the same moment, and by the same light, I saw Siever Crafte, revolver in hand, spring forward and make for the window leading on to the "stoep."

Old Viljoen was guarding that window, and I shouted to him to beware.

At the instant I cried: "Look out, farmer!" the window was dashed in, Crafte fired twice in rapid succession, and with a cry and a groan, poor old Viljoen fell—dead!

What followed was lightning-like and bewildering.

Instant with the fall of the old farmer, Crafte stooped, wrenched open the dead man's vest; tore from the bosom of his shirt the packet containing the stone; and turned and fled.

I emptied my revolver after him, as soon as I could collect my senses. Jack did the same, although poor Minnie's cries of distress, as she hung over her father's body, broke his aim.

It was all of no use; with the exception of the man Jack had shot just before, there was not a living soul within sight or sound of Hagspruit.

The big blue diamond was gone!

CHAPTER III.

A Rumour, and What Came of It.

I HAVE just heard, in a reliable quarter, that a blue diamond—the biggest ever known—has, within the past fortnight, been offered for sale in St. Petersburg, to the Tsar himself, by a certain wealthy American, who says that he purchased it six months ago from the man who found it.

This information has determined me to leave at once for the Russian capital, in order that I may, if possible, expose Siever Crafte (evidently the wealthy American aforesaid) and recover possession of the treasure of which he has robbed me.

Jack remains in South Africa to look after our joint interests there, and to care for the two women so pathetically cast upon his pitiful consideration.

* * * * *

Winter in St. Petersburg is something to be reckoned with.

In the Nevsky Prospect is a certain jeweller's shop much patronised by the Imperial Family; and on a day when a drosky set me down at its door, the snow, drifted by an icy wind, was half-way up its windows.

Ivan Sovski, the proprietor of the establishment, had not been prepared for my coming; I had reasons for making my visit a genuinely surprise one. It was the first move in a game of wits.

And the first move drew a blank.

"The 'blue diamond,' your excellency!" said old Ivan, with well-simulated astonishment, and regarding me cautiously from under his half-closed eyelids. "I have it not! I would like to have one—a good specimen—for His Imperial Majesty would give me my price for it—yes!"

I could not shake him; and so, here I was foiled at the very outset.

I might possibly have accepted the apparently inevitable, and turned back, when a good providence came to my aid and stayed my retreat.

A clatter—a jingling of sleigh-bells—an authoritative command or two in a hoarse voice, and an officer of the Imperial Guard entered the place.

There was much whispered, earnest conversation between Sovski and the Court emissary, mingled with many a side-glance from the former towards myself.

"Well," said I, on the officer's departure, "I am convinced now, M. Sovski, that you are deceiving me, and that the blue diamond I am in search of, and which is my property, is at this moment in the Winter Palace, the subject of the Tsar's consideration."

The jeweller wished to argue with me, but I declined to bandy words with him, and ordered my driver to proceed straight to the Bureau of the Minister of Police.

I found, on my arrival there, that the Minister was engaged. There being nothing unusual in this, I sat me down in an ante-room to wait patiently for my turn.

Presently the Minister's door opened and closed, and I heard footsteps descending the main staircase.

"M. Gerald Wetton?" said a voice at my side.

I started and looked up.

I bowed; and the voice—that of an officer of police—went on:

"Then, M. Wetton, I must trouble you to come with me."

He was very polite, but he did not usher me into the presence of the Minister. Something told me I was, in a way, in custody.

I got into my drosky again; but this time in company.

"The Winter Palace!" ordered the police-agent.

Arrived, we, after a brief wait, were conducted to a plainly-furnished room—empty.

I have been desired to suppress certain things that I saw and heard there, so will merely tell just sufficient to make clear the end of the story.

It seems that Siever Crafte had become cognisant of my presence in St. Petersburg, and of my business there. First putting in train, through Ivan Sovski, negotiations for the sale to the Tsar of the blue diamond, he then endeavoured to get me officially silenced until the sale should have been completed.

Like most clever people, however, he reckoned without his host, which, in this particular instance, was his Majesty's own suspicions of the American's bona-fides.

Arrangements were, therefore, made to confront us in the Imperial presence, when the Tsar would himself determine, from signs and evidence, whether I, Gerald Wetton, was the impudent pretender to the gem's possession that Siever Crafte claimed me to be.

How the Yankee adventurer contrived to elude the watchfulness of his police guardian, it is hard to say; but so it was—a heavy bribe being, probably, at the bottom of it. The officer had to confess that he could not produce his charge,

This was enough to clear me in official eyes, and I was able, in a few words, to prove my ownership of the jewel which now, I believe, forms part of His Majesty's Most Gracious Consort's uniquely magnificent collection of gems.

* * * * *

A few months later, in a rehabilitated "Hagspruit," Jack, and I together with Minnie and her mother, sat round the fire in a cosy "house-place" discussing the future.

Jack and I had already divided the sale-money of the blue diamond, he electing to marry Minnie and settle down at Hagspruit, while I decided to return to England, from which I had been absent for many years.

It was when we were dispersing, to retire to rest, that Jack spoke the last word.

"Gerald, old chum!" he said, smiling, and laying his hands on my shoulders. "I'll make a prophecy!"

"Yes," I said, "what is it?"

"That you won't stop in England six months."

And Jack was quite right, for long before the six months were up, I was back again at Waaisveld, this time alone.

But I never found another "big blue diamond."

Ralph Enderby.

He Wouldn't Like it.

Clara: "Well, dear, I am going to marry the Earl of Broadstairs." Maud: "Then what are you looking so glum about it for?" Clara: "I am afraid my fiancé won't like it. Men are so selfish."

Splendid Scheme.

"I've hit upon a great scheme," said a provincial editor. "I nearly doubled our circulation yesterday." "How did you work it?" "See that steel stamp? Well, I just cut out a paragraph in the local column of the whole edition." "How did that help the circulation?" "Every man in the town brought an extra copy to see what had been cut out."

CHAPTER 1.

An Interesting Client.

"Joyce, dear, are you not coming to get some lunch? It is past one o'clock, and you have been at work since nine. Your poor hands must be frozen with that water."

A gay little laugh greeted this anxious question as a trim figure in a black gown and a big alpaca apron turned towards the open door of the small room. The chamber was bare and carpetless, its contents a fixed bench, laden with bottles and dishes, a pine-topped table, and a few cupboards.

Outside the large, uncurtained sashes of the single wide casement, a chill winter day frowned over a panorama of roofs and chimney-stacks, making the task which had just been interrupted seem unenviable enough. The girl at the window, her fingers dipped into a trough under a still running tap, was washing a dozen sheets of limp paper.

"Use is second nature, Marion," she remarked; "and as for lunch, I had a couple of biscuits an hour ago—I keep a tin on the premises. But you will be famishing, and so will Teddie; I was a brute to forget that you won't take your meals without me."

She dried her hands on her apron, gained the door and stepped through, putting an arm round the waist of the woman who had been standing on the threshold. The apartment beyond was extensive and airy, boasting a glass lean-to running its whole length. A quaint assortment of furniture, some rolls of painted canvas, a camera, and the huge focussing funnel of an arc-light, revealed the purpose of the place. It was a photographer's studio. On the mounts of the innumerable portraits and enlargements strewn about, was the conspicuous inscription: "Joyce Hammond, Day and Electric-light Studios, South Street, Scholes."

Joyce herself, dark, slender, active, moved with the graceful ease of a young and pretty woman. Her companion was older, graver, sterner, and while Joyce's rippling locks were of a raven blackness, the other's brown tresses were sown with tell-tale silver threads. Yet there was sufficient resemblance between the faces of both to suggest that they were sisters.

"Well," asked Joyce, briskly, as they crossed the floor to a narrow staircase that ascended in a distant corner, "and how goes on the mounting?"

Marion sighed.

"Not as fast as it ought to, Jo, dear!" she responded; "you made a bad bargain when you engaged me—I am not worth my salt. Teddie and I should have stopped in New Zealand and died. What claim have James Lichfield's deserted wife and child on anybody?"

"Rubbish!" cried Joyce. "Rome was not built in a day; you are beautifully neat, and speed will come to you with practice. Besides, don't you provide the cosiest lunches and teas and so save my purse and my digestion from the restaurant-keepers? Don't be a goose, May!"

She led the way up the awkward flight to reach a third floor of the suite which was described in professional advertisements as the "Studios." It was extremely diminutive and occupied by a coal-stove, some chairs, and a brace of tables, one covered by a variety of apparatus and a score of prints, mounted and unmounted; one laid for a meal. Near this latter was seated a handsome boy of five or six years, whose pale cheeks and intensely bright eyes bore witness to a delicate constitution.

"What a long time you've been, auntie Joyce!" he observed, pathetically; "I am so hungry."

Joyce stooped and kissed him.

"It was thoughtless of me, Teddie," she confessed, throwing off her apron; "but never mind, it shan't occur again. And what has mother for lunch this morning?"

The child put up his face to whisper:

"Steak!" he said, "and mushrooms; mother knew you liked them—isn't it a nice surprise?"

"It is, indeed," admitted Joyce, cutting a loaf of bread expertly as her sister deposited a steaming dish on the table; "your mother is a witch, Teddie. I hope I haven't spoilt the steak, that's all."

Marion Lichfield filled the three plates that had been heating on the stove. Her little son contemplated the plump white "buttons" of the mushrooms.

"Father was fond of mushrooms," he commented, "but ours came out of bottles, didn't they, mother? You used to cook them for father."

The elder of the listeners bit her lip and Joyce set down the bread-knife hastily to create a diversion.

"There," was her tactful interruption, "enjoy yours, Teddie dear, and don't trouble mother at present; she—she has a headache."

"That's with cooking," decided the child; "I am sorry, mother darling, but I will be quite quiet and then it will be better soon."

He paused—a bell had sounded in the studio underneath. Joyce pushed back her chair; she had just addressed herself to her belated meal.

"My luck!" she said; "but I shall be thankful if it is a customer; things have been ghastly this month. As for my lunch, you can keep it warm on the stove—business before pleasure."

She straightened her collar, smoothed her hair at a circular mirror hung over the stove and hastened down the irregular staircase, to the floor below.

Within the door that gave admission to the studio from the corridor of the building was a tall, broad-shouldered personage, clad in a rough serge suit and carrying a discoloured sombrero. His firm chin and strong mouth were almost hidden by a dense black beard. Seeing her, he bowed.

"Good afternoon!" he remarked, "is Mr. Hammond in—the gentleman who takes the portraits, I mean?"

Joyce flushed.

"There is no Mr. Hammond," she retorted. "I am Joyce Hammond, and at your service."

The newcomer whistled and instantly apologised. "Excuse me," he answered—his accent, though pleasant, was not that of the home-bred Briton—"but I read the whirly lettering on the photos in the case at the entrance as an abbreviation of 'Joseph'—J-o-s and an h written higher up, you know. Ten thousand pardons; I am charmed to make your acquaintance, Miss—or is it Mrs. Hammond?"

The girl received this ingenuous explanation with much gravity.

"Miss will do," she told him; "you were thinking of having some photographs—of yourself, I presume."

"Exactly," was the rejoinder; "and prowling round to discover a johnny who could turn out a portrait that wasn't a frightful insult to our common humanity, I—I noticed the specimens exhibited below. Miss Hammond, I congratulate you—you are a dandy photographer and no error."

Joyce reddened once more at the compliment to her skill.

"Th—thank you!" she stammered; "I—I do try to be an artist, as far as the camera will let me. What kind of photo do you want?" She reached to a pile of samples but her client waved them aside.

"Look here," he said, "I've been landed at this one-horse seaport of yours from an old wind-jammer—sailing-ship, you understand, mile-a-day cargo-boat. She picked me up and two or three others in the Pacific—we were all that was left of the Amphiboa, a Weldon liner, Vancouver to Auckland."

The young photographer was secretly admiring the stalwart, breezy figure of the narrator; he seemed an ideal hero of a romance of the ocean. Unconscious of her scrutiny he went on with his tale.

"The Amphiboa," he pursued, "met a squall off the coast of North Island (that's the top half of New Zealand) was blown out of her course and struck a barren reef in the southern Pacific. We launched five boats, and none of the other four—they say at Lloyd's—have been heard of."

The cheerful, sun-burnt visage of her unconventional customer grew sad and reverent.

"Poor beggars!" he murmured; "only a few miles from home, and then, a fifty-six hours' gale and destruction. Deuced hard lines, and lots of them going home to wives and kids."

Joyce gazed at him absorbedly; she felt that she could see the catastrophe he described with such succinctness, the long fight against the pitiless gale, the wreck upon the reef, the days in the open boat, the unexpected rescue! Her customer roused her.

"What's done, is done," he added; "and we can quote Shakespeare to prove that it's no use worrying about what can't be remedied. I cabled to New Zealand, got some money and references, and now I'm off to London. But I wanted a picture of myself as I came ashore a week ago, so I've kept the beard a few hours more, put on these togs again and this hat, which I bought of a sailor for some tobacco. Make a good picture of me and charge me top-rates. I like that darkish-brown thing you have in the case below. A dozen of that sort might do me, I fancy."

A sigh of pleasure escaped Joyce Hammond—he was ordering a carbon panel, worth five guineas a dozen. It was months since she had had a similar commission.

"Will you—will you sit now?" she asked, glancing towards the camera. He assented, and she stepped to the end of the studio to arrange for the operation. Her latest task had been the photographing of a family group, and the floor was still lumbered by the inevitable accessories. Joyce began to drag them aside.

"By Jove!" cried her athletic client, "let me do that." And he flung down his picturesque hat and effected a clearance in a twinkling. "Shall we need any of this stuff?" he demanded, as he surveyed the medley of chairs, settees, pedestals, hassocks on either hand, an empty space between backed by a painted cloth representing the interior of a middle-class drawing-room.

Joyce shook her head, she had been studying him while he worked. A pull at a cord sent the background out of sight, Joyce hauled down another—a plain one, with a few simple lights and shadows. Before it she threw a strip of artificial turf.

"Please stand there," she said, "and hold your hat in your hand?"

The other nodded approvingly and obeyed. He was a fine subject for a full-length portrait and settled easily into the desired pose; a certain stamp of breeding showed through his rough costume and swarthy complexion, his beard, crisp and curling, feathered naturally over his deep chin.

"We need something else," decided the operator; "you look too like a soldier standing at ease. Wait, I have it."

She hastened to a pile of oddments in a convenient nook, picked up a short-handled, long-thonged whip of plaited hide and brought it to him.

"Crush your hat slightly in your fingers," she instructed, "and grasp the whip with the same hand, the lash looped and dangling."

He did as she commanded. Joyce frowned thoughtfully, then went to peer at him through the camera, adjusting the focussing-cloth over her pretty head and pondering his image on the ground-glass screen.

"Yes," she declared, "that is perfect; please remain as you are till I fetch the plate."

She dived into a cramped dark roomf whose ruby pane admitted the faintest gleam from the studio, shut a door, and left her client alone for a minute. That gentleman played with his whip and took stock of his surroundings.

"Smart little girl!" he muttered; "proud and independent, and clever, I'll bet. Beastly shame for her to have to earn her living in this hole. Wonder if she does earn it; anyhow, she's plucky to try. By Jupiter!" he added suddenly, "I'll have two dozen of those photos and I'll get her to do some of me after I've scraped off this confounded hair—sort of 'before' and 'after'—dashed if I don't!"

His communings with himself were checked by the arrival of Joyce bearing the slide containing the plate for the production of the negative. She contemplated critically the reflection of his attitude on the focussing-screen, put on the cap, slipped in the slide, and drew up the flap.

"Ready?" she said. Her customer relapsed into statuesque calm; Joyce whisked off the cap, counted silently, and replaced it.

"I will make sure it is all right," she announced, and return to her mysterious sanctum. There was a chime of tinkling glass and rattled porcelain, then the splash of water and an interval, which the sitter, or rather the stander, spent in regarding a three-quarter enlargement of Joyce herself.

"You're a daisy," he muttered, "and real grit, or I'm no judge! I'll have to have a picture of you for a memento."

With great coolness he sorted out a platinotype cabinet of the little photographer, brushed the dust off it, and surveyed it appreciatively and pocketed it.

A second later Joyce had reappeared. Her fingers were wet, and she held between them a dripping negative.

"Very good," she announced, sloping it dexterously to the light. The original looked and saw on the plate that ghostly but marvellous representation which it is possible to obtain by reflection from most negatives.

"The dickens!" he exclaimed; "that is excellent. Do me two dozen, Miss Hammond — I have hosts of friends down under and they'll all want one. Oh, and when I have got rid of my beard and doffed this rig-out for the last time in favour of some decent clothes, I shall ask you to have another shot at me. Would —would to-morrow do?"

"Certainly," said Joyce, with an ill-concealed satisfaction; "any hour in the morning, after nine—eleven would suit me quite. But I don't know what name to —to——"

"To book them to," concluded her client; "absurd, credit is not for a bird of passage like me, I will pay something on account." He snatched out a pocket-book and gave her a note—for five pounds. "As for the name," he proceeded, "I am Edward Chaloner, of Dundalk, New Zealand, and the Crescent Hotel, Scholes. For the present, Miss Hammond, au revoir. I will call at eleven in the morning more fittingly attired to pay my respects to a lady of your attainments."

He bowed, smiled, accepted a receipt for the note, glanced at her absently, and departed as one who is lost in thought. Joyce studied the reflected "positive" again.

"He is very nice!" she sighed; "young and manly, and frank and generous. Heigho! there are pleasanter people in the world than I had grown to believe. I must show him to Marion."

She crossed the studio and ran up the rickety stairs with the negative.

"May," she cried, springing into the tiny room at the stairhead, "here's a stroke of luck, an order for two dozen carbon panels and five pounds on account. Such a handsome fellow—he had been shipwrecked and brought to England on a cargo-boat. He wishes to have a memento of his experiences, so came with a beard like a pilgrim and in a slop suit. But of course he is a gentleman." She held the plate for her sister to see.

Marion Lichfield started up.

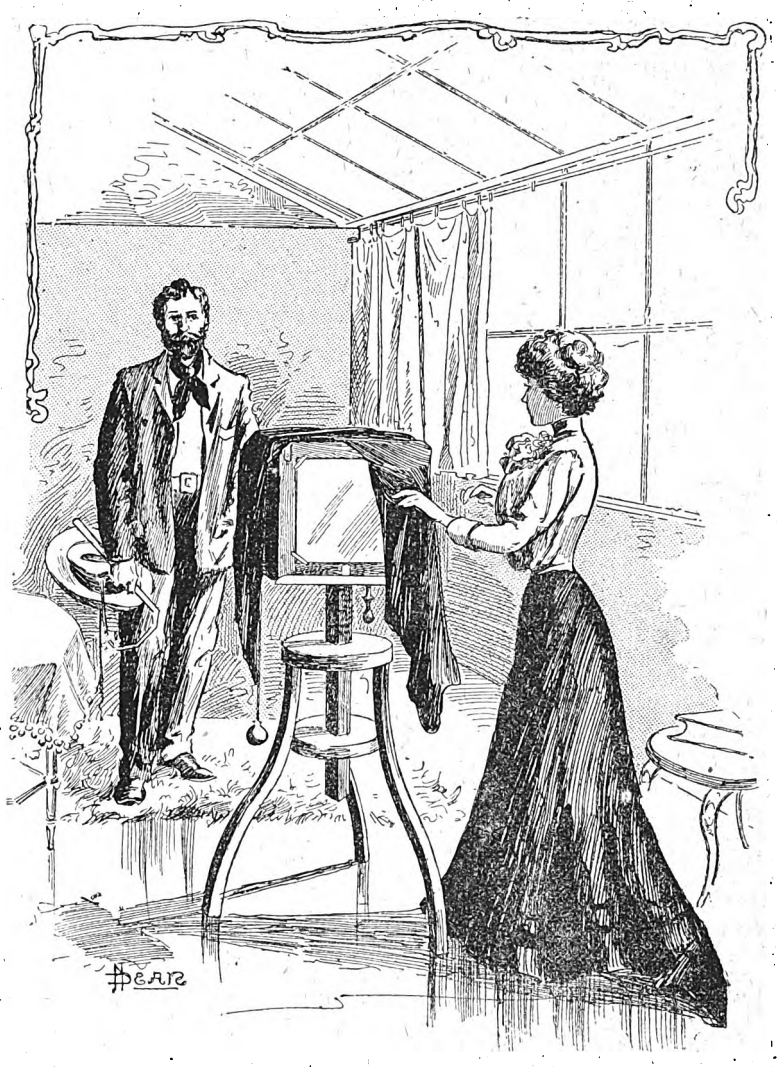
"Joyce," she gasped, "do you know who this man is?"

The younger woman gazed at her, surprised.

"Yes," she said, "a Mr. Edward Chaloner, of Dundalk, New Zealand."

Her sister staggered and leant against the table for support. The child Teddie crept to her side, alarmed by her demeanour. His mother lowered her voice that it might reach only Joyce's ears.

"An old alias!" she whispered; "I have heard ti often. Joyce, this is a portrait of my husband!"



"Yes," she declared, "that is perfect; please remain as you are till I fetch the plate."

CHAPTER II.

A Letter and an Arrest.

"Are you quite—quite sure—it is he, Marion; would not your husband have recognised my name and betrayed some alarm, however little? Though he has never seen me before, he will know that I exist. I wrote to you sometimes, and you must have spoken of me."

Joyce held up a print of the negative she had taken the preceding day; the picture was a fine one, she could not help admiring the athletic pose and vigorous life of the figure in the rough garments.

Marion Lichfield sneered as she bent over the task of mounting her sister's photographs.

"Jim is not the sort to be easily thrown off his balance," she said; "he admitted himself that he thought the mark on the portraits in the case at the door was 'Joseph Hammond.' If he had read it as Joyce he would never have crossed the threshold, I'll wager."

The younger woman pondered the argument.

"I wouldn't be too positive, Marion dear," she urged; "you've no idea how deceiving a beard is to the eye. Perhaps if you saw his face clean-shaven you would laugh at the thought of imagining him to be your husband."

A shrug of her shoulders was Marion Lichfield's answer.

"Do you fancy I'm a fool, Joyce?" she added; "why, the alias he gave you helps to prove his identity—he used to call himself Edward Chaloner more often than not. No, it's Jim, flush of money for the moment and spending it recklessly as usual."

Joyce abandoned the controversy.

"What will you do about it?" she asked, laying down the wet print and turning to warm her chilled fingers at the stove. The child Teddie had fallen asleep over a toy engine, his arms on the table at which his mother worked, and his head resting upon them. Joyce stepped to him and moved him gently into a less uncomfortable attitude.

Marion had been considering the question put to her.

"I shan't see him," she announced. "I hate him for leaving the boy to starve; I always shall hate him. But I should like him to learn that I know where he is, and that he is squandering pounds on the indulgence of his own vanity while his son and I sponge on you."

"Please, please, Marion!" begged her sister.

But Marion Lichfield continued fiercely:

"I'm going out about the time you expect him—Teddie shall stop, though. When Jim comes tell him he has been recognised, and if he denies it, call the boy. That will convince you."

Joyce took up the portrait of the man who had introduced himself as Edward Chaloner and showed it nervously to the resentful Marion.

"Dear," she murmured, "don't be so hard; he doesn't seem as if he could be all bad. Wouldn't it be splendid if you found he didn't desert you—if it was an accident. It might have been—he was shipwrecked, he says."

Marion Lichfield stamped her foot.

"Joyce," she cried, "I've no patience with you for believing his fairy tales; he warned me when he left me in New Zealand and went to America that we should not meet again. But there, you're not to blame, I suppose; Jim has a glib tongue and could twist a woman round his finger so long as she wasn't his wife."

Joyce looked at her watch—a bell had just rung below.

"Half-past ten," she said; "that is some people for a group sitting I arranged to do early. Eleven o'clock was what I told Mr—Mr. Chaloner."

"Very well," vouchsafed Marion drily; "I will go as soon as I can. And when he does put in an appearance, Joyce, you can let him know that I wouldn't see him again if—if he were on his death-bed."

Her sister shuddered but kept silence, and with a mute caress to the slumbering child, hurried down to keep her appointment. Marion worked on steadily, her thin hands twitching as she laboured; she was not a woman to forgive easily such a wrong as that which had thrown her upon Joyce's generosity, and yet the latter's appeal had stung her to the quick; she shrank from realising that her husband had so powerfully impressed his romantic personality upon the girl as to lead her to plead his cause with his actual victim. She grew almost jealous and even contemplated remaining to witness the interview. But pride was too much for her; she rose, donned her hat and cloak, and descended to the studio.

Joyce was posing a group of young folks, who laughed and chattered provokingly. Marion passed them with a nod to the operator and went out at the principal exit. As she drew the door ajar, she encountered a ragged lad on the point of entering.

"Beg pardon, ma'am!" he said, "but is there a party of the name of Mrs. Lichfield here? I've a letter for her."

Marion surveyed him, hesitating; she could think of none who was likely to send her a communication save by post.

"I—I am Mrs. Lichfield," she replied; "Mrs. James Lichfield."

"Right, oh," declared the messenger; "then this is for you, ma'am," and he produced a dirty envelope, directed in a scrawl the sight of which made Marion's heart leap into her mouth. It was that of her husband.

Hurriedly she tore it open; a scrap of soiled paper fell out. She unfolded it and gathered the purport of the epistle at a glance. Its contents were brief, and ran—

"My dear Wife,—

"If ever you loved me, come to me when you get this. You'll be surprised to find that I'm in England. I reached London on a sailing-ship. I had to hook it out of New Zealand over some bother about a cheque. Hearing you were with Joyce I made for Scholes, arrived yesterday, and was going to try and see you when I met with an accident and fear I am dying. Come to me, Marion, and don't tell a soul where I am."

The letter was signed "Your wretched husband, Jim," and had postscript, "You may trust the bearer."

Marion stared at the missive; the writing was her husband's beyond doubt, though weak and straggling enough. She had been right after all. Edward Chaloner was James Lichfield, and, prompted by his accustomed caution, he must have been spying out the state of affairs without committing himself.

The order he had given and the five pounds he had left must have been for her sake rather than Joyce's. the pretence of misreading the name on the specimens at the street entrance a mere trick to divert suspicion. He had meant to ask for her on his next call, perhaps to intreat her pardon. And now he was dying! Marion had no thought for his hinted crime, no thought for Joyce or the child; she was consumed by a burning desire to be near him.

"I am ready!" she told the ragged youth, who had studied her curiously during her consideration of the letter; "show me the way."

The lad nodded and began to slouch down the long flights that led to the ground floor of the building. Marion followed him. A few moments later they were lost in the motley crowd that drifted past the narrow lobby which gave upon the chief thoroughfare of the sea-port town.

Hardly had they disappeared than a smartly-dressed person entered the passage and leapt up the stone steps three at a time. Clean-shaven as he was, it would not have been difficult to recognise in him the identical caller, who, bearded like the bard and clad in a very different costume, had visited Joyce Hammond the previous afternoon under the style of Edward Chaloner.

Arrived at the topmost landing, he turned the knob of the studio-door and went in. The members of the "group" had gone and the room was empty. The sound of the bell, however, brought Joyce from the small upper chamber. As she descended the rickety stairs, he smiled and advanced to meet her.

"Good morning!" he began, gazing at her grave little countenance with obvious admiration.

Joyce set her level brows and red lips and answered him curtly:

"Good morning, Mr. Lichfield!" was her unexpected retort.

The man thus addressed regarded her amazedly.

"There is some misapprehension," he replied; "I am Edward Chaloner, and I have an appointment for a sitting at eleven o'clock."

"Exactly!" intimated Joyce; "and as your wife saw the portrait I took yesterday she was able to recognise in Mr. Edward Chaloner her own profligate husband. As for the name, it is an old alias of yours."

"Are you mad?" stammered the other; "I am Edward Chaloner and I can prove it, though, unluckily, not without notice, for I know no one in Scholes. I have already explained my position to you, Miss Hammond, and I fail to comprehend why you should credit absurd statements as to my identity. But as I have got rid of my beard, you have only to photograph me and send a copy to Dundalk, New Zealand, and you will be told by cable that I am Edward Chaloner, only son of Edward Chaloner, Commissioner of Police for Dundalk, and that I am myself a bachelor. If I am supposed to be married, why not confront me with the lady?"

"She refuses to see you," said Joyce, warmed by his audacity; "even if you were on your death-bed she would not come to you. But you shall see your child — the boy you deserted, to starve or not — as Fate might decide!"

Darting to the foot of the distant stair, she called softly and a little figure crept down it. Joyce caught up her nephew and stepped back across the room.

The boy did not allow her time to speak, but with a cry of "Father!" stretched out his arms and struggled to free himself from Joyce's grasp.

Edward Chaloner recoiled.

"This is a plot!" he cried scornfully; "a contemptible plot to blackmail me. I never saw the child in my life — poor little beggar, what hound has taught him his part in this infernal conspiracy?"

"Well!" ejaculated Joyce; "I did try to think kindly of you, Mr. Lichfield, but I am certain now that you are an unprincipled scoundrel, and I am sorry my sister ever set eyes on you, so there!"

"Your sister!" gasped the other. "Your sister! Gracious heavens, what tangle is this? Surely the child can't be perfect in his fiendish lesson—let me cross-examine him."

Joyce sprang back

"You shan't touch him," she said; "all you can do is to go and—and quickly."

Her advice was not acted upon. "Edward Chaloner" stood as if paralysed, contemplating her.

Suddenly the door behind him was thrust open and a couple of bluecoats, surmounted by spiked helmets, appeared, "Edward Chaloner" was clutched by the elbows and pinioned.

"Very good!" commented a calm voice. "James Lichfield, I arrest you on the charge of forging, at Wellington, New Zealand, a cheque for sixty pounds on the Bank of Australasia, in September of last year. An application will be made in due course for your transmission to Wellington for trial. Anything you say hereafter may be taken down and used in evidence against you."

The speaker, a pompous giant in the uniform of a detective-inspector, stalked into the studio and gained the side of "Edward Chaloner."

CHAPTER III.

The White Scar.

"I AM not the person you imagine me to be, and I warn you that in arresting and detaining me you are rendering yourselves liable to a suit for damages. You see I know a little of the law, my dad was not Police-Commissioner at Dundalk for nothing."

The maker of these remarks folded his arms on the steel bar of the charge-dock which graced the principal police-station in the small town of Scholes, and surveyed disdainfully a group consisting of a detective-inspector and two constables. Behind them, at the charge-desk sat a sergeant, his pen in his fingers. Close to stood Joyce Hammond herself, holding by the hand her shrinking nephew—the child Teddie.

The sergeant looked inquiringly at the detective, who shrugged his shoulders.

"You recognise the prisoner as James Lichfield?" he inquired of Joyce.

Digitized by Google

"The prisoner was identified, sergeant," he said, "from the description furnished to Scotland Yard by the New Zealand authorities. But in any case this young lady, his relative by marriage, knows him to be her brother-in-law, and the child, which is his, recognised him immediately on seeing him. The arrest was effected in Miss Hammond's place of business—where prisoner had no doubt gone to visit his wife, who is staying with her sister. I have left a man to bring on the wife, she being out at the time."

The sturdy official at the charge-desk coughed.

"You recognise the prisoner as James Lichfield?" he inquired of Joyce.

The photographer shook her head.

"My sister saw a portrait of him taken yesterday by me," came the reply, "before he had shaved off his beard; she said it was that of her husband—the portrait, I mean. But I never saw him, to my knowledge."

"Now, youngster," intervened the detective, addressing himself to the child at Joyce's skirts, "tell me who is that in the corner there?"

Teddie clung to Joyce.

"Please," he murmured, "it's—it's like father, but his face isn't hurt any more, and he—he won't smile at me."

"His face isn't hurt any more," repeated the sergeant, rubbing one ear meditatively; "what do you mean by that?"

For answer the boy put a finger to his own soft cheek.

"Father's face was scratched all down here," faltered the sweet treble, "and—and he said it would never go away. A man did it in a fight, with a big knife."

"Phew!" whistled the sergeant, "a scar; where is the description, inspector? the prisoner has no scar."

The other drew out a note-book and read a few lines from it. "James Lichfield," he said; "about twenty-seven years of age, five feet ten inches or thereabouts, but looks taller, muscular figure, grey eyes, straight nose, clean-shaven at date of disappearance, white scar on left cheek—near jaw bone, goes occasionally by the name of Edward Chaloner."

The sergeant had been checking off the various particulars.

"All correct," he decided, "except the scar. Well, the only person who can settle the question is the prisoner's—that is to say, James Lichfield's—wife. Till she can be found I shall not, in the absence of the scar, book the charge against the prisoner. I doubt very much whether I ought to detain him—the scar seems a necessary part of the identification. My men could, of course, keep him under observation."

The inspector twisted his moustache; he was disconcerted by this sudden flaw in his case.

"I should advise," he commenced, but paused; a third constable had entered the station and was saluting.

"Sorry not to have brought the lady, sir," he observed, "but I have seen her, and Lichfield, too—good heavens!" He had broken off to stare at the figure in the dock.

A heavy palm was laid on his shoulders, the palm of the detective-inspector.

"You've seen Lichfield," he asked brusquely; "isn't that him, then?"

The constable stammered.

"It's—it's like him," was the response, "but for the scar on his cheek, sir. The man that Mrs. Lichfield declares to be her husband is dying at a lodging-house by the docks; he was knocked down by a lorry yesterday, and some fatal injury has just developed. He had sent for her this morning secretly and she got his messenger—a lad—to go back with word to Miss Hammond. I screwed it out of him and followed up the trail."

His superior stepped to the charge-dock and raised the steel bar.

"Will you do me the favour to come out, sir?" he requested; "I am a bit of a blunderer, it seems."

Edward Chaloner laughed, relieved in spite of himself.

"Don't apologise to me," he said, "but to Miss Hammond, for disturbing her work and dragging her to this unpleasant quarter of the world."

He crossed the room and held out his hand to Joyce.

"You were sorely tempted to believe in me all the while, weren't you?" he asked; "I saw it in your eyes. Thank you for that much. And now, don't you think you had better go to your sister—they said her husband was dying, didn't they?"

Joyce clasped his strong brown fingers and a hot tear trickled down her cheek.

"I—I'm afraid I said some very harsh things to you!" she rejoined; "you must have thought me awfully unwomanly."

Edward Chaloner pressed the palms in his own.

"I thought you were just the sort of person," he confessed, "whose respect I would most wish to gain—and keep."

He turned to a constable, and spoke with the sharp inflection of habitual command.

"Get me a cab," he ordered—"a four-wheeler." He slipped a hand into his pockets and hauled up some silver. "Here, sergeant," he added, "let your men drink the health of their prisoner when they go off duty."

Twenty minutes later Edward Chaloner and Joyce Hammond stood at the bedside of James Lichfield; they had reached it too late, and the features that were so like those of the photographer's client were set in the stiff mask of death.

Marion Lichfield did not weep.

"It is better so," she said, "but I am glad he wanted me at the last."

* * * * *

Edward Chaloner sat for that second portrait, after all. Indeed, his return to New Zealand was unconscionably delayed by his interest in photography and in Miss Joyce Hammond. Nor did he go back to Dundalk alone; the Day and Electric-light Studios were sold up, their late proprietor having abandoned both single blessedness and a business life. Marion and her son remained in England, provided for by her new and wealthy brother-in-law.

Not until that gentleman had reached New Zealand with his bride, and they were settled in their up-country home, did Edward Chaloner finally solve a riddle that had long haunted him.

"By Jove!" he said one day to his wife, "that beggar Lichfield must have known he was like me—that is the explanation of his impudent alias. Teddie may even be my namesake and I never guessed it. Lucky his father did me no worse harm than giving me a bad quarter of an hour at that confounded police-station in Scholes—the rascal. But there, we will speak nothing but good of the dead—and Teddie's pater."

The Amateur Carpenter.

It is great fun to watch an amateur carpenter. He usually knows how to use tools just about as well as a hen knows how to paint a rose. He may be a good, honest, and even virtuous citizen in other respects, but when he retires to his workroom and strips off his coat and vest for a little recreation with edged tools, it is just as well not to have any of the women folks or children within hearing. The dog may come in if he wants to, but it must be with the understanding that it is at his own risk. It is said that dogs are intelligent. Some dogs are; but the dog that persists in hanging about an amateur carpenter isn't worth the leather it takes to make his collar.

The amateur carpenter always wants to make something without wasting any time. He is never content to go through with a course of experimental processes in wood. If he saws a board it is not to see how well or how straight he can learn to do it, but to make it fit into some mechanical creation of his fertile brain. If he drives a nail it is not to discover the mystery of doing it without splitting either of the surfaces which it joins, or how to keep it from staggering about like a lamp-post on a club night. He drives it, of course, to make the sides of a box stick on.

It is this insatiable constructive passion which gets the amateur carpenter into trouble. If he would be content with using his tools at first to find out how to use them, and afterwards to find out what to use them for, he would get along much better. But no; he must make something. He has an ideal in his head, and he immediately sets to work to carve it out in wood and nails.

By-and-bye, after a great deal of perspiring and muttered utterance, he gets the pieces, the constituent parts, of the thing blocked out; and here he takes a rest and contemplates his blistered palms with considerable self-satisfaction. It looks as though the chief difficulty has been conquered; all that remains to be done is to put the pieces together and the thing will be complete. But, alas for his short-lived confidence! The trials of the amateur carpenter have just begun.

When he buckles to work again, he is astonished to find that the constituent parts of his conception don't harmonise, as you may say, worth a halfpenny. One slants to the north, and the other to the south, one is bigger at the top, and the other at the bottom. Change them round, and it works just the other way, but for the life of him he can't make them so that they will come out even. He tries the sides, and they are four times as bad. One laps over the two ends about an inch each way, and the other one is about an inch too short.

Then the amateur carpenter pours out the vials of his wrath. With one mighty kick he sends the ingredients of his masterpiece flying across the room. The dog gets the piece that is full of half-driven nails just in that portion of his anatomy most vitally connected with his howling apparatus, and the chorus of epithets and yells that ascends from that small back chamber is something awful. To add to his boiling rage, the amateur has severely sprained and otherwise inconvenienced his two most efficient toes, from having forgotten the fact that he had his slippers on instead of his boots when his emotions got the better of him.

On the whole, his first effort cannot be set down as an unqualified success. Still, he does not wish to give up so easily, and, after hobbling about and kicking the dog three or four times with his well foot, to even things up, he sits down and tries to think of something simple to make.

How, for instance, would a doll-table for the little girl do? A square bit of board, with four holes at the four corners, and rounded sticks driven into them, would be the general plan of it. Simple enough, surely! He can do that without any trouble. So up he gets, selects his board, and proceeds to saw off the requisite portion of it. When about half-way through the board the saw sticks, and it will not move either way. The amateur carpenter tugs away for a few minutes, and then once again his choler begins to rise—not his paper-collar; that was up about his ears a good while ago. He jumps up on the bench, plants both feet on the board, grabs the saw-handle, and jerks backward with all his might.

The saw comes out with a rush, and the amateur carpenter swoops down off the bench, and plunges the back of his head into the nail-box. Fortunately his collar protects his scalp somewhat, and he escapes with a vision of two billion stars, and a long raw scratch on the neck.

The saw, however, is now out of the board, and a brilliant thought occurs to the amateur carpenter. He has heard that lard or tallow rubbed on a refractory saw will cause it to glide with the most charming smoothness through the tightest kind of board. So he goes and hunts up the servant, and persuades her to let him take the lard-pail. Armed with this he returns to his stronghold, and the dog—like a thick-headed ass—returns with him. The amateur carpenter besmears the saw for its entire length on both sides with lard an inch deep, and then goes for the board again.

The saw runs easier, but the lard covers up his guiding mark, and he works off on a sort of tangent. It will do, however, for such a rude and simple affair as a home-made doll-table. Now he must bore the holes in the four corners.

He selects a bit of about the right size, screws it into the bit-brace, puts his block over a hole in the bench, weighs it, and proceeds to bore. For a few moments the chips fly in a lively manner, then there is an ominous cracking sound, the bit goes through with a rush, and the amateur carpenter, unable to recover himself, comes down slap on the bench, knocking all the wind out of him, and giving himself a sanguinary nose by banging that member against the edge of the tool-chest.

This ends his recreation for the first day. With a howl of anguish and rage he darts from the room, holding his nose in his hand and yelling for a handkerchief. Finally, after his devoted wife has dropped half-a-dozen bunches of cold keys down his back and gone through the whole list of superstitious remedies for nose-bleed, he recovers, bathes, clothes himself, and returns to his right mind.

GORDON'S DAUGHTER.

HAD anyone suggested to Paul Gordon on his wedding-day, that it is when Fate gives us what we ask that we should beware of her, he would have scoffed at the idea. Had some cynical person gone further and insinuated that possibly five years of life with the sweet creature who stood beside him, looking so gracious and tender in her bridal robes, would change his eager confidence in life into bitter distrust, his resentment would probably have taken a more active form.

She was a charming bride, with her masses of shining brown hair, delicate features and slender grace, and Gordon felt very solemn and humble as he looked down upon her. His vision suddenly became indistinct, and no more fervent prayer ever went up from a full heart than ascended from his as he knelt at the chancel rail beside her, lifting his heart dumbly to his Maker.

In a sort of beautiful vision he saw their life together stretching away from the little West Newton church; going on and on like a long, sunny, peaceful road until it was lost in a happy blurr. With the inspiration of her presence forever beside him, he would live up to his best; he would achieve great things.

Matrimony shatters a good many illusions. Five years from his wedding-day, the genial, great-hearted Gordon was a disappointed, cynical man, whose attitude towards his wife was one of contemptuous toleration, though he was not without a certain appreciation of the humour of his destiny.

Sometimes in the solitude of his library he indulged in a hard, mirthless laugh, as he thought of the difference between his dreams and the reality.

He was a rising man in his profession—that part of his dreams, at least, had come true—but there was no heart-to-heart companion to share the delights of achievement with him—to spur him on when he was weary and disillusioned.

And yet he had married a girl whom any man might have been proud to win. It was the instance of the Ugling Duckling reversed! Helen Gordon was not only beautiful, but there was a certain ethereal quality about her beauty which touched the imagination. At a time when a college training for women was thought to be scarcely a desirable thing, she had been a teacher and paid her own way through college, as her father refused to listen to any such nonsense.

How Gordon had gloried in her intellect and energy. Other girls might be as fair as she, but where was there one who combined beauty, grace and intellect with so much womanly charm? In the days of their courtship they had planned to study together, and it never struck him that it was simply his enthusiasm which had carried her along—that the plans were more his than hers. She was to keep him in touch with literature, to keep him from growing one-sided mentally, as professional men are apt to do.

And, indeed, they had made a beginning, as a very respectable display of French and German books which lined the library shelves—to which Gordon's eyes sometimes turned with a bitter sneer — attested. Then imperceptibly some inherited languour of the little bride's, which had until then been dormant, began to assert itself. She never openly opposed his wishes, but there was always some excellent excuse for putting off the work they had planned to do together. The first year of their married life passed and Gordon began to realise that he was pursuing a will-o'-the-wisp—realised it with a dull pain, a deep, inward hurt which rankled the more that it was hidden beneath a calm manner.

He did not confide his plans to her now, for he had discovered that it only wearied her, though she listened to him in a patient, uncomplaining way. Then hope awakened once more in his heart. It would be all different when the baby came! He took all the blame for the sordid failure of their married life upon himself. He was a brute and he rated himself soundly for the irritation that had grown up in his breast against her.

The baby, of course, would be a boy. In the indomitable strength of his desire he never once doubted that—never admitted the possibility that it could be otherwise. He was happy once more and his imagination ran away with him. Long before the little stranger appeared, he had gone with him step by step through his babyhood, bought him a pony and taught him to ride, and shared all his boyish joys and sorrows. He even went further and fancied him a great lad to whom his heart went out with a mighty tenderness as he pointed out to him his own mistakes and tried to shield him from similar ones. And then came the stupefying intelligence that his boy was a girl!

At this new disappointment, a wild, unreasoning bitterness against mother and child surged through him. His heart-hunger was turned back upon itself once more. He was one of those pronounced masculine creatures to whom the society of his own sex is indispensable. He had had one desolating glimpse of how divine a thing the companionship of woman may be—one glimpse which had vanished and left him lonely for evermore. It was this great, aching emptiness in his life that the boy was to fill.

Wrath and repulsion filled his soul as he thought of the woman creature who could prove so alluring and so delusive!

"A girl!" he exclaimed bitterly. "What use have I for a girl! She will grow up and gossip and flirt and"—in the wild turmoil of his disappointment he said it aloud with brutal emphasis—"disappoint some other man as her mother has disappointed me!"

From that time, Gordon was a changed man. He devoted himself with restless ardour to his profession, treated his wife with open disdain and did not scruple to show his scorn for the pettiness of her interests. Her time was pretty evenly divided between shopping and watching the occupants of the opposite houses with a morbid curiosity about their goings and comings.

Poor little Mrs. Gordon! Through some fatal inheritance a sudden numbness fell upon her higher nature with marriage. As Mrs. Gordon, she felt that all reason for strenuousness was removed. The exquisite, soulful quality of her beauty gradually disappeared, leaving a pretty woman with a face whose plumpness was rapidly becoming fat, and whose calmness would soon be called phlegmatic.

Mindful of her vow to love, honour, and obey, she grew daily more punctilious about details as she neglected essentials. It was all nonsense now that they were married—that idea of Paul's about her studying! She would not, could not study and read, but she bore his taunts in silence, and, to do her justice, really thought him the finest man in the world, and was convinced that it was his right to be disagreeable to her if he chose.

She would not study German or keep up her music, but she never failed to see that his clothes were well looked after. She always ordered dinner with direct reference to his tastes and never complained if it was kept waiting until cold; though the cook usually made up for the forbearance of her mistress in this matter.

Her very humility increased his bitterness towards her. She was so willing to do everything for him—except the one thing that he cared for. Her mild, obtuse manner maddened him at times until he could have struck her. But being a gentleman, he said cutting things instead, which she heard in silence, and resented only by an occasional flush.

As the years went by, they saw less and less of each other. Gordon usually ate his meals in silence, and excused himself as soon as he had finished. But his wife never complained. There were times when he looked at her with the savage desire to rise and slay burning in his heart, she put him so deeply in the wrong. An observer, he knew, would have said: "What a brute of a man Gordon is, and what a sweet little wife he has!" There were grim lines about his mouth which marked the hours that he had spent musing upon the power of sweet little women to wreck a man's faith and hope.

No other child came to them, and the offending daughter flourished and expanded into a full-fledged young lady before he had ceased to regard her as an interloper. She had been kept out of his way as much as possible, and regarded him with a mixture of awe and pride, for middle-age had brought him an added brusqueness of manner and something very like fame in his profession: while it had returned to Mrs. Gordon in flesh whatever it had filched from her in spirit.

There was too much abstract justice in Gordon's make-up for him to ignore the fact that his behaviour to his family was outrageous. If his wife had stood up and resented it, he sometimes told himself—had shown some spirit, some independence, he would have respected her and might, in time, have become reconciled to his disappointment. But to his arrogant, outspoken nature, her humility was nauseating.

As for the child—she had grown up on the same plan, he supposed. How could he know that, though she loved her mother in a tender, protecting way, she worshipped her stern, forbidding father as one might worship a god—with fear and trembling? Didn't she always address him in a half-frightened manner, and was not her attitude a reflection of her mother's in every way? He smiled cynically as he pictured them, these two meek women, acting so absurdly as if they lived only by his gracious permission!

The son that he had dreamt of was like a dear, long lost child! Life had brought him fame and wealth—and only denied him his dearest wish. Why, then, should he complain?

Thus he argued with himself in bitter scorn—argued against the loneliness of a lifetime which, at fifty, was becoming tragic. He was growing weak—asinine, he told himself, but he could not strangle the longing for the affection of his own flesh and blood.

He sometimes lingered over dinner in these days indulging in awkward pleasantries while his wife and daughter grew flushed and pleased and a trifle nervous in their eagerness to show their appreciation of his attentions. Then he would be unusually churlish for days, from a queer shame at his own self-consciousness in their presence.

His daughter, he noticed, resembled him. It was the day after this fact fixed his attention that he invited her to go to the theatre with him. There was ripple of subdued excitement in the house at this which annoyed him almost beyond endurance. He would have liked them to act as if he had been a model father from her infancy upwards.

He was beginning to feel a shy interest in her, an interest which he was not yet ready to admit to himself and which it went against his pride to have them notice. After all, she was his child—his daughter. Once he repeated the words softly to himself, and a queer, happy thrill went through him.

And then, one day, just as he was beginning to understand that there might, after all, be some happiness left for him in the possession of this neglected daughter, just as he had begun to feel a new pleasure in existing, there was a rap at his door, and the maid announced "Mr. Langley." Gordon suddenly remembered to have seen him at the house often of late, and a quick presentiment shot through his mind.

He should not have her! All the fierce, impetuous will power of his youth leapt up in him at once. There was no possible objection to be made to this suitor, as he knew; but he would positively refuse his consent—so easy it is for a just man to become an autocrat at times!

So Mr. Langley was dismissed, and there followed a stormy interview with his wife, the storm being upon his side and the tears and submission on hers.

"She shall never marry him, and the sooner you tell her my wishes in the matter the better," he finished curtly, as he ended the interview and retired to the library.

Pauline was strangely quiet when her mother told her. She did not burst into tears, though for a moment her face grew very pale.

"Is my father in the library?" she asked in a low, cool voice which made her mother vaguely uneasy.

"Yes, dear," she fluttered, "but it's no use pleading with him. You know how decided he is. I have never gone against his wishes—" (she spoke in perfect good faith), "and of course he knows best."

The girl looked at her mother for a moment, and something very like pity flitted across her face.

"Don't worry, mamma," she said quietly; "I am going to plead with him," and she left the room without further remark.

A gruff "Come in" answered her rap at the library door. Her father was writing, and did not look up.

She waited patiently until the sharp, inquiring "Well?" signified that he was ready to listen to her. Her face flushed painfully at the contempt in his tones, and for the first time in her life she felt that things should not be thus between father and child. Before she could speak he addressed her peremptorily:

"I have nothing to add to what I have said to your mother. I suppose that is what you wish to see me about."

He sat back in his chair and looked at her with just a gleam of curiosity in his deep eyes. He was wondering what she would do; but of course she would retire submissively. The gleam deepened into real interest as she began to speak.

"Have you any real objection to Ralph—Mr. Langley's—character?" she asked, her voice gaining steadiness as she proceeded.

"None whatever," he replied, with bland conciseness. "I simply do not choose that he should marry my daughter."

And he turned to his desk as if the incident were closed.

"One moment!"

Her voice fairly rang out, and she seemed to grow taller as she spoke. All trace of timidity and embarrassment had vanished, and Gordon felt a queer tingling of the nerves as he watched her. Her blue eyes blazed into his with an expression as determined and indomitable as his own, but her voice was perfectly level, as she said:

"I have simply come to tell you that I shall marry whom I choose. That is a question that no human being has a right to decide for me, much less a father who has never in my life shown the slightest interest in me."

She did not move but stood looking at him with a steady, inflexible gaze in which he recognised—himself! There was no bravado in her manner, but there was something that stirred his heart as it had not been stirred for years. For a long moment they looked at each other; then the girl's lip quivered. But it was with wounded affection, not fear. For the life of him her father could not have spoken. He rose, and, with a profound bow, opened the door and held it for her to pass out.

When it was closed once more, and he was safe in the solitude of the library, an exultant smile rested on his lips.

"She has some spirit!" he murmured, half-aloud; "some pluck!" Then, after a reminiscent pause: "Why, it's almost as interesting as having a boy to deal with. Why hasn't she shown that side of her character before?" With fine inconsistency he forgot that he had never given her an opportunity.

Meantime, trembling from the reaction of her revolt, his daughter had gone to her room. She laughed hysterically as she pictured her mother's consternation at what she had done.

From what she knew of her father's character, she felt sure that the rupture was final. He would never forgive her, and she would never retract! She, too, was a Gordon! At least, there would be one more dinner in this strange home of hers—and she laughed a little bitterly and began to dress.

Her father's eyes sought hers with a satirical light in their depths as she entered the dining-room that night, but hers leapt to meet them unflinchingly. She never knew that had they avoided his by so much as a hair's-breadth, she would have lost what came to be to her in after years one of the great joys of her life—her father's loving companionship.

So she did not repent! There was a wild, triumphant joy in Gordon's heart, for he had feared that she might—that at dinner she would appear as a suppliant for his forgiveness. Here at last was a foeman worthy of his steel!

He greeted her with exaggerated politeness and held a slip of paper towards her. She took it wonderingly, looked at it for a moment, then at him, in bewilderment. It was a cheque for a hundred pounds!

"Since you are going to marry when and whom you please," he explained suavely, "it seems well that you should have a little extra money."

His tone was mocking, but by some subtle instinct, Pauline knew that she had pleased him better than she had ever done in her life before.

"Papa!" she exclaimed in a doubtful, questioning tone—"Papa!"—and then her eyes looked wistfully but fearlessly into his, and something of his nature was revealed to her—she understood! With a quick, impetuous movement she was at his side and her arms were round his neck.

IN CONFIDENCE.

Conducted by MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.—MADGE MORRIS.]

"Three old Maids" are tired of single blessedness and write to ask whether they are too old to get married. They have a snug little sum of money between them, and, as the eldest is only thirty-six, they feel there ought to be a chance for them yet. Certainly, you should not give up hope, any of you; a woman is very often in her prime at thirty-six, and, in my opinion, people who marry late in life are often far happier than those who rush red hot into family cares when they are too young to understand their responsibilities.

"Baden" is nineteen and in love. He does not want to marry till he is two or three and twenty, but his friends are warning him about long courtships. Should he marry now?———Certainly you should wait. Do not mind what other people tell you. Long courtships are more often good than evil, as they enable a young couple to put their love to the test of time, and whether the result is a breaking off or marriage, the long courtship will have proved good. If the pair break it off, through tiring of each other, or seeing unsuspected faults, then is it not better that they should find it out before tying themselves together for life? And if you do marry at the end of the time, your long devotion to each other will prove that yours was an ideal love match.

"Madge."—I very much sympathise with you, but I fear the fact that he visits the other girl so constantly, and is so reserved about it, rather suggests that his affection for you has waned. One can generally tell this when told that anyone's love for you is "just the same." Those words have an ominous ring, and generally mean that while he still thinks you are a most charming and attractive girl, there is somebody else who—well, whom he is in love with. I should advise you to take no further steps in the matter, beyond telling him that while he continues these visits, all must be regarded as over between you. If he really loves you, that will soon bring him to his senses, and if, after all, he is merely flirting with the other girl, as is very likely the case, he will soon drop it.

You tell me, "Anxious One," you were introduced to a young man at a bazaar, and went out with him several times, and then you found that he was going out with other young women as well. You said you would have nothing more to do with him if he was going to treat you like that. He now makes mischief with everyone you go out with. You ask if I consider it a right spirit for any young man to have. No; I think he must be a very mean, despicable young man. You were quite right to give him up. Your letters are no trouble; write as often as you like. I am only too pleased to be able to help you.

"Nom de Plume."—I do not understand from your letter whether the lady said she was fond of the other man or not. If so, I should advise you to be firm, and to let her see that you will not allow any further communication between them if she is to be your wife. If you were a young man, I should advise you against marrying a woman who received attentions from a married man, but as you are a widower advanced in years, and she is a widow, things may be looked at in a more practical light, and as you are fond of her and know she will make a good wife, I should just come to a good understanding with her about the other man, and get her to definitely renounce him.

You say, "Tyro," that you are soon to meet the young lady for the first time, having as yet only known each other by sight, and you want to know how to conduct yourself.———I should begin by saying how long you have been wishing to meet her, and how strange it is that those you are most anxious to know seem the farthest off. You should say this in a nice tender way, without any formality. As she is a schoolmistress, you won't find it so difficult to talk and interest her. She must be educated and well read, and be more or less interested in her work. There you have a chance of winning her appreciation by talking about books and her experiences. Do not appear embarrassed, but be quite natural. School-mistresses are sensible girls and hate nonsense. They like a man to be himself. You say she cycles. Well, find out which roads she likes best, and make it your business to be pretty often on them yourself. Also, why not ask her to come for a ride? A man has more chance of showing attention to a girl on a cycle ride than elsewhere. Besides, the charm of the country after her confinement in a schoolroom will put her in just the right sort of mood for your purpose. Above all, be sure you are really fond of her before going too far.

THE LOVERS OF YVONNE

By RAFAEL SABATINI.

CHAPTER XXI.

Of the Bargain that St. Auban Drove with My Lord Cardinal.

FROM the wounded man's bedside I wended my steps back to the Rue St. Antoine, resolved to start for Blois that very night; and beside me walked Montrésor, with bent head, like a man deep in thought.

At my door I paused to take my leave of the lieutenant, for I was in haste to have my preparations made and to be gone. But Montrésor appeared not minded to be dismissed thus easily.

"What plan have you formed?" he asked.

"The only one there is to form—to set out for Canaples at once."

"Hum!" he grunted, and again was silent. Then suddenly throwing back his head, "By Heaven!" he cried, "I care not what comes of it, I'll tell you what I know. Lead the way to your chamber, M. de Luynes, and delay your departure until you have heard me."

Surprised as much by his words as by the tones in which he uttered them, which was that of a man who is angry with himself, I passively did as I was bidden.

Once within my little ante-chamber, he turned the key with his own hands, and pointing to the door of my bedroom—

"In there, Monsieur," quoth he, "we shall be safe from listeners."

Deeper grew my astonishment at all this mystery as we passed into the room beyond.

"Now, M. de Luynes," he cried, flinging down his hat, "for no apparent reason I am about to commit treason. I am about to betray the hand that pays me."

"If no reason exists, why do so evil a deed?" I inquired calmly. "I have learnt during our association to wish you well, Montrésor; if by telling me that which your tongue burns to tell, you shall have cause for shame, the door is yonder. Go before harm is done, and leave me alone to fight my battle out."

He stood up, and for a moment he seemed to waver; then dismissing his doubts with an abrupt gesture, he sat down again.

"There is no wrong in what I do. Right is with you, M. de Luynes, and if I break faith with the might I serve, it is because that might is an unjust one; I do but betray the false to the true, and there can be little shame in such an act. Moreover, I have a reason—but let that be."

He was silent for a moment then he resumed—

"Most of that which you have learnt from Malpertuis to-night I myself could have told you. Yes, St. Auban has carried Canaples' letter to the Cardinal already. I heard from his lips to-day, for I was present at the interview, how the document had been wrested from Malpertuis. For your sake, so that you might learn all he knew, I sought the fellow out, and having found him in the Rue des Tournelles, I took you thither."

In a very fever of excitement I listened.

"To take up the thread of the story where Malpertuis left off, let me tell you that St. Auban sought an audience with Mazarin this morning, and by virtue of a note which he desired an usher to deliver to his Eminence, he was admitted, the first of all the clients that for hours had thronged the ante-room. As in the instance of the audience to Eugène de Canaples, so upon this occasion did it chance that the Cardinal's fears touching St. Auban's purpose had been aroused, for he bade me stand behind the curtains in his cabinet.

"The Marquis spoke bluntly enough, and with rude candour he stated that since Mazarin had failed to bring the Canaples estates into his family by marriage, he came to set before his Eminence a proof so utter of Canaples' treason that it would enable him to snatch the estates by confiscation. The Cardinal may have been staggered by St. Auban's bluntness, but his avaricious instincts led him to stifle his feelings, and bid the Marquis to set this proof before him. But St. Auban had a bargain to drive—a preposterous one, methought. He demanded that in return for his delivering into the hands of Mazarin the person of Armand de Canaples together with an incontestable proof that the Chevalier was in league with the Frondeurs, and had offered to place a large sum of money at their disposal, he was to receive as recompense the demesne of Canaples on the outskirts of Blois together with one-third of the confiscated estates. At first Mazarin gasped at his audacity, then laughed at him, whereupon St. Auban politely craved his Eminence's permission to withdraw. This the Cardinal however refused him, and bidding him remain, he sought to bargain with him. But the Marquis replied that he was unversed in the ways of trade and barter, and that he had no mind to enter into them. From bargaining the Cardinal passed on to threatening, and from threatening to whining and so on until in the end, St. Auban preserving a firm demeanour, the comedy was played out and Mazarin fell in with his proposals and terms."

"Good Heavens!" I cried. "And has St. Auban set out?"

"He starts to-morrow and I go with him. When finally the Cardinal had consented, the Marquis demanded and obtained from him a promise in writing, signed and sealed by Mazarin, that he should receive a third of the Canaples estates and the demesne on the outskirts of Blois in exchange for the body of Armand de Canaples, dead or alive, and a proof of treason sufficient to warrant his arrest and the confiscation of his estates. Next, seeing in what regard the Seigneur is held by the people of Blois, and fearing that his arrest might be opposed by many of his adherents, the Marquis has demanded a troop of twenty men. This Mazarin has also granted him, intrusting the command of the troop to me, under St. Auban. Further, the Marquis has stipulated that the greatest secrecy is to be observed, and has expressed his purpose of going upon this enterprise disguised and masked; for, as he rightly opines, when months hence he enters into possession of the demesne of Canaples in the character of purchaser, did the Bloisois recognise in him the man who sold the Chevalier, his life would stand in hourly peril."

I heard him through patiently enough; yet, when he stopped, my pent-up feelings burst all bonds, and I resolved there and then to go in quest of that Judas, St. Auban, and made an end of his plotting for all time. But Montrésor restrained me, showing me how futile such a course must prove, and how I risked losing all chance of aiding those at Canaples.

He was right. First I must warn the Chevalier; afterwards I would deal with St. Auban.

Someone knocked at that moment, and with the entrance of Michelot my talk with Montrésor came perforce to an end. For Michelot brought me the news that for days I had been waiting—Madame de Chevreuse had returned to Paris at last.

But for Montrésor's remonstrances it is likely that I should have set out forthwith to wait upon her. I permitted myself, however, to be persuaded that the lateness of the hour would render my visit unwelcome, and so I determined in the end, albeit grudgingly, to put off my departure for Blois until the morrow.

Noon had but struck from Notre Dame next day as I mounted the steps of the Hotel de Luynes. My swagger and that brave suit of pearl-grey velvet with its silver lace bore me unchallenged past the gorgeous Swiss who stood majestic in the doorway. But for the first mincing lackey I chanced upon, more was needed to gain me an audience. And so, as I did not choose to speak my name, I drew a ring from my finger, and bade him bear it to the Duchess.

He obeyed me in this, and presently returning, he bowed low and begged of me to follow him; for, as I had thought, albeit Madame de Chevreuse might not know to whom that ring belonged, yet the arms of Luynes carved upon the stone had sufficed to insure an interview.

I was ushered into a pretty boudoir, hung in blue and gold, which overlooked the garden, and wherein, reclining upon a couch, with a book of Bois-Robert's verses in her white and slender hand, I found my beautiful aunt.

Of this famous lady who was the cherished friend and more than sister of Anne of Austria, much has been written—much that is good, and more, far more, that is ill; for those who have a queen for friend shall never lack for enemies. But those who have praised and those who have censured have at least been at one touching her marvellous beauty. At the time whereof I write, it is not possible that she could be less than forty-six, and yet her figure was slender and shapely, and still endowed with the grace of girlhood; her face delicate of tint, and little marked by time, or even by the sufferings to which, in the late king's reign, Cardinal de Richelieu had subjected her; her eyes were blue and peaceful as a summer sky; her hair was the colour of ripe corn. He would be a hardy guesser who set her age at so much as thirty.

My appearance she greeted by letting fall her book, and lifting up her hands—the loveliest in France—she uttered a little cry of surprise.

"Is it really you, Gaston?" she asked. Albeit it was growing wearisome to be thus greeted by all to whom I showed myself, yet I studied courtesy in my reply, and then, 'neath the suasion of her kindliness, I related all that had befallen me since first I had journeyed to Blois in Andrea de Mancini's company, withholding, however, all allusions to my feelings towards Yvonne. Why betray them, when they were doomed to be stifled in the breast that begat them? But Madame de Chevreuse had not been born a woman and lived six and forty years to no purpose.

"And this maid with as many suitors as Penelope, is she very beautiful?" she inquired slyly.

"France does not hold her equal!" I answered, falling like a simpleton into the trap she had set me.

"This to me?" quoth she archly. "Oh, fie, Gaston! Your evil ways have taught you as little gallantry as dissimulation." And her merry ripple of laughter showed me how in six words I had betrayed that which I had been at such pains to hide.

But before I could, by protestations, plunge deeper than I stood already, the Duchess turned the conversation adroitly to the matter of the letter of hers wherein she had bidden me wait upon her.

A cousin of mine, one Marion de Luynes, who like myself had, through the evil of his ways, become an outcast from his family, was lately dead. Unlike me, however, he was no adventurous soldier of fortune, but a man of peace, with an estate in Provence that had a rent-roll of five thousand livres a year. On his deathbed he had cast about him for an heir, unwilling that his estates should swell the fortunes of the family that in life had disowned him. Into his ear some kindly angel had whispered my name, and the memory that I had shared with him the frown of our house, and that my plight must be passing pitiful, had set up a bond of sympathy between us which had led him to will his lands to me. Of Madame de Chevreuse, who clearly was the patron saint of those of her first husband's nephews who chanced to tread ungodly ways, my cousin Marion had besought that she should see to the fulfilment of his last wishes.

My brain reeled beneath the first shock of that unlooked-for news. Already I saw myself transformed from a needy adventurer into a gentleman of fortune, and methought my road to Yvonne lay open, all obstacles removed. But swiftly there followed the thought of my own position; and truly it seemed that a cruel irony lay in the matter wherein things had fallen out, since did I declare myself to be alive, and claim the Provence estates, the Cardinal's claws would be quick to seize me.

Thus much I told Madame de Chevreuse; but her answer cheered me, and said much for my late cousin's prudence.

"Nay," she cried. "Marion was ever shrewd. Knowing that men who live by the sword, as you have lived, are often wont to die by the sword, and that suddenly at times, he has made provision that in the event of your being dead his estates shall come to me, who have been the most indulgent of his relatives. This, my dear Gaston, has already taken place, for we believed you dead; and therein fortune has been kind to you, for now, while receiving the revenues of your lands, which the world will look upon as mine, I shall contrive that they reach you wherever you may be, until such a time as you may elect to come to life again."

Now, but for the respect in which I held her, I could have taken the pretty Duchess in my arms and kissed her.

Restraining myself, however, I contented myself by kissing her hand, and told her of the journey I was going, then craved another boon of her. No matter what the issue of that journey, and whether I went alone or accompanied, I was determined to quit France and repair to Spain. There I would abide until the Parliament, the Court, or the knife of some chance assassin, or even nature herself, should strip Mazarin of his power.

Now at the Court of Spain it was well-known that my aunt's influence was vast, and so the boon I craved was that she should aid me to a position in the Spanish service that would allow me during my exile to find occupation and perchance renown. To this my aunt most graciously acceded; and when at length I took my leave, with such gratitude in my heart that what words I could think of seemed but clumsily to express it, I bore in the breast of my doublet a letter to Don Juan de Cordova, a noble of great prominence at the Spanish Court, and in the pocket of my knickerbockers a purse of two hundred gold pistoles, as welcome as they were heavy.

CHAPTER XXII.

Of my Second Journey to Canaples.

AN hour after I quitted the Hotel de Luynes, Michelot and I left Paris by the barrier St. Michel and took the Orleans road. How different it looked in the bright June sunshine from the picture which it had presented to our eyes on that February evening, four months ago, when last we had set out upon that same journey!

Not only in nature had a change been wrought, but in my very self. My journey then had been aimless, and I had scarcely known whither I was bound nor had I fostered any great concern thereon. Now I rode in hot haste, with a determined purpose, a man of altered fortunes and altered character.

Into Choisy we clattered at a brisk pace, but at the sight of the inn of the Connetable such memories surged up, that I was forced to draw rein and call for a cup of Anjou, which I drank in the saddle. Thereafter we rode without interruption through Longjumeau, Arpajon, and Etrechy, and so well did we use our horses that as night fell we reached Etampes.

From inquiries that Michelot had made on the road we learnt that no troop such as that which rode with St. Auban had lately passed that way, so that 'twas clear we were in front of them.

But scarce had we finished supper in the little room which I had hired at the Gros Paon, when, from below, a stamping of hoofs, the jangle of arms, and the shouts of many men told me that we were overtaken.

Clearly I did not burn with a desire to linger; but, rather it seemed to me, that although night had closed in, black and moonless, we must set out again, and push on to Monnerville, albeit our beasts were worn, and the distance a good three leagues.

With due precaution we effected our departure, and there after had a spur been needed to speed us on our way, that spur we had in the knowledge that St. Auban came close upon our heels. At Monnerville we slept, and next morning we were early afoot; by four o'clock in the afternoon we had reached Orleans, whence, with fresh horses, we pursued our journey as far as Meung, where we lay that night.

There we were joined by a sturdy rascal whom Michelot enlisted into my service, seeing that not only did my means allow, but the enterprise upon which I went might perchance demand another body-servant. This recruit was a swart, powerfully-built man, of about my own age; trusty, and a lover of hard knocks, as Michelot, who had long counted him among his friends, assured me. He owned the euphonious name of Abdon.

I spent twenty pistoles in suitable raiment and a horse for him, and as we left Meung next day the knave cut a brave enough figure, that added not a little to my importance to have at my heels.

This, however, so retarded our departure, that night had fallen by the time we reached Blois. Still our journey had been a passing swift one. We had left Paris on a Monday the fourth of June—I have good cause to remember, since on that day I entered both upon my thirty-second year and my altered fortunes. On the evening of Wednesday we reached Blois, having covered a distance of forty-three leagues in less than three days.

Bidding Michelot carry my valise to the hostelry of the Vigne d'Or, and there await my coming, I called to Abdon to attend me, and rode on, jaded and travel-stained though I was, to Canaples, realising fully that there was no time to lose.

Old Guilbert, who came in answer to my knock at the door of the Château, looked askance when he beheld me; and when I bade him carry my compliments to the Chevalier, with the message that I desired immediate speech of him on a matter of the gravest moment, he shook his grey head and protested that it would be futile to obey me. Yet in the end, when I had insisted, he went upon my errand, but only to return with a disturbed countenance, to tell me that the Chevalier refused to see me.

"But I must speak to him, Guilbert," I exclaimed, setting foot upon the top step. "I have travelled expressly from Paris."

The man stood firm and again shook his head.

"I beseech you not to insist, Monsieur; M. le Chevalier has sworn to dismiss me if I permit you to set foot within the Château."

"Good Heavens! This is madness! I seek to serve him," I cried, my temper rising fast. "At least, Guilbert, will you tell Mademoiselle that I am here, and that I——"

"I may carry no more messages for you, Monsieur," he broke in. "Listen! There is M. le Chevalier."

In reality I could hear the old knight's voice, loud and shrill with anger; and a moment later, Louis, his manservant, came across the hall.

"Guilbert," he commanded harshly, "close the door; the night air is keen."

My cheeks aflame with anger, I still made one last attempt to gain an audience.

"Master Louis," I exclaimed, "will you do me the favour to tell M. de Canaples——?"

"You are wasting time, Monsieur," he interrupted. "M. de Canaples will not see you. He bids you close the door, Guilbert."

"By Heaven! He shall see me!"

"The door, Guilbert!"

I took a step forward, but before I could gain the threshold the door was slammed in my face; and as I stood there, quivering with anger and disappointment, I heard the bolts being shot within.

I turned with an oath.

"Come, Abdon," I growled, as I climbed once more into the saddle. "let us leave the fool to the fate he has chosen."

CHAPTER XXIII.

Of how St. Auban Came to Blois.

In silence we rode back to Blois. Not that I lacked matter for conversation. Anger and chagrin at the thought that I had come upon this journey to earn naught but an insult and to have a door slammed in my face made my gorge rise until it went near to choking me. I longed to revile Canaples aloud; but Abdon's was not the ear into which I might pour the hot words that welled up to my lips.

Yet, if silent, the curses that I heaped upon the Chevalier's crassness were none the less fervent, and to myself I thought with grim relish of how soon and how dearly he would pay for the affront he had put upon me.

That satisfaction, however, endured not long; for presently I bethought me of how heavily the punishment would fall upon Yvonne, and yet of how she would be left to the mercy of St. Auban, whom the warrant from Mazarin would invest with almost any and every power at Canaples.

I ground my teeth at the sudden thought, and for a moment I was on the point of going back and forcing my way into the Château, at the sword point if necessary, to warn and save the Chevalier in spite of himself, and unthanked.

It was not in such a fashion that I had thought to see my mission to Canaples accomplished; I had dreamt of gratitude, and gratitude unbars the door to much. Nevertheless, whether or not I earned it, I must return and succeed where, for want of insistence, I had failed a while ago.

Of a certainty I should have acted thus, but that at the very moment upon which I formed the resolution Abdon drew my attention to a dark shadow by the roadside, not twenty paces in front of us. This proved to be the motionless figure of a horseman.

So soon as I was assured of it, I reined in my horse, and taking a pistol from the holster I levelled it at the shadow, accompanying the act with a sonorous, "Who goes there?"

The shadow stirred, and Michelot's voice answered me:

"'Tis I, Monsieur. They have arrived. I came to warn you."

"Who have arrived?" I shouted.

"The soldiers. They are lodged at the Lys de France."

Comfort for Rheumatism Sufferers.

It Saves You From Othee Ailments.

A medical authority has recently advanced a very strange theory. It is that persons who suffer from rheumatism, neuralgia, and gout, are saved thereby from catching common illnesses. The acid in the blood which causes these ailments prevents the development of other diseases. However this may be we imagine that sufferers from rheumatism would be glad to get rid of it and would take the risk of contracting other illnesses. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are an unfailing cure for neuralgia and rheumatism and a proof of their efficacy against the latter ailment is proved by the case of Mr. John Griffiths, the Steward of the Oswestry Conservative Club. He says:—"Three years ago I contracted typhoid fever. For six long months I was as weak as a child. After that I gradually began to recover strength, but only very slowly, and I found that the disease has left me with rheumatism in its most acute form. My legs and feet became so stiff that it amounted to absolute torture to walk about. My back was weak also, and what with the weakness and rheumatism I began to think seriously that I should have to retire from active life altogether.

"All this time I was being regularly attended by my doctor, but he did not seem to be able to pull me together again. My brother, who lives in Middleton-in-Teesdale, sent me a box of Charles Forde's Bile Beans, and I tried them as I had done other medicines. But they proved widely different. By the time the first box was done I found to my great pleasure that they had given me considerable relief. The pains and the stiffness were not nearly so severe. I got a second box, and the good I had reaped was still further increased. I persevered with them, and, to cut a long story of gradual yet effective recovery short, after taking four boxes I was completely freed from rheumatism. What is better still, it has gone for good.

"I am now able to get about and do my work as if I had never had a day's illness in my life." From every chemist of repute Bile Beans may be had for one and three halfpence or two and nine per box, but they are never sold loose.

An oath was the only comment I made as I turned the news over in my mind. I must return to Canaples.

Then another thought occurred to me. The Chevalier was capable of going to extremes to keep me from entering his house; he might, for instance, greet me with a blunderbuss. It was not the fear of that which deterred me, but the fear that did a charge of lead get mixed with my poor brains before I had said what I went to say, matters would be no better and there would be one poor knave the less to adorn the world.

"What shall we do, Michelot?" I groaned, appealing in my despair to my henchman.

"Might it not be well to seek speech with M. de Montrésor?" quoth he.

I shrugged my shoulders. Nevertheless, after a moment's deliberation, I determined to make an attempt. If I succeeded, something might come of it.

And so I pushed on to Blois, with my knaves close at my heels.

Up the Rue Vieille we proceeded with caution, for the hostelry of the Vigne d'Or, where Michelot had hired me a room, fortunately overlooking the street, fronted the Lys de France, where St. Auban and his men were housed.

I gained that room of mine without mishap, and my first action was to deal summarily with a fat and well-roasted capon which the landlord set before us, for an empty stomach is a poor comrade in a desperate situation. That meal, washed down with the best part of a bottle of red Anjou, did much to restore me alike in body and in mind.

From my open window I gazed across the street at the Lys de France. The door of the common room, opening upon the street, was set wide, and across the threshold came a flood of light, in which there flitted the black figures of maybe a dozen amazed rustics, drawn thither for all the world as bats are drawn to a glare.

And there they hovered, with open mouths and stupid eyes, harkening to the din of voices that floated out on the tranquil air, the snatches of ribald songs, the raucous bursts of laughter, the clink of glasses, the clank of steel, the rattle of dice, and the strange soldier oaths that fell with every throw, and which to them must have sounded almost as words of some foreign tongue.

While I stood by my window, the landlord entered my room, and, coming up to me. "Thank heaven they are not housed at the Vigne d'Or," he said. "It will take Maître Bernard a week to rid his house of the stench of leather. They are part of a stray company that is on its way to fight the Spaniards," he informed me; "but methinks they will be forced to spend two or three days at Blois. Their horses are sadly jaded, and will need that rest before they can take the road again, thanks to the pace at which their boy of an officer must have led them. There is a gentleman with them who wears a mask. 'Tis whispered that he is a prince of the blood, who has made a vow not to uncover his face until this war be ended, in expiation of some sin committed in mad Paris."

I heard him in silence, and when he had done, I thanked him for his information. So, this was the story that the crafty St. Auban had spread abroad to lull suspicion touching the real nature of their presence, until their horses should be fit to undertake the return journey to Paris, or until he should have secured the person of M. de Canaples.

A Book Worth Reading.

An interesting historical novel has just been written by Mr. George C. Wallis (an old contributor to Short Stories), under the title "The Children of the Sphinx." The hero is a son of Rameses, King of Egypt, who goes through a number of startling adventures in Egypt, Syria, and on the Great Sea. It is a stirring story, and is well worth the six shillings asked for it

Long, Indeed!

Bessie: "He was very impudent. He put his arm round me twice." Jessie: "My! What a long arm he must have!"

To Keep the Orders.

Widower (to son): "I don't like that girl you want to marry, Charlie." Son: "I'm glad to hear it, guv'nor. Now I know I haven't any cause to be jealous."

How to Do It.

Flora (who has aspirations): "Don't you think women can do a great deal to elevate the stage?" Ted: "It wouldn't be necessary if they'd lower their hats."

An Heirloom.

Brace: "Among my dearest treasures is the watch my father carried when he was a young man." Bagley: "Would you mind letting me see it?" Brace: "Certainly not, but it is temporarily in the possession of my —er—father's brother."

Selfish Papa.

Little Nell: "I don't like my papa one bit. He's awful selfish." Mamma: "Is he?" Little Nell: "Yes. He nearly sat down on my dollie, an' then, instead of takin' another chair, he took her chair right away from her, an' left her on the hard floor."

Her First Chance.

He (accepted): "You say you were never engaged before?" She: "Yes." He: "How does that happen? I thought all women usually had three or four engagements." She (guilelessly): "Well, I presume I shall, too. You see, this is the first chance I've had."

Never Se n the Carrots.

A young married lady was explaining the difference between silver and electro to a small domestic, and said: "Mary, you will always find a 'lion' on anything that is real silver." "Yes, mum," said Mary, "I'll remember, and I've heard say as there is always carrots on gold, though I ain't seen them."

Making Orders Sure.

Junior Partner: "Well, I think" (puff) "I'll go out in the trade and see if I can get a few orders (puff, puff). Senior Partner: "That's right. Don't fail to take along some of those cigars you smoke and offer them to people." Junior Partner: "What for?" Senior Partner: "So the buyers will die before they have time to cancel the orders."

Getting Full Directions.

"Now be careful how you drive, cabby, and go slowly over the stones, for I hate to be shaken. And mind you pull up at the right house, and look out for those dreadful railway vans," said the nervous old gentleman. "Never fear, sir," said cabby, "I'll do my best. And which orsepital would you like to go to in case of an accident."

We Have Seen It.

The flannel shirt is a great institution. When it is brought home the proud husband and father dons it and goes forth to defy the sweltering heat of a July day. The next week it is washed, and then it is just about the size for the twelve-year-old son. Another week rolls round and it is a perfect fit for the baby. The fourth week it descends to Betsy's doll, and the fifth week it vanishes altogether—disappears mysteriously. It was seen to go into the wash-tub, but that was the last of it. It never came out. It had shrunk away to nothing.

WHY THIS FALSE SHAME?

"TELL me of what you are ashamed, and I will tell you what you are." There are some things of which one ought to be ashamed, whilst there are others of which one should be ashamed of being ashamed. False shame is a robber. It takes from us our pleasures, joys, and rightful inheritances, and gives us nothing in return. Is a woman ashamed of desiring beauty or a man of acquiring strength? According to the publishers of Professor Boyd Laynard's great work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE, there are hundreds of thousands of such cases. In a recent interview with the publishers the following statement was made: "It is perfectly astounding the thousands of letters we are receiving from the public requesting us to send Professor Laynard's work privately packed! Of course we have always made a custom of doing so; but why people should be ashamed of receiving such a book is beyond our comprehension and very uncomplimentary to the Professor, who is the greatest living authority upon personal hygiene. But for all this, the sale of his work in the English language is rapidly approaching one million copies. Hindustani and Malayalam are among the latest translations of Professor Laynard's famous book."

A REMARKABLE OFFER.

The publishers have issued a complete edition, at a price within the reach of all, so that the book may find a place in every home. The work is arranged in 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of SHORT STORIES, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

WONDERFUL CONTENTS.

Among the numerous subjects dealt with, the following are but few. A complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 CHAPTERS, enumerating upwards of 500 SUBJECTS and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers:—

Teacher Ate It.

Mr. B: "Bobby, did you eat that little mince-pie your mother made for you yesterday?" Bobby: "No, sir. I gave it to my teacher." Mr. B.: "Did she eat it?" Bobby: "I fancy so. There wasn't any school to-day."

Wanted to be Truthful.

Landlord Hooks: "Can you refer me to a work where I can learn how the ancients constructed those catapults that would throw stones half-a-mile?" Friend: "Don't believe I can. Why do you want such information?" Hooks: "Well, you see, I've advertised that this house is within a stone's throw of the railway station, and now I have got to rig up some plan for throwing that stone."

A Kind Wish.

An English traveller arrived in Dublin, from London, on a terribly wet and stormy night, and, calling a car, bade the driver hasten to his hotel. Arrived there he asked the driver his fare, and being struck by the fact that the sum stated was only the regulation amount, he gave the man a shilling for himself, thinking he deserved a tip on such a disagreeable evening. The jarvey looked at the money and then to the traveller's amused astonishment ejaculated: "Thank your honour; may the angels fetch your honour half-an-hour before the divil knows you're dead."

Not What He Expected.

"Ma wants two pounds of butter exactly like what you sent us last. If it ain't exactly like that she won't take it," said the small boy. The grocer turned to his numerous customers and remarked, blandly: "Some people in my business don't like particular customers, but I do. It's my delight to serve them and get them what they want. I will attend to you in a moment, little boy." "Be sure to get the same kind. A lot of pa's relations is visiting at our house, and ma doesn't want 'em to come again," the small boy explained.

He Had to Tell.

Johnny came home from school several times within a month with various bruises on his face and body, received in fights with his schoolmates, and on the last occasion his mother threatened him with severe punishment if he ever engaged in a fight again. Only a few days after the lad appeared with a black eye, and, scared by the stern maternal greeting, "Well, sir?" he departed from his usual truthful ways, and stammered: "I fell down and hit my head on a stone." "And which got the worst of it?" asked his big brother. "Oh, the other fellow," answered Johnny, briskly. "He's gone home with two black eyes."

Good for Trade.

"For outdoor exercise," said a bicyclist, "there is nothing to be compared with bicycle-riding. It develops and strengthens every muscle in the body. Physicians all over the country warmly recommend it." "Yes," was the reply, "I suppose they do, and surgeons also."

The Higher Things.

Little Boy: "Mamma, may I have that big family Bible a little while?" Fond Mamma: "Of course you can, my pet. Your thoughts are on higher things, I see." Little Boy: "Yes, mamma." Bridget (to herself, two hours afterwards): "Humph! More of that jam gone. I don't see how that boy reached it."

Bad Luck.

"What's the matter, Bromley?" "I've recovered my portmanteau." "I don't see why you should use such language about it." "Oh, you don't, eh! The thing isn't worth 10s., and it turns up just when the railway company was about to allow me £10 for it. It's just my luck."

Wasted Goodness.

"Mother, I can never win the medal for good behaviour," exclaimed a boy just from school. "I've tried and tried, but some other fellow always gets it." "But you must keep on trying," said his mother encouragingly. "It's no use," replied the boy. "I shan't try any more. It's a clean waste of goodness."

Noble Boy.

"Willie," said his mother, "your clothes are wet; you've been in the water." "Yes," said little Willie, bravely, "I went in and saved little Charlie Stebbins." "My noble boy!" said his fond mother, "did you jump in after him?" "No, mamma," said little Willie, proudly. "I jumped in first so as to be there when he fell in."

He Didn't Go After It.

Johnnie had been out in the yard playing with his ball, and suddenly came in and sat down to read. His father looked up, and, seeing that Johnnie had his Sunday-school book in his hand, thought it time to question him. "What did you do with the ball?" "It went over the wall into Mr. Brown's yard." "Did you go after it?" "No, pa." "Why not?" "Because it went through the window."

Insufficient Data.

As a pedestrian tourist was lately proceeding towards Abbotsford, he asked a man who was breaking stones by the roadside how long it would take him to reach that place. The man looked at him without speaking, and then resumed his work. The question was repeated, with the same result, and at last the traveller walked on. He had not proceeded more than a hundred yards when the man called after him, and made a sign for him to return. When the pedestrian reached the stone-breaker, the latter said to him: "It will take you an hour to reach Abbotsford." "Then why did you not tell me so at first?" asked the traveller. "Why," said the man, "it was necessary for me to see at what rate you walked; and, from the way you step out, I am now able to say that you will reach it in an hour."

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium, Nos. 43—48," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, February 24th, 1902.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

EDWARD FARRELL CHEMIST

By Philip Moon.

II.—THE KIRBY DIAMONDS.

KIRBY House, the town residence of Lord Kirby, was ablaze with lights.

From within came the sound of merry laughter, and the clink of well-filled glasses. Lord and Lady Kirby were entertaining their bosom friends and boon companions, at one of those small and select dinner parties for which they were, deservedly, so well famed.

To know Lord Kirby was a pleasure and an honour; not because he was a nobleman and rich, but because he was broad-minded and a cultured man. A man every one honoured and respected. He reckoned his friends not by their number, but by their worth. He could appreciate sterling qualities, and could discern between empty-pated rank and talented commonality. By no means literary, he numbered amongst his friends those most eminent in the world of letters; by no means scientific, yet the greatest scientists called him friend. Large-hearted and noble-minded, he was a fine example of what an English nobleman should be.

Lady Kirby was perhaps less broad-minded than her husband, but was nevertheless kind-hearted and genial. Very beautiful, she carried all hearts with her, and made everyone her friend. To-night Edward Farrell was one of the favoured guests.

He was an old and cherished friend of both Lord and Lady Kirby, and had first met the former when at Cambridge nearly ten years before.

Farrell looked in splendid trim. He had just returned from a late trip to Switzerland, with the blood coursing joyously through his veins, his heart beating high, and his mind free from every care. He was longing for his books and instruments again, 'tis true, but he never did things by halves, and since he had come out to dine, he meant to dine well and enjoy himself.

There was not a large company present, for Lord Kirby believed in keeping his guests at these special dinners small in number and select.

Moreover, he nearly always invited the same people, for they comprised his and his wife's closest personal friends.

On Lord Kirby's face Farrell once or twice thought he saw a fleeting look of anxiety or worry; and was surprised to find it reflected in the face of Lady Kirby. The other guests apparently noticed nothing—little wonder either—they were not all so observant as Farrell. Even he hardly thought twice about it, and soon forgot his fancies in the enticing flow of cultured talk and the sparkle of the wines.

Brighter, however, than the sparkling wines, surpassing even the sparkling eyes of the ladies, were the jewels they wore; for informal as these dinner parties were, the ladies yet loved to indulge their weakness for dazzling jewels, and displayed their possessions in good-natured rivalry.

Lady Kirby, however, stood alone and unique—for the famous Kirby diamonds were unapproachable. She wore the diamond filigree necklace only. It gleamed like a line of scintillating fire against the fair neck of the owner, and crowned her as queen over all.

Lady Dorothy Kayn—called by her friends, Lady Dolly—was the only one who in any way rivalled Lady Kirby. She devoted a great deal of her time to the best exhibition of her many gems; but their rich profusion and the lavishness of their display, palled upon one, and made one look with relief to the exquisite and dainty beauty of the Kirby necklace.

Lady Dolly knew it too. She knew that to her was not the prize; and, alas! woman is but human—she envied her friend.

Farrell saw Lady Dolly's envious glances, and laughed good-humouredly to himself. Solomon was not so far wrong, thought he, "Vanity of vanities" truly "all is vanity."

But even the brightest of dinners must end, and this was no exception. The last course had been disposed of, the dessert discussed, and the ladies had left for the drawing-room. Now the chief and most comfortable feature of Lord Kirby's dinners was that they were free from superfluous formality.

After dinner the men had a quiet half-hour all to themselves before joining the ladies in the drawing-room.

Some adjourned to the smoking-room, others to the library, and others to the billiard-room, but all, according only to their own sweet will and fancy.

Thus, Farrell found himself tête-à-tête with Lord Kirby in the library.

His lordship seemed rather quiet and thoughtful. At last he said:

"Look here, Farrell. I want to ask your advice. I am pretty well worried out of my life, and my wife, in spite of her affected indifference, is much upset too. You saw the diamond necklace she was wearing to-night? Well that, as you know, is one of the famous Kirby collection, and is almost priceless. It was one of a complete set. I say was, for it is so no longer. At each of my last dinner-parties a piece has disappeared—stolen most probably. First the brooch disappeared—disappeared without leaving a trace. Lady Kirby had taken it off for a moment and placed it on her dressing-table. When she turned to pick it up again a few minutes later, it had vanished, vanished as completely as though the table had opened and swallowed it. No one had seen it. Only her friends were in the room, the same friends that are here to-night, the same as have been here each time. They are all wealthy and have nothing to gain by taking the jewels; in fact, I would rather suspect myself than them. Next time the crescent for the hair vanished—no one knows how or when. Lady Kirby fastened it in her hair before dinner and noticed it was still there when in her dressing-room shortly afterwards, yet before the evening was out it had vanished.

"The Scotland Yard people have investigated the matter—they have sent copies of my enlarged photos of the jewels all over the country—but all without result. They are completely mystified. I tried to dissuade my wife from wearing the necklace to-night—for I fear that it will vanish in some mysterious way or other. She would not hear of leaving it off, however, and the result is that altogether I feel very worried and far from happy. 'Tis all so mysterious. Where have the jewels vanished to? How? Are they stolen? Who would do such a thing? There were no servants near—outside agency is out of the question—and my friends have absolutely no motive for doing such a thing. It is strange beyond doubt. What do you think of it all?"

"Well, I must confess," said Farrell, "it does sound rather a mysterious business; but can I see the dressing-room? That is, if you can spare me another five minutes from the others. If you could manage to bring Lady Kirby too without altogether violating the laws of hospitality—it would be as well. Only make some good excuse, and do not refer openly to this business."

Lord Kirby agreed, and soon returned with his wife. Together they proceeded to the dressing-room. The hasty examination that Farrell made did not appear to yield anything of interest. At last he turned thoughtfully to Lady Kirby and said:

"Are you willing to run a risk? I have an idea that I can help you, but it will involve the temporary loss of your diamond necklace."

Lady Kirby hesitated.

"I don't understand," she said. "What do you mean?"

"Well," answered Farrell, "it comes to this—I want you to really try to lose your necklace, leave it carelessly exposed somewhere, and then trust the rest to me. I know it sounds rather mad, but, believe me, there is a method in my madness. Now, what do you say?"

"It is this that I intend to use as a bait to catch the fish."

Lady Kirby still hesitated; but her husband stepped forward.

"Do as you will, Farrell," said he, "we will put ourselves without reserve into your hands. What do you want us to do?"

Farrell had that tense, subdued expression that was so characteristic of him when he became intensely interested in anything.

"Nothing now," answered he; "but if Lady Kirby will meet me here in half-an-hour's time, I will tell her exactly how to proceed. I should like to run away now, if you will allow me, for I have forgotten an important letter—or rather you can tell the others that—really, I want to run round to my laboratory for a thing or two."

With a short laugh he was gone. Husband and wife stood for a moment facing each other with faces of blank bewilderment. Then they joined their guests in the drawing-room.

Within half-an-hour Farrell was back again. He made straight for the dressing-room, and was joined almost immediately by Lady Kirby, whose face expressed no small amount of wonder and curiosity. Farrell took from his pocket a small phial.

"This," he said, with a smile, "is a special alcoholic solution of phenol phthalein; and it is this that I intend to use as a bait to catch the fish."

Lady Kirby's eyes opened wide.

"But I don't understand," she said; "how will that strange named stuff help us? What am I to do?"

Farrell did not answer at once.

The empty jewel-case belonging to the necklace stood open on the table. This Farrell picked up and carefully poured some of the contents of the phial all over the inside velvet, upon which the necklace was supposed to lie.

"It won't hurt it much," said he, as Lady Kirby gave a start of dismay; besides, better that than the necklace, you know. Now I want you to bring your friends up here to-night, exactly as you did on the other occasions when you lost the other jewels. Then, quite casually take your necklace off and put it in here, on the velvet, so that whoever picks it up is bound to touch their fingers on the slightly moist surface. As you put it in I want you to manage to moisten your own fingers.

"No; it isn't poison! It won't hurt you! Don't appear to notice the case once you have left the necklace in it; watch it during the evening as you have the chance, and if it vanishes let me know. Now I think we had better join the others; we have already been away too long. What say you?"

* * * * *

Lady Kirby and her lady friends were in her dressing-room about an hour after Farrell and she had joined the others. They were discussing the latest novelties and the oldest lace. She had laughingly enticed them away from the drawing-room upon some frivolous pretext or other, amidst the loud protests of the men.

She was anxious to try Farrell's plan. Though how it was going to work she could not for the life of her see. It looked like tempting fate; and she half-feared her necklace would take to mysterious flight and baffle even the astute Farrell's endeavours to bring it back.

She was interested, however, in spite of her fears; and, after all, if Farrell—the scientist—the mystic—was so confident, why should she fear? She would do as he had told her.

So, in the midst of her chatter to Lady Vere and Lady Dolly about the latest opera, she calmly removed her necklace, and put it carelessly into the open jewel case. She pressed it down, and felt the tips of her dainty fingers slightly wet against the moistened velvet. She could hardly have told they were wet if she had not specially noticed.

Then she bustled about the room, showing her friends first one dainty piece of finery and then another; yet ever stealing a secret glance at her treasure. The time flew by, and still the case contained its priceless burden. Not yet had it winged its mysterious flight.

At last every pretext for a longer stay was exhausted. Though Lady Kirby fain would stay—she must leave her jewel to its fate.

She reluctantly led the way to the drawing-room, followed by her friends, Lady Dolly bringing up the rear.

Half-way down the stairs, however, Lady Kirby's heart misgave her. What if Farrell should fail? What if he were building his hopes on a false foundation? The thought was agonising. No—she would not risk it. she would go at once, while the necklace was still safe, and would either lock it up or wear it.

Quickly she made an excuse to return and bade the others join the gentlemen in the drawing-room. Up the stairs she flew. How her heat was beating. Never would she let the precious jewels out of her sight again. How foolish of her to do so now. Across the room she hastened. The jewel-case was still on the table. Thank Heaven! she was in time! Horrors! She gave a tiny shriek of dismay. The jewel-case was empty. She had not been away two minutes and yet the necklace had vanished completely. Lady Kirby could have cried with vexation. Controlling herself by a great effort, she ran down to the drawing-room, and at the first opportunity told Farrell in a hurried whisper what had occurred.

Farrell received the news very quietly, and told Lady Kirby to bear up, "it will come right yet," whispered he.

Then aloud he said:

"We have just been discussing spiritualism, my dear Lady Kirby, and I was advancing the opinion that spiritualistic phenomena are far more common than is supposed.

"Now what do you say," said he to the company generally, "if I volunteer to convince you all of this?"

"You would find us interested observers, I venture to say," said Lord Kirby, "even if we are not ready converts. But how do you propose to convince us?"

"Why, my dear fellow, by actually appealing to the testimony of your own eyes, to be sure. See here! I have a small phial"—and he produced one a little bigger than the first he had used—"filled with a so-called 'spiritualistic tincture.' It is supposed to have the peculiar property of revealing those in spiritual sympathy. What I propose is to try it and see for ourselves whether it is true or not. What do you say, shall I do so?"

A chorus of assent came from those around him.

"How delightful!" said one.

"Yes! Quite a spiritualistic séance!" echoed Lady Dolly.

Meantime Farrell had requisitioned a large glass bowl—half-filled it with water—and then, amidst the breathless attention of those around him, poured in the spiritualistic tincture.

"Now," said Farrell, "you must each pass before me and put yourselves into vital contact with the liquid, by placing both hands in it—and I warn you"—he laughingly continued—"that those whom the spirits deign to honour, will have some message from the spirit world, which will first be revealed to me, and which I promise in turn to reveal to you.

"Now, Kirby! are you ready? Suppose you open the ball. Ha! you are not one of the spirits 'elected,'" said Farrell, as Lord Kirby removed his hands from the water; "no sign marks you as chosen."

When Lady Kirby's turn came, a slow hush crept over the assembly, for the instant her hands touched the liquid, the tips of her fingers turned a brilliant red. Lady Kirby realised with a start that they were coloured exactly where they had touched the velvet. What did it mean? This, then, was part of Farrell's plan.

"Now, ye incredulous, look and believe!" said Farrell. "We will see first if any others are favoured by the spirits, and then we will try and learn their message."

The only other person affected was Lady Dolly—much to her surprise.

In her case the tips of the fingers and two or three tiny spots in the palm of the right hand turned red.

"However do you do it, Mr. Farrell?" said she; "you must tell us."

"You must be patient, Lady Dolly," answered he; "the important part is yet to come. We have yet to learn the spirits' message. Will you two kindly follow me to the library—if the others will pardon our absence—and we will try and give them something interesting when we return."

When they reached the library, Farrell closed the door and then turned and faced them.

"Now, Lady Dorothy," said he, "the message is not from the spirit world, but from me. I know all. Trifling is useless. Where are Lady Kirby's diamonds?"

Had a thunderbolt fallen in their midst—it could not have startled them more. Lady Kirby was speechless. Surely there was some frightful mistake. She looked to Lady Dolly for some explanation, some hot indignant denial. It never came. Lady Dolly, as the hard, cold, cutting words fell from Farrell's lips, turned a deadly white.

Then the colour rushed back in a swift flood to her cheeks, and throwing herself at Lady Kirby's feet, she burst into storm of tears.

"Oh, Mary! Mary! Forgive me! I haven't stolen them," she sobbed; "you know I wouldn't steal them, don't you? But I was jealous of you, Mary—they were so splendid—and I just slipped them into the ventilator, when you were not looking. Oh, Mary! Forgive me!" she moaned. "I only meant it for a time."

Lady Kirby's heart turned to stone; all these weeks of worry, all her husband's care, all through the silly jealousy of this vain girl. Not for long though, did she think thus; her heart soon opened to the miserable girl, and she freely forgave her.

"Dry your tears, dear! It is all a foolish joke!" said she. "Don't think of it any more. Now hush! there's a dear! Why, where is Mr. Farrell?" For he had slipped out as soon as he heard where the jewels were hidden.

He soon returned however with brooch, crescent and necklace in his hand.

Lady Kirby, at the sight of her recovered treasures, uttered a cry of joy.

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Farrell! How clever you are! But what about the others? and what about the spiritual séance? Wasn't it really a spiritual phenomenon after all?" she cried, all in one breath.

"No; I am very sorry to disappoint you!" said Farrell; "but I am afraid I depended more upon the fact that the slightest trace of phenol phthalein turns red with an alkali, than upon any spiritual agency. The rest of the plot I credit you with ingenuity enough to explain for yourself. What did I put in the water? Oh, common soda solution. An alkali, you see! Yes, that's all! But don't you think we had better join the others in the drawing-room?"

* * * * *

"Well, Farrell, we had almost given you up," said Lord Kirby. "In fact, we began to think the spirits had spirited you all away. Now let's hear the important message, for it must have been very important to have kept you all this time."

"It was important," said Farrell; "it revealed Lady Kirby's diamonds!" and he held them aloft.

"Marvellous!" they all cried out, when they could find breath enough to speak; but they did not know all.

"I think you had better get something for Lady Dolly," said Farrell; "the strain of the experiment has been great and has tried her considerably."

"Yes; you can empty the bowl, the tincture only acts once!"

[Next week: The Secret Explosive.]

FINISHED.

"Was Mrs. Vane's musicale interesting?" The query was half-ironical.

"Very! I met a delightful Irish girl. She told me her whole history in twenty minutes."

"I've noticed that confidences always attract you."

Maud Rayburn smiled with raised eyebrows at this. She and Howard Russell was walking very slowly along Kensington High Street. It was a hot August afternoon, and the street was almost deserted. Miss Rayburn's fashionable gown was a cool blue in colour, and she wore a sailor hat primly parallel with her eyebrows. Thus far her attire was conventional, but she allowed herself the liberty of having no gloves in sight, and she made frequent noticeable gestures with her bare jewelled hands.

Her companion's tall figure was slightly stooping, and his smoothly shaven face was full of character and decision. There was apparent in their attitude towards each other, a certain freedom, which only long acquaintance can give, but which had not yet lost its piquancy through too exact knowledge of each other's characteristics.

"Well," remarked Miss Rayburn, at length stooping to defend herself, "why shouldn't I be interested in people's confidences? That's a part of the business of a 'literary sprinter,' as those of my craft are called."

This remark seemed to be convincing, for Howard Russell did not speak for some time. A short, deep cleft became visible between his eyebrows, and he shifted his gaze from the pavement in front of them to a point some distance down the street. At last he broke out:

"I can conceive of nothing more wearisome than eternally examining people from an artistic point of view. The study of character way be necessary to your business——"

"Please call it my art," interrupted Miss Raymond beseechingly.

"But I should think you would feel after a while that you didn't have any of your own. One's own personality must be lost sight of in the everlasting search for mental and moral abnormalities—I'm glad I prefer insects; I think yours is an unhealthy occupation."

"How delightfully frank and unflattering."

She turned a laughing face towards him.

"You are greatly mistaken if you think I'm not interested in myself and my own abnormalities, as you call them. I'm far too egotistical. I have put myself, or rather, parts of me, into a great many of my stories, and I find that by making the most of one characteristic at a time I shall be able to provide myself with material for some years to come. And let me tell you, sir, I will have my revenge for the remarks you've made—I'll put you in a story too."

"With a part of you in it," he jeered. Then his face changed. "No; you are not to do that, Maud."

"Why am I not?"

"Because you wouldn't be able to do justice to your subject; you don't know me so well as you think you do."

"Depths yet unfathomed——"

"I'll own we're good friends, but, my faith! you don't find out the whole of a man in a few walks like this. Especially a woman doesn't. So I think you would be better not to try to make use of me in that way."

"Till I know you better!"

Her eyes were smiling, and her lips; her whole face was awake, animated, full of intense interest. It was the most subtle flattery that look of hers.

"Not then; pardon my egotism. You shall never know me well enough to put me down in pen strokes. Or rather, I hope you will know me too well."

She did not look at him, but at the pansies fastened in her dress, and her smile did not fade.

"You have chosen a horribly cold-blooded way of getting fame," he went on after a moment. "It's worse than the painter's, a thousand times. What's the outside of us, anyhow, to what goes on within? What's a man's face compared to his soul?"

"Perhaps you are unaware," said Miss Rayburn, with considerable amusement, "that you are flattering me tremendously. You forget that I have had too little experience to know much about people's souls."

"You have made use of what you've had then. And I didn't intend to flatter you."

"That's the charming part of it!" They had reached her father's house, and she turned away from him, laughing, and ran up the steps. "Are you coming in?"

"No. I didn't know we were here."

He had turned towards her in a bewildered way, and now stood hat in hand, with his foot on the lowest step. She remained poised lightly with her hand on the bell. He did not move; he was looking dreamily down the broad sunny street.

"Well, am I to ring?"

She laughed a little nervously.

"Oh! Yes, of course. I must go."

He waved his straw hat to her, and she made him a prim curtesy. Then she rang the bell, and when the maid opened the door, went straight to her room.

Maud Rayburn's literary success had been a great surprise to her. It had all come with a rush, and now she was enjoying to the full her sense of being work-worthy. She was much fêted and flattered, but had not allowed herself to be unduly puffed up thereby. She knew that her work was good; that it had chanced to catch popular fancy was her happiness; that it filled her purse she had no need to care.

On coming into her room after her walk with Howard Russell, she wandered about rather aimlessly for a few minutes, flung her hat on a festooned bed in an alcove, glanced at a clock on the mantelpiece, and finally sat down before her dressing-table, propped her face on her hands and looked fixedly at herself in the glass.

It reflected a piquant little visage, topped by a knot of light-brown hair, eyes bright and dark, a chin firm and pointed, a mouth red and sensitively curved. Its owner addressed her reflection severely, with all that mental unreserve in which women feel it a luxury to indulge.

"What you need," she said to herself, "is more experience. You've had a good deal, you know, in scraps. But what you want and what you must have before you can do your best work, is the one—big—thing that will take you mentally off your feet and upset your equilibrium. And you don't want it wholly for the sake of your work, either."

She paused, and after a moment the reflection in the glass began to grow softly pink. She got up and began brushing her hair vigorously.

Howard Russell walked slowly down the street, his hands clasped behind him, while his eyes, trained in the habits of the naturalist, were fixed thoughtfully on the ground. What his reflections were it would not have been wholly easy to conjecture. As he walked on, hardly noticing where his steps were leading him, the narrow cleft between the eyebrows grew deeper and deeper, the curves of the lips became more and more rigid, even the chin seemed to grow firmer in its outline. The whole face became expressive of a settled purpose, but a purpose devoid of any hope of fulfilment.

"Pansies, sir?"

A ragged and dispirited-looking urchin held up a bunch of purple blossoms without much evident expectation of finding a purchaser in the abstract individual who was approaching. But some spell seemed to break at the sound of the boy's shrill voice. As Russell started and then came to a standstill in front of him, the gamin's keen eyes lighted up and a half-suppressed grin illumined his smutty countenance.

Russell took the flowers, dropped a coin into the boy's small paw, and walked on. Perhaps it was something in the pansies' cheerful little faces that brought a softer curve to the stern lips. He looked about him. Above, the smiling sky; all about, the glow of the summer sunshine; a flickering on the pavement, a mosaic of elm-branch shadows; down the street, a group of children at play; in the window of a house opposite, a baby leaping and crowing in its mother's arms.

"Till I know you better!"

His head and even his shoulders went back suddenly; still holding the pansies tenderly he walked down the street, all the vigour of young manhood in his sturdy, swinging step—all the hope of youth and strength and love in his eyes.

* * * * *

Miss Rayburn took Mr. Russell's card from the maid who brought it, and went downstairs immediately after the glance in the mirror which she would not have been a woman if she had been able to forego. She found her visitor in the cool library. He rose as she came in, and she saw that he had been turning the pages of a new magazine.

"What is that?" she asked, as he laid it down to take her hand.

"It's the Mirror," he replied. "Of course you know it has one of your stories in it?"

"No; I did not. It must be just out."

"I bought it as I came along. I haven't had time to read it; I was just cutting the leaves as you came down."

"It must be a story I sent them in April," she said indifferently, sinking into a low chair and opening a fan. "How warm it is. Doesn't it enervate one completely, this stifling atmosphere?"

He stared at her.

"Well, you are the coolest——"

"Indeed, I'm not," she interrupted flippantly.

"Don't you want to see this?" Russell's tone was cross; he really felt vexed at her indifference. "They've had Hobson do the pictures—three of 'em. You're actually sated with fame!"

She shrugged her shoulders slightly.

"Not till they put 'This number contains Miss Rayburn's story So-and-So,' on the cover." Then, leaning forward, "Show it me, please."

He took a chair nearer hers, and they turned the pages together.

"What exquisite pictures! Oh, dear, they've done better by it than it deserves!"

Suddenly she started, and then turned upon him eyes full of delightful surprise.

"Why, it's 'Finished!'" she exclaimed. "It must be that it just filled some gap or it couldn't have come out so soon as this. Do you know I wrote that story the evening after we had that last walk together? I sat up till two o'clock to finish it."

Russell turned the last page.

"Is it a love story?" he asked, apparently for no reason at all.

For no reason at all she blushed.

"You know I never write them," she said. "No, it's not a love story; it simply leads up to that."

"Leads up to it?"

"Why, yes. Here, read the end of it. The hero and heroine have been friends for a long time, and she's rich and he's poor. She thinks he loves her, and waits for him to speak, and he never does."

"Why?"

Russell looked steadily into her dark eyes as she leant forward, playing with her fan. His own were blue, but at this moment they looked black.

"The story does not say."

There was a note of haughtiness in her voice, and she looked away from him to pick up her handkerchief, which had slipped from her lap to the floor.

"Then why do you call it 'Finished'?"

His voice sounded unnatural even to himself.

"Because it was the end—for her."

She leant back in her chair and began flicking the edge of the fan against her palm.

"Then she loved him?"

"Well, as to that—she thought she did—but——"

She had clasped her arms behind her head and was looking straight at him from the little distance to which she had withdrawn. He leant towards her quickly, and as she dropped her hands to her lap he caught them in his.

"No—no, it was not the end!" he cried hoarsely. "Maud, let me teach you to finish the story!"

His voice was passionate and trembling; she watched him curiously for an instant and then drew away her hands.

"Mr. Russell, I am sorry!" she said.

He sprang to his feet and stood before her.

"Then it is true? You do not care for me?"

"No; not in the way you mean."

She saw his face change and darken, she saw his clenched hands and the veins upon the forehead. She watched the struggle with the keen look of the vivisectionist in her bright eyes. She did not know that she was cruel, for at that moment her womanhood had disappeared in the uncaring zeal of the artist. And in the bitterness of his pain he saw that look.

When he spoke again his voice had found a note that she had never before heard in it.

"At least," he said, "I have been the means of teaching you something in your cruel craft. You do not know me as you think you know me, but you do know that I can love; I have shown you that. Go on, now, and finish your story, for I have taught you, after all. The hero has declared himself!"

* * * * *

It was a warm August day, and the ocean was so dazzling that Howard Russell moved his chair round and sat facing the laundry arrangements in the little yard at the end of the verandah. The Sea View was not a first-class hotel, but Howard Russell was poor. He filled his pipe and settled himself to the enjoyment of a fresh, uncut magazine. As he slit the pages with his penknife, now and then stopping to read a bit, a name caught his eye. It was the title at the head of a story, and it was "Finished."

"Plagiarism, I call it," he muttered to himself.

It was not plagiarism, after all, for the name at the end was Maud Stillwell Rayburn, but the story was the story of a happy love. Russell read it slowly to the end. When he had done he let the magazine drop from his listless fingers to the floor.

"She understands now!" he thought wearily.

ELSIE FRANKS.

A RUNNING FIGHT.

He was at last on his way to take part in the ball to which he had looked forward so eagerly, but as the hansom carried him swiftly to his destination, his thoughts wandered away to another place, and a feeling of dread began to creep over him.

His mind went back several months to another scene in which there were three actors, and he was one. It was outside a theatre, the lights at the entrance falling on a carriage; a man stood at the door of the carriage saying good-bye to its two occupants. His words rang in Harry Gait's ears as though they were being uttered at that very moment.

"Good-bye, Nellie!" Oh, the tenderness of that adieu! "It seems a strange spot to say farewell for months, but"—he stopped, hesitating, almost bashful—"we said 'good-bye' this afternoon!" Another pause, during which his loving gaze remained fixed upon her pretty face; then Benton aroused himself and turned to the other occupant, his friend, Harry Gait. "Take care of her for me, old fellow! I intrust her to you while I am away, and I know that you will watch over her, for the sake of our life-long friendship! I know I can trust her to you!"

He held out his hand, then drew it back hastily to brush away a tear that had forced its way to his eye. The next instant, as if ashamed of the weakness he was unable to hide, he turned and strode away.

It all came back so vividly to Gait that it made him shut his teeth hard. The play was one that Nellie had wished to see, and Benton had promised to take her before he left to take up his appointment in the South of France, but the date of production had been altered, and thus it came to pass that their last evening was spent at the theatre in company with Gait, for Benton insisted on keeping his promise, and he had to catch the midnight train.

* * * * *

The cabman pulled the horse up with a jerk outside the brilliantly-lighted house, and Harry Gait returned to his immediate surroundings with a start. In a few minutes he was walking across the floor of the ball room towards the girl who had sat by his side in the carriage.

"I must apologise, Miss Carton! I am late—after all!" The last two words were not uttered.

"Did you think that my ball was like a bundle of old clothes, to be left aside till called for?" she asked lightly. Yet there was a trace of disappointment in her voice that struck him, although she herself was unconscious of it.

"I fear that I delayed in my coming," he began, remembering how he had hesitated outside after dismissing the cab. "I was—asked to give advice. I may have this waltz? I see it is not taken." He scribbled his initials against the number.

"How interesting!" She tried to hide the happy light in her bewitching eyes as he passed his arms about her, and they whirled along the floor to the strains of a dreamy waltz. "Advice about what?"

"I had to advise a man against running into danger." His voice was grave.

"How solemn!" she exclaimed. She was curious and pressed the subject. "Danger of what?"

"Of colliding with another couple!" returned Harry more gaily, as he dexterously avoided a collision. "I shall spoil your reputation as a dancer to-night, if I am not careful."

Nellie Carton laughed, and remained silent during the rest of the waltz; but she did not forget. As Gait drew her into a recess with an open window, through which the fragrance of late spring was wafted by the gentle night breeze, she returned to the subject.

"What danger?" But curiosity had given place to wistfulness; she began to understand vaguely. She looked into his eyes and was constrained to turn towards the window.

"What danger?" she asked again.

"The danger of being a—thief, and causing great loss to a friend who trusts him implicitly!"

She glanced at him with a half-mystified, half-comprehending look—the look of one who is afraid to understand.

"The loss of——" She stopped abruptly; then added suddenly: "The loss of property, of course, since you speak of a thief?" She felt relieved that her first suspicion was incorrect.

"No!" was the blunt reply, cruel to both in its brevity. "The loss of the girl he loves! I had to warn and reason with the—thief!"

She started, and grew pale as she made a gesture of protest.

"What cruel words you use!" she exclaimed passionately. "And the girl—I suppose you would call her a traitor?"

"I ought, if she did not advise the thief to run from the danger."

"Run?" she queried anxiously. "Ah! Is that what you advised him to do?"

"The thief?" The words came fiercely from his lips and she shuddered. "Yes; I told him to run and fight the temptation to betray a trust."

"But perhaps it is all a mistake; I mean, perhaps the original possession was all a mistake. Or perhaps——" A half-sob cut short her almost incoherent utterance.

His heart beat violently as he gazed ardently at her averted face; he wanted to see the look in her eyes, to learn whether she advised the would-be thief to run from danger.

"Oh!" she murmured—almost moaned. "If all three could run!"

She moved her head, so that their eyes met again. A great impulse came over him to catch her in his arms and press her to his breast, and for an instant it seemed as if she would lift her arms to be taken; but at that moment there came to them the awakening music of a song, set to waltz time, that brought to both the vision of a man hundreds of miles distant, a man who was working cheerfully and looking forward to the time when he could claim the girl he had been compelled to leave and whom he had intrusted to his friend's care. It was a favourite song of Benton's, and the girl's eyes filled with tears. She had sung it for him many times.

"It is not cowardly to run, sometimes!" she said softly. "It gives time to think, to find out whither one is drifting. I wonder whether any early roses are blooming in the warm south?"

All the passion died away within him, and he exerted a mighty effort in order to speak calmly.

"I shall soon see. I am going there."

"You are going there; to see—Willie?" Her face paled; he noticed it in the dim light; it had been crimson a few seconds before.

"Nellie, he asked me to take care of you for him, and I was—— I mean I am afraid that this night air may give you cold. Let me take you to another seat before I say good-night. You have lost a dance or two."

"You have lost them also," she remarked, trying to keep her voice steady, as they walked into the light, unconscious of the significant glances shot at them.

"I have lost more than the dances, but I have saved something. Will you have this seat?"

"I will tell Willie how good you have been," said Nellie confusedly. "I am——"

"I will tell him how good I have been, if need be!"

He took the rose with which she was toying, and pressed it to his lips. And then she found herself alone.

* * * * *

It was during the afternoon of the second day after the ball that Harry Gait received the heartiest of welcomes from Willie Benton in the pretty house which he was occupying.

"I am really glad to see you, old fellow!" cried Benton rapturously. "It's very good of you to come down here to have a look at me. Now, what do you think of the house? Not large, of course, but I think it will be big enough for us two, don't you? Nellie and I, of course," he added, as if he feared that Harry might not understand aright. "I don't think she will mind giving up a little till I get promoted, I promised to marry her in a year, you know, and the time is running short, and I haven't got on so well as I expected. But I am tiring you! Sit down and—tell me the news."

Harry Gait sat down in a comfortable wicker-chair and smiled at his friend's pleasure at receiving a visit.

"I shall want you to tell me whether you think I have hit her taste in furnishing, old fellow. You know her taste, and you are a better judge than I. Er—how is she?" He fidgeted nervously with the flap of his coat-pocket.

"I left her quite well," returned Gait, and it was fortunate that Benton did not notice the forced lightness of tone. "But tell me of yourself. Is the house-furnishing complete?"

Benton flushed: he fancied that Gait had already observed the paucity of furniture.

"Y-e-s. We can add as we go on, you see. The hangings are pink; that was her favourite colour, wasn't it? I have tried to get things that will be in accordance with her liking. That chair is for her; it's comfortable, isn't it? Yes? That's good!" With a sigh of relief. "The view out through that window is a pretty one, but it's getting dark now. This is to be her part of the house. Really, my dear Harry, I must apologise for not having a cigar to offer you, but the fact is, I didn't expect you, and I've—er—given up smoking for the present."

"Don't mention it! I neglected to fill my own case, but I can do without a smoke for one evening. But what has made you give up the weed?"

Benton flushed crimson.

"I'll be honest with you, old fellow. I am saving all I can so as to get a comfortable home for her. I suppose you saw that my clothes were shabby, but I am making the most of everything," blurted out Benton. "I have wondered lately whether I ought to ask her to come here," he continued, rather sadly. "And I have thought other things. Harry, I am glad you are here, for I have something to tell you."

"And I have something to tell you, Will! But let me hear your thoughts first."

"Wait a second; I must send a message." Benton went out of the room, but speedily returned and seated himself opposite his friend.

The light, which was fading, fell on Benton's face, but Gait remained discreetly in the shadow.

In the meantime Gait was running over the three arguments that he had been revolving in his mind ever since the ball. Perhaps it was all a mistake from the beginning! Nellie's words haunted him. Nellie could love him and give up Benton if he pressed his suit; and if Benton agreed, then there would be no question of either thief or traitor. He had not told her the real reason of his sudden determination to go south to see Benton.

On the other hand, if he passed out of her life, she would be happy with Will. It was just a case of drifting into love, and if the drifting were stopped, then—well, he believed that she would not suffer; it had not gone far enough for that with her. And with himself? So he had come to Benton to put it plainly before him.

Benton's devotion to Nellie was so apparent that it had chilled the warm hopes of Gait. Now, what was he going to say?

"I have been rather discouraged down here," began Benton nervously. "I expected a better income, as I am partly paid on the yield of the mine, but the yield has disappointed me up till now. So I have been wondering whether Nellie will care to come here. Then, you see, your letters—hers and yours—have sent me off on the wrong track; when a man is disheartened, he is ready to see trouble everywhere. You two are such congenial people—you suit each other so well—and you, old fellow, can give her far more pleasure and comfort than I can."

Gait drew a deep breath; silently, not to attract the attention of Benton, who was staring vacantly through the window. Those were his own arguments, uttered by the man he wished to oust. But there was a greater argument yet; would it also come?

A knock at the door, which Benton answered. He returned to his seat, holding out a small packet of cigars.

"I could not bear to look so cheap as to make you go without a cigar, Harry, so I sent for some," he said apologetically. "Light up!"

A pang of remorse shot through Gait; his friend's inherent goodness was so evident.

"There is another thing," resumed Benton, taking his seat once more and speaking in a low tone. "When two people are thrown together and their tastes are so much alike, there is always the chance of—their drifting—into love. And that was what, in my discouraged condition, here by myself, I thought might happen!"

Gait drew another deep breath and waited. Strange that Benton should have followed the same line of thought! And at what conclusion had Benton arrived? Gait dared not trust himself to speak.

"But as soon as I saw you here," continued Benton more lightly, "I knew that I was wrong!" Gait's cigar dropped from his fingers, but he quickly picked it up. "I was wrong to suppose it of you, Harry," he added contritely. "I know how true a friend you are! And I have the greatest confidence in Nellie!" (proudly). "She often heard of you from me before she saw you, and she openly expresses her admiration of you in her letters!"

"And have you written those ideas of yours to her in any of your letters?" inquired Gait.

"Not a word!" cried Benton hastily. "She would have thought me a jealous idiot and ungenerous to her and you. I ought to know that she would not swerve from me, and that a man of your character does not forget himself so far as to drift into love with the girl who is affianced to his friend. I was an idiot! But I tell you, Harry, that I would have said 'Heaven bless you both,' even if my silly suspicions had proved true, and you had come here to tell me so! Still, I admit that it is easier to say the words when I am not required to say them!" And Benton laughed happily.

The night was gathering; the moon shed its feeble light into the room so that Gait could discern the joy on his friend's countenance, and he was glad that he was in the shade and Will Benton could not see how pale and haggard his face had become. He knew it was pale and haggard; he felt that it was, for it was so cold and the muscles so strained.

"But you said that you had something to tell me," said Benton, after a pause. "What is it?"

"I have brought this rose from her," responded Gait unsteadily, taking the flower with its wrapping of wadding from his breast pocket and handing it to Benton, who reverently raised it to his lips. "I think she will come here as soon as you want her, Will; and I would ask her soon, for I am going abroad and shall not be able to look after her for you. That is what I wanted to tell you."

"Abroad!" echoed Benton. "Rather sudden, isn't it?"

"Yes," came the reply, slowly and thoughtfully. "I feel bound to go."

"Well, old fellow, I'm sorry—pressing business, I suppose? But I'm glad you came to see me and make me happy before running away."

Running away! Gait started as if stung, but quickly recovered himself.

"Yes, I'm running away." Under his breath he murmured: "One does not often save one's reputation by running away; but in my case it is my only chance!"

Geo. Day.

"LOVINGLY, CAROLYN."

CAROLYN was writing letters. It was her day for correspondence.

Being possessed just now of a fad for the orderly and systematic arrangement of all her actions, she made it a point to map out beforehand her duties and diversions for each ensuing week. Consequently she had "days" for things.

Carolyn's personality scarcely suggested a temperament much given to prim or rigid performance of obligations.

Wide hazel eyes and a dimple in the chin do not particularly denote an unduly precise or grimly methodical nature.

Carolyn had shut herself in her room, giving orders that she was not to be disturbed. Quite a little pile of letters confronted her. Letters from cousins, aunts, girl friends, and—others. Carolyn paused as she took from the pile a certain one of those—others. It was addressed in an erratic masculine hand. A pair of pretty brows puckered over the hazel eyes and the lips pouted distinctly as Carolyn read the letter for—well, not for the first time since its arrival.

The pile was diminishing in a most satisfactory manner. Carolyn had almost reached the last—that dreaded last one which would require such concentrated effort in answering—when there came a sound of light, hurried footsteps, and an imperative rap on the door.

"Let me in, you sinner!" It was Rilla Chadbourne's voice.

"Oh, it's you, Rilla!" The key turned in the lock.

"Now, I'd just like to know," demanded Rilla, throwing herself at once into her favourite chair, "what all this is about? Days for correspondence, indeed! Can't be disturbed! Well, you've got to be disturbed, so there. You've got to go to lunch with me and shopping afterwards. I've arranged it all in my own mind and I won't take 'No' for an answer."

"Gracious, Rilla, your unexpectedness is something terrible. Why didn't you let me know?"

"Because I couldn't, that's all. So get ready——"

"But I must write one more letter."

"Who to?" questioned Rilla, ungrammatically, conscious of privileged rights as Carolyn's chum.

"Why—it's to my professor."

"Carolyn, you little terror, are you encouraging that man? Aren't you ashamed of yourself? No wonder you blush. I'll tell you now you can't do any trifling with Prof. Lewis MacDowell. He's dreadfully in earnest. He thinks you mean everything you say, or look or write!"

"I haven't looked a thing or said a thing! I've treated him abominably," protested Carolyn.

"Then this letter can wait."

"Oh, no, I must write it now; I should have written yesterday, you see."

"Then hurry!" commented Rilla.

Carolyn sat down and hurried accordingly, Rilla talking at intervals. The letter, with its accompanying interruptions are as follows:

"My dear Friend.—Your most delightful letter was received and I (oh, please don't, Rilla, I must get this just right—you know he's a professor) trust you will permit me to express my appreciation of your most interesting and able remarks. (Wait just a minute, Rilla). I sometimes wish I possessed a deeper and (Oh! Rilla, I'm stuck! It's so hard to answer such scholarly letters. No—don't say a word—I've got it!) keener insight into the beautiful philosophy of which you write so (let me see) earnestly and wisely. People call me superficial, but indeed, sometimes I have thoughts which (I am hurrying! Please don't talk) I am sure are below the surface of things. You somehow help me to think truer and deeper. (Rilla, will you stop?) Yes, you may come on Wednesday evening. I shall look forward to seeing you. (Yes, I'm ready, Rilla—just a minute)——"

Rilla clapped her hands authoritatively. "Enough, enough. Now sign your name. No—you shan't read it over—it's all right. Seal that letter up at once, do you hear? There! now, do hurry and dress."

As Carolyn fluttered about the room, donning her outdoor things, she fretted not a little over the letter.

"Oh, dear, I ought to have read it, Rilla. He's so correct, and if there should be mistakes——"

"Nonsense! If you don't stop that worrying habit, you'll be old before your time. Come on now, are you ready?"

The next day a huge box of lovely roses came for Miss Carolyn Winterburn. Her eyes danced.

"Oh, what dreams they are! I suppose dear old Phil sent them, he's such a——"

But the name on the card was that of Lewis MacDowell.

Carolyn gasped. "Such an unheard of thing for him to do! He's—progressing."

On Wednesday evening he appeared promptly at eight. The roses had disconcerted Carolyn and she was conscious of distinct embarrassment when she went forward to greet him.

"It was so—so good of you," he murmured. His voice was actually husky. "I've been treasuring it ever since."

"Treasuring what?" stammered Carolyn.

"That—that letter."

"Oh, you liked it, then?"

"Liked it! How can you doubt it? I've been in Heaven ever since." This certainly sounded amazingly unlike the customary formal observations of Prof. Lewis MacDowell.

"I'm sure I don't—don't understand you in the least!"

"Then you—you didn't mean it?"

"Mean what? What did I say?"

"There!" he cried, and pointed to the closing lines. "Didn't you mean that?"

She looked and read:

"You somehow help me to think truer and deeper. Yes, you may come on Wednesday evening. I shall look forward to seeing you. Lovingly, CAROLYN."

The girl's cheeks were crimson. "Oh, it's all a mistake! How could you think I would! Rilla was in the room—I was in a hurry—and—oh, I didn't mean it, I assure you! It's all a dreadful mistake!"

"All a mistake? Then I—I was wrong! And there isn't any—any hope for me, after all!"

Carolyn laughed softly. A bewildering light flashed in the hazel eyes.

"Men are so stupid!" she murmured. "I didn't say that, did I?"

HER PROFESSION.

"You don't seem a bit glad to see me, and I thought that you'd meet me with open arms." Miss Alice Martin—Gladys Forbes it was on the bill-boards—made up a most delectable pout as she shook hands with Austin on the station platform. Austin tried to summon up a light smile, and ended by glaring fiercely at the trunks and scenery, and other trappings and appurtenances of The Lost Girl company that were dumped from the luggage van.

"I am glad to see you, very glad, but the sight of all that makes me hot," and he waved his hand comprehensively to include not only the unoffending luggage, but the rest of the company grouped about the perspiring and voluble manager.

"All that! Do you know, sir, that you are insulting my bread and butter? Do you realise that as the leading lady of the only company possessing the exclusive dramatic rights to that great drama, The Lost Girl, I am entitled to some consideration, professional if not personal?" and she swept him a mocking courtesy. The man recognised the bit of oratory with a very brief smile.

"Come, my cousin, do not bend your brows so fiercely upon me. You were not wont to treat me so in the old days. Time was when you were merry as a summer's day, and danced down the hours as lightly as the aspen leaf fluttering in the sunlight. But now your face is dark and stern and your look holds a brooding menace. Do you think it right to treat your long-lost cousin so?" And she made a gay pretence of begging for mercy, while her eyes danced with laughter.

"For Heaven's sake, Alice——"

"'For my sake' would be more like the gay cavalier I used to know," interrupted his tormentor.

"Drop that blank verse style of speech, Alice. You sound like a historical novel. Forget the stage for a few minutes, if you can, and listen to me."

"Another lecture," the girl heaved a deep sigh of sham resignation. "You might, at least, be taking me in the direction of my hotel. I've no call to be wasting all my time."

"Alice, you impudent little wretch, I'd like to shake you."

"You can't, at least, not till you get me to my hotel. I don't know my way about your town, so you're free to insult me to your heart's content for the next quarter of an hour. Then I may get the manager to thrash you for me."

"I beg your pardon, little girl. I didn't mean to hurt you, but I suppose it did sound rude. But, Alice, I want only your own good."

"Oh, yes," she cried out, impatiently. "My own good! How many times have I heard that in my life! My nurse used to say it when she gave me rhubarb and castor oil. My governess said it when she set me long French exercises to write because I preferred the open air and the sunshine to the stuffy schoolroom and the stupid books. Why, when papa died, and my heart was nearly broken, the minister told me that my sorrow was all for the chastening of my spirit. And now you tell me that you insult me and my profession in order that you may prove to me how ardently you desire my highest happiness."

There was no mistaking the indignation that shone in the blue eyes. Every feature of her and every line of her figure were eloquent of injured womanhood and dignity.

"No, no! You misunderstand me. I protest I meant no slight to you or to your profession. Knowing you, I should be the last man in the world to speak a word or think a thought that was not full of respect and honour for you. And your profession is a good one, too—a noble one, sometimes; but for you—Alice, don't you see what I mean? Can't you understand how it cuts me to see you buffeted about the country from town to town in the company of people who are not fit to look at you in the street, much less to travel in the same 'bus with you. And then to think of you night after night exhibiting your talents to a houseful of grinning and applauding idiots."

"Do you mean that they are idiots to applaud me?" Her tone was calm but dangerous.

"Saints forbid! They'd be raving lunatics and paralytics to boot if they didn't. But I don't like the thought of the whole business. You were made for things so infinitely better—finer."

"Yes, starving, for instance. How would you like the thought of that? Consider it for a moment. A lonely garret, a pallet of straw in the corner on which lies a pallid, emaciated girl, bearing faint traces of her early freshness and beauty, the cold moon peeping in at the window—I wonder why the moon is always cold when it peeps through garret windows—a fireless grate—fancy a grate in a garret—and so on, and so on, and so on."

"Come, Alice, be serious. I may not see you again for a long time."

"Therefore you must be as rude as possible in the shortest space of time. Are editors always rude? Is it a habit they acquire from their playful bouts with the esteemed contemporary in the next street, or the next county, or the next somewhere else?"

"But to think of you having to earn your living."

"Don't think of it, then, if it causes you so much pain," this very sharply. "I'm sure I never asked you to. You are not only insulting, but unjust as well, and very silly. Why shouldn't I earn my own living? Am I any less, or more, than human? I must live, and, therefore, I must work. Papa left me nothing but his blessing and the memory of the happiest, most care-free girlhood that ever was lived in this dull old world. When I found that I must work I took stock of my few poor talents. I might have taken in washing, or gone out as a charwoman, but the thought of my poor hands red and swollen filled me with dismay. How would you like to see me with my hands in a wash-tub?"

Austin was calmer and more nearly master of himself than before. "Depend on whose tub it was."

Miss Alice scented danger and diverted the attack. "A friend of papa's knew Mr Crufts, the manager, and got me a little part—such a little part. I had to dust the parlour furniture and say 'Yes'm' and 'No'm' and then courtesy in a way that threatened to dislocate my spinal column and run out. But I persevered and I studied and I got a better part. It was dreadfully hard work. I cried myself to sleep more times than I shall ever confess, but work conquers all things, or something of that sort, and here I am. Not rich, not even successful, but making enough to buy my gowns and now and then a hat."

"But, Alice, don't you ever get tired of it? Don't you want—it's an awfully hard life for a girl knocking about the country."

"Get tired of it. Of course I do, being human. Don't you get tired of writing editorials sometimes?"

"Oh, yes. Lots of other people get tired of them, too."

"I think there are times when all of us, even the best, hate the very sight of the goose that lays the golden eggs for us. But this is my profession. I'm beginning to know it and I'm proud of it—yes, proud of it. Why shouldn't I be? And will you please tell me what else I am to do? Will you give me a place on your newspaper? Will you teach me to write editorials? Or, perhaps, you would like me to draw the fashion plates. I'm sure it wouldn't matter how I drew them, for no woman ever looked or dressed like those creatures, even on the stage."

They were very near the hotel, and Austin felt that he must have appeared anything but impressive to this tantalising bit of femininity at his side. He spoke quickly lest she should escape him before he had said what was in his heart. "There is a place I have to offer you, Alice, but it isn't in my office. It's in my home. You must know, surely you know how I feel."

The girl stopped and drew back from him a step. "So-o! That is why you have spoken so disparagingly of my work. You thought to make it seem small in my eyes; to show me how little it was worth to myself or to anyone else." Austin lifted his hand appealingly and stepped forward. She drew back a pace.

"No. Don't speak to me. Don't look at me." She laughed in a quick, angry fashion. "How you must have been praising yourself as we came along for your adroitness and, above all, for your charity and your sublime self-sacrifice. Well, you have failed. I love my work and I shall keep at it in spite of your thoughtful pity. If I ever marry any man, Mr. James Austin, it will be because he comes to me in some other guise than as a home for incompetent and discouraged actresses."

She ran up the hotel steps leaving him dismayed, and almost cowed by her contempt and bitter scorn. When he recovered his power of speech he reviled the stage in all the terms of objurgation at his command and went back to his office.

The audience at the theatre that night included all the town who were not bankrupt or bedridden, but it did not contain Mr. James Austin. That gentleman sat gloomily at his desk pretending to work.

The play was in the full swing of the third act. The villain had been repulsed by the heroine and was preparing to carry her away to his mountain fastness. There are no mountain fastnesses in England really, but the exigencies of the legitimate drama demand them for the third act, and the exigencies must have their way.

Miss Martin stood in the wings near the stage-door, waiting for her cue to go on. It was a warm night in early autumn, and the door was wide open. A knot of stage-hands stood about, some within and some without the door. The sound of hurrying feet outside caught her ear, and she turned her head as a boy came running up the street and stopped at the door.

"What's up, boy?" a man inquired casually. "You seem to be in a hurry."

"Mr. Austin's been shot!" The girl inside started forward with a low cry that no one in the startled group heard.

"Austin shot!" "When?" "Who did it?"

"Don't know. Nobody knows. He was settin' at his desk 'n' somebody shot 'im through the window 'n' he fell over dead, quick as that!"

The boy described the editor's fall in a realistic pantomime.

Alice felt the solid earth reel beneath her feet. Her eyes were wide and staring, and her heart was clutched in a cold grasp. Jim dead! Her cousin whom she had known ever since she had known anything. The boy who had carried her books and brought her birds' eggs, and bright pebbles from the beach, and all the other tokens of a boy's affection. Jim! The man who had been her hero when he had thrown up his position on a great newspaper, because he held his own convictions higher than his salary, and had buried himself in this sleepy country town where he at least had freedom to speak out what he thought without the fear of offending some rich advertiser choking the words in his throat.

Jim! Who had offered her that night the love of a heart that had always hungered for her.

And then at last she knew what had before been only a vague, unspoken possibility, a shadowy dream of the future—that it was Jim she had loved, more than her pride, more than her profession, more than her life. It was strange that in the midst of the pain and the grief that shut her in, the realisation that she knew her own heart was very sweet to her.

A touch on her shoulder aroused her. It was the manager.

"What is the matter? Why don't you go on? Hughes has given you your cue three times and the house will begin to think there's something wrong."

Yes, she must go on. Jim was dead and her heart was broken, but she must play her part. The stage is not so different from real life, after all. The audience never knew that night that every fibre in the body of the actress, whose grace and charm they applauded vociferously, throbbed with keenest pain for the cousin and lover lying dead. She said her lines, how she never knew. The stage was a dim blur in her eyes and the audience was far beyond the range of her consciousness.

The curtain fell and she found herself in the tiny corner partitioned off for the star's dressing-room. As she changed her costume for the street gown her mind was made up. She would see Jim that night, at once. His dead body, at least, should have the comfort of the presence that had been denied him living.

But where had they taken him? Some one could tell her at the office, surely. A stage-hand told her the way with a curious look on his face, and she hurried through the quiet streets. Her mind was keenly alive now to her loss. Jim was dead. Jim, who had always stood to her for everything alive and human, pulsing with energy and ambition. The man who that afternoon had offered her the love of a warm, thrilling heart, was a cold, senseless lump of clay.

The windows of the newspaper office were bright and through them came the thump and whirl of presses. Unfeeling wretches to be so busy and unconcerned when the master mind of them all was still. She pushed open the first door and stood before the cashier's desk.

"Where have they taken him—Mr. Austin?"

The cashier stared. "They haven't taken him anywhere, miss. He's upstairs in his office where he always is at night."

"Where he always is!" Was their business of life then so urgent that it could not stand still for one short hour while they paid a small tribute of care and attention to him? She climbed the stairs with trembling limbs and a heart that seemed as cold and dead in her bosom as his that the murderer's bullet had stilled forever.

The door at the top marked "Managing Editor" stood partly open, and from within came the sound of loud voices and then a laugh. For a moment her grief was overmastered by her indignation. Was it—he—in there? She, at least, could sorrow for him.

She pushed the door back and stood on the threshold, and saw—Jim, alive and sound as ever, sitting at his desk and listening carelessly to a grimy, tousled man, whose face and hands bore evidences of much contact with ink and glue. The blood rushed to her heart and the lights danced around her in a mad, bacchanalian whirl. She put out her hand to find support, and then Jim saw her.

"Why, Alice! What is it? Why are you here?" The grimy man looked and grinned. Jim hurried forward and grasped her hands. At the sound of his voice and the touch of his hands the warm blood coursed through all her veins again, and she gasped at the heat that filled her.

"Oh, Jim!" And she clutched his hands tighter. "I thought—they said—you were dead; that some one had shot you."

He laughed a great laugh of comprehension. "So you heard that, did you? Why, little girl, he never touched me. Some crazy fool did take a shot at me through the window, but it was just by way of an emphatic reply to one of my editorials. All the harm he did was to smash a pane of glass and punch a hole in the ceiling. He's cooling his heels in the lock-up now."

She sat down suddenly in the chair at her elbow. Human nerves are like engines—apt to run wild when the load is suddenly taken off. Her heart was beating like a steam-hammer and her brain was in a whirl.

"What must you think of me? I was so frightened, and I expected to find—to find you——" she broke off with a shudder and shut her eyes.

"You expected to find a mangled corpse, and instead you find me alive and disgustingly healthy. Are you disappointed?"

"Don't Jim, please. I can't bear to hear—to joke—about it—to think about it. It was too horrible. I thought I should die." He looked at her curiously, a new light dawning in his eyes.

"Are you sure it was only cousinly affection that brought you here?" He awaited her answer breathlessly. The grimy man had retired, like the sensible individual that he was, and the office was empty of all save those two. The girl studied the floor and the tips of her shoes long and carefully. Then she lifted her eyes slowly to his face.

"I never said it was, Jim, dear."

"And how about your profession, sweetheart?" he inquired, after a well-spent interval.

"My profession is here, with you—wherever you are. I didn't know it this afternoon, but to-night taught me what I might have known all my life—what an empty, hopeless thing life would be without you. I'm only a woman, after all, Jim."

Refreshing Candour.

Guest: "Isn't my dinner ready yet?" New Waiter: "Oh, certainly; it was ready yesterday. It is just being warmed up a little."

Not Her Own Foot.

Lady (on leaving crowded carriage): "Well, I'm glad to get out of the crowd. I've had to stand on one foot all the way." Voice from the Corner: "Yes, and that foot was mine."

Sisters.

Livingston: "I didn't know that you and Miss Featherspray were so well acquainted." Nina: "Oh, yes; we are distantly related." Livingston: "How?" Nina: "We have both promised to be sisters to the same young man."

About Kissing.

He: "My dear cousin, I assure you I would never dare rob those sweet lips of a kiss." She: "Oh, you hypocrite! Didn't you make an attempt of that character the other day?" He: "Never. Far from having any intention of robbing you of a kiss, I was trying to give you one."

Why the Goods were Broken.

Pat Malony was nailing a box which he intended sending by rail. It was essential that the box should not be inverted during the passage, and a friend ventured to suggest to Pat to write conspicuously on the case: "This side up, with care." A few days afterwards, seeing Pat, he asked: "Heard any more about your goods? Did they get there safely?" "Every one of them broke," said Pat. "The whole lot? Did you label it 'this side up,' as I told you?" "Yes, I did. And for fear they shouldn't see it on the top, I put it on the bottom, too."

COMMONPLACE JACK.

"If Jack wasn't so hopelessly commonplace!" sighed Mary Partridge, as she leant over the garden gate and watched her husband's clumsy figure move heavily down the village street. "And it does seem as though he grew more ugly and awkward every day of life," muttered she.

A step on the gravel walk aroused her from her discontented musing, and turning, she met the smiling face and handsome dark eyes of the young man who lodged next door.

"Don't look so disconsolate, Mrs. Partridge," said he gaily, disclosing his white teeth in a mocking smile. "Jack is coming home to dinner, isn't he?"

"Of course, Mr. Blake," answered Mary, the colour deepening in her face as she moved back a step.

"I—I was only thinking a bit," continued Mary, forcing a smile.

"Come, Mary, tell me all about it," said he softly. "Is marriage a failure, or is it not?"

Mary gave a slight toss of her head, and, without a word, turned and walked swiftly towards the house.

A complacent smile curved the young man's lips as he proceeded on his way.

"That girl is about as much in love with her middle-aged husband as I am," muttered he.

Indeed, that was the whole truth of the matter. Mary Partridge was not in love with her husband and never had been. Like many another village maiden, she had grown weary with the struggle for self-maintenance and had accepted her first good offer of marriage. Jack Partridge was a bachelor of forty, plain-looking, steady and industrious, earning the good wages of a mechanic, and the owner of a pretty cottage house.

To Mary this seemed almost wealth, and, smothering her desire for a more romantic attachment, she had gladly accepted the good fortune that had come to her. A year had passed, and with it the novelty of her comfortable surroundings, and a feeling of discontent had crept into Mary's heart.

Jack's quiet good-nature, his simple, unpretending manners and homely domestic ways had begun to pall upon her.

Her face burnt and her heart beat uncomfortably as she hastened into the house with Arthur Blake's words ringing in her ears.

"Is marriage a failure, Mary, or is it not?"

Over and over again Mary asked herself this question as she busied herself about the sunny kitchen, dusted her pretty parlour, and arranged the china and silver upon the snowy cloth of the dinner table.

Suddenly the answer came with swift conviction, and Mary clasped her hands together in mute despair. It was a failure—a miserable failure, she thought bitterly.

To give up forever her freedom, her liberty of action, her every chance in life, for what? Mary's eyes glanced round the room and answered for her. Yes, she had a pretty home, and Jim was kind to her and loved her more than she deserved, and yet—ah! her life was simply unbearable.

With this thought came an uncontrollable desire to escape from the bonds that held her, to snap the chains that she herself had wrought, and to go away, somewhere, anywhere, only to go—go!

As if driven by some invisible power, Mary snatched a hat from its nail and rushed from the house.

Across the well-kept grass-plot at the rear of the cottage Mary sped, out through the gate, and over the wide meadow that lay between the lawn and the dusty highway.

The sun shone, the birds sang, the grass was strewn with buttercups and daisies, and the air was fragrant with summer's sweetest perfume, but Mary heeded them not. Breathless and panting, she reached the long stretch of country road just as the village clock struck twelve. Jack would be coming home to dinner, and sometimes he came that way, thought Mary, and again that feeling that she must flee from him, from the pretty home, the hateful marriage bonds, urged her footsteps. The gleaming railway track lay across the road a short distance ahead.

The throbbing of her brain, the beating of her heart, deafened her ears to the approaching train, and swiftly she crossed the track. As she gained the other side she saw Jack's familiar figure coming towards her. Again, that curious desire to fly from him took possession of her and she hastily turned back.

"Mary! What are you about?" cried a man's voice, and two strong arms pushed her from the track, and she fell forward upon her face in the dust, while the train thundered on.

Stunned for a few moments, Mary did not move; then, with an effort, she rose to her feet, wondering at the strange silence about her.

Where was Jack? Her dazed eyes glanced up and down and fell at last upon a silent form that lay huddled against the track.

"Oh, Jack, have I killed you?" she cried in agony, as she bent over him.

Gathering his head and shoulders within her strong young arms, Mary dragged him into the cool grass beneath the shade of a huge tree.

Save for the slow rise and fall of that broad chest, Jack Partridge lay as one dead, and Mary's repentant tears and the touch of her trembling fingers fell unheeded upon that pale face.

It was but a few minutes, but it seemed hours to Mary in her suspense and remorse, before help arrived and her husband was carried slowly and carefully back to his cottage home.

Through the long night hours, while two physicians were working over Jack's poor, bruised body, there awoke in the heart of Mary Partridge a revelation. With horror and disgust she looked back upon her wild impulse of the morning.

"If Jack dies, he will have given his life for mine," she murmured through her sobs, "and no man can do more than that. What am I that I should scorn such a love, or call it commonplace?"

"Your husband will live. He has asked to see you," said the physician's voice.

"A pretty close shave, wasn't it?" whispered Jack, as his wife leant tenderly over him. "But whatever possessed you to come to meet me this morning, Mary?"

"I cannot tell, Jack dear," answered Mary, as she bent and kissed him.

NAME HUNTING COMPETITION.

Football Clubs and Players.

1st Prize: £25.
2nd Prize: £10.
5 Prizes of £1 each.

Special Prize for Ladies. A six-guinea costume, which the winner may have made anywhere and send the bill to us.

In the event of ladies winning the first cash prize, the Special Prize will go to the lady next most nearly correct. Should gentlemen win the first cash prize, the Special Prize will go to the lady most nearly correct. In the event of a tie it will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

On the opposite column will be found thirty sets of words, each set describing the name of either a football club or a football player.

Write down in the spaces provided the names of all those clubs and players you can discover. If you can't find all, put down as many as you can.

Note These Facts. . .

1. Names must be written in ink.
2. Only one name is allowed against each set of words.
3. Where initials are indicated they must be put down. If omitted, the solution will be wrong.
4. When you have filled up your list, cut it out and get the number of Pearson's Weekly published on Friday, February 21st, and fill up the coupon which it contains.
5. You may send in as many sets of lists as you like, but each set will be accepted independently, and must be pinned together.
6. In the event of the prize being divided, only one share will go to each successful competitor, no matter how many duplicate attempts he may send in.
7. No competitor may receive the assistance of professional competition solvers whose advertisements appear in the Press. Every person who enters for this competition must do so only on this understanding, and those selected as winners may be asked to satisfy us that they have not contravened this condition.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the reader from whom we receive coupons containing the greatest number of correct solutions. The second prize will be given to the sender of the next most nearly correct solutions, and so on. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor, whose decision is final.

The prizes are all offered by Pearson's Weekly.

All the names depicted will be found in "Football Who's Who," which contains the biographies of nearly a thousand players, and can be obtained for 1s. 3d., post free, from the publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A MATTER OF MILLIONS.

Being the very last recorded incident in the Career of Siever Crafte, of Chicago, Millionaire: from Notes made at the time by Captain Edward Harvey, British Vice-Consul at the Port of Manila, and since communicated by him to Ralph Enderby.

CHAPTER I.

"WHAT SHIP IS THAT?"

"No; there's no one aboard."

"But surely there is some responsible person in charge! Besides, my business is important."

"Can't help it, Mister; cap'n's ashore, and so's the Chief.' Second-mate ain't appointed yet; and——"

"Mr. Blaine, the owner, that's who I want to see. I heard he was here less than ten minutes ago."

"Well, he ain't here now!—and p'raps the chap as told you so much 'll tell you more! I'm in charge and—no—I don't know nothing."

Bruce Doyle bit his lip with vexation, though he felt instinctively that the other was lying.

Hailing from Scotland Yard, where suspicion is as "the nostril's breath," and having, too, a more than shrewd idea that somewhere within the limits of the Loch Katrine the master-spirit lurked, for purposes of his own, not altogether easy of explanation, he was disinclined to accept defeat on the first repulse, and on the very threshold of inquiry.

The cautious sailorman—half-bos'un, half-ship's-carpenter—a marine all-round man—watched his unwelcome visitor's evident hesitation from the screwed-up corners of his cunning little eyes, but said nothing to help him to a decision.

"Well," said Doyle at last, "I'll look round to-morrow morning, about this time. Mr. Blaine's likely to be on board then, isn't he?"

"Maybe—can't say for certain; but the chances is as he will be."

"I'll take it at that, then. If, in the meantime, he should ask who called, you can say—Mr. Bruce—of Westminster."

"Right! Mr. Bruce—of Westminster—I won't forget. Hi! hold on a minnit" (as the other turned to go down the gangway on to the quay), "I'm sure—now I come to think of it—as he will be aboard at this time to-morrow."

"Do you know where he is now?" asked the detective quickly.

"No—I don't! And if you want to know any more, just you wait till to-morrow morning—Mr. Bruce—of Westminster."

Seeing that nothing was to be got out of the man, Doyle left the vessel—a barque-rigged steamer, of rakish build, and of about 900 tons burden. He stopped, however, at the further corner of the quay, in the shadow of one of the warehouses, and stood a while looking intently at the low, black hull of the Loch Katrine.

"It's a thousand pities!" he ruminated bitterly, "our people can't persuade the Government to grant a 'detainer' or a search warrant; they're always afraid of offending a foreign somebody, or something. This Blaine hasn't applied for clearing papers up to now; and yet I'm as certain as that my name's Doyle, that she's on the move. I'm just powerless! I've got the case in hand, while the hand is as good as 'cuffed,' for all the free use I have of it. Anyway, I'll be on the spot a couple of hours or so before my stated time; perhaps that will trap my bird, and enable me to see if he has anything under his wing."

Then a thought struck him; in a flash it came to him that men who engage in sea-brigandage, of a semi-political sort, often change their names, as a measure of prudence and convenience.

The American invasion of the Philippines was in full blast, and already it had been rumoured that more than one degenerate citizen of the Republic had financed and made common cause with the Malay marauders of the Eastern Seas with the object of preying upon British and American commerce in those waters.

"Supposing his name isn't Blaine! It's just possible. Once I could get him on that, the rest would be easy. It's an odd thing, but nobody's seen him; nobody, that is, whose opinion is worth anything to me. I've got a strange notion that—if I could but put my eyes on him—I should tap the mystery surrounding this same Loch Katrine. I'll ask the Dock Superintendent if I may leave a man to watch her till the morning."

But the Superintendent of the Victoria Docks could not quite see his way to this.

"You see, Mr.—er—Doyle, you haven't a shred of documentary authority to go on. Evidently the Government are not sure of their ground, and until I see an official 'detainer' or State warrant, I'm afraid I shouldn't be justified in doing anything which might, for aught I know, be a flagrant breach of international law. The ship is American, at any rate now, though she was bought in this country, and sails under the American flag, and as I burnt my fingers once before with Yankee fire, I am not too eager to risk another pleasure of the same sort."

"Well, I am in the position only to request," said Doyle regretfully; "and there's nothing more for me to do but to have patience till the morning. Perhaps my luck will turn then."

"I hope so," replied the other.

"At least," said Doyle, "you can tell me if you know whether the Loch Katrine has given any sign of immediate sailing?"

"Even on that head I know nothing. But there! she cannot possibly 'clear' before to-morrow, I think, and by then something may have turned up to settle the matter one way or the other."

Whatever the detective may have thought, he did not express himself, but with a curt "good-day," left the office, and in a quarter of an hour was in a hansom and on his way to Westminster.

Scarce was his back turned than the door of the port after state-room of the Loch Katrine slowly opened, and a man, tall, spare, and cadaverously sallow of face, stepped into the saloon.

Moving quickly across the deck he tapped smartly at the closed door of one of the side cabins.

"Hullo!" came in a muffled voice from within.

"All right, Carter! I want you."

"Beg pardon, Mr. Craf——"

"S——h! man! Blaine, as long as we're in the neighbourhood of this hateful island!"

Hal Carter, the chief officer of the Loch Katrine knew his man too well to keep him waiting long, and in a second or two joined his employer at the saloon table.

"Now, Carter," said the owner of the steamer, "who d'ye think's been paying us a visit this afternoon, eh?"

"Can't say, sir, unless it's 'Lloyd's' man."

"Nary 'Lloyd's,' sonny! what would you say to a sneaking detective, spying round for a loose thread?"

"A detective! They're not going to stop us, after all our precautions, are they?"

"Well, Dyson," said the detective to the sunburnt mercantile-marine man who stood waiting to be questioned.

"Stop us! not if I know it. No; it seems that the British Government half suspect us, but are not quite sure of the facts, so that they won't go the length of a 'detainer' or a search warrant, but just employ a Scotland Yard chap to find out what he can, how he can, all the time smiling at our ambassador, as though they wouldn't entertain a bad opinion of anything American for the world."

"Did the policeman see anything?"

"No, he didn't. You I'd told to keep close in your berth; the half-dozen men that are to work us over to Amsterdam were snugly loafing in the engine-room, also by my orders, and we've no skipper or second-mate. I fancy, too, that my gentleman found an over-tough morsel to chew in old Meyrick."

"Well, he can't do us much harm, anyway."

"Not if I can help it. Now listen, Carter—you are in charge, remember, till we reach Holland where, as you know, we are to ship the arms and ammunition. There too, we shall make up our complement of men; you will give way to Captain Powers, and take up your duties as chief-officer, and then hey! for Luzon and the Bay of Manila at which place I have arranged to meet Mei-ying on the fifteenth of August."

"And we sail?"

"To-night on the ebb. I have the clearing papers—got them half-an-hour ago—and once outside the dock-gates and the river, I defy Scotland Yard and the British Government itself to catch me this side the Scheldt!"

"Shall I call Meyrick in here, and give him his orders?"

"I guess you'd better, for I want to ask him a question or two."

Carter went out through the cuddy and beckoned to Meyrick, who stood by the main-hatch whittling a long piece of hard wood.

"Anything to tell me about that chap who was here awhile ago, Meyrick—did he tell you his name?"

"Mr. Bruce—of Westminster, sir."

"Oh! Mr. Bruce—of Westminster! Well, he's sailed pretty close to the truth. And what did Mr. Bruce—of Westminster—say, when he found he couldn't see anybody?"

"He said, sir, as he'd come again to-morrow morning at the same time; and from what you told me this morning, Mr. Craf—I mean, Mr. Blaine—I told him as you were sure to be aboard!"

"Meyrick, you're a daisy! Sure to be aboard—yes, but not visible to Mr. Bruce—of Westminster. Ha! ha! ha!"

And so it was that when, the next morning at nine o'clock—a good two hours before the time he had mentioned—Bruce Doyle swung along the road leading to Quay "C." Victoria Docks, the Loch Katrine's berth was vacant. She had sailed, ten hours before, on the ebb, for Amsterdam.

CHAPTER II.

The Compact of Blood.

Captain Edward Harvey, British Vice-Consul at Manila, and at this time Acting Consul, looked not a little puzzled over a card which his Philippino servant had just brought in to him.

"I don't know the man! 'Bruce Doyle, Criminal Investigation Department, Scotland Yard.' Chasing some poor beggar, I suppose, who has managed to break through to here. All right, Pablo! show the—er—gentleman in."

"Sit down, Mr. Doyle; we don't often see one of your cloth in Manila. Must be something special, I should think."

"Yes, Captain Harvey—something very special; and if you will be good enough to give me a few moments for explanation, I shall be able to convince you, I think, that it is something which demands your instant and earnest attention."

"Hullo! this sounds exciting. It is not a conventional case, or a conventional criminal, then, that brings you here?"

"No, sir. I am on the track of a man at once the cleverest, the richest, and the most unscrupulous that lives, or ever has lived."

"That's a fairly big order, isn't it?"

"Not half big enough, sir; and when I tell you that the individual in question is the notorious Siever Crafte——"

"Siever Crafte! here—in Manila?"

"Yes, sir! no other; and now you know the man you'll agree with me, I think, that it is no ordinary case or ordinary criminal, with whom we have to deal."

"Let's hear your story, Mr. Doyle," said the Vice-Consul. "Anything about Crafte is interesting; but when it is told within earshot of him, as it were, why—it is positively thrilling!"

"Briefly then, sir, I was instructed, in an informal sort of way, to find out, if I could, the why, what, and wherefore of a certain steamer, the Loch Katrine, lying in the export basin at the Victoria Docks, London. The Government suspected that she was loading contraband of war, or, at any rate, was destined for privateering, or similar purposes, but as she flew the Stars and Stripes, and as nothing certain was known, no warrant or detainer was issued."

"That did not give you much of a chance."

"No, sir. Well, I was baffled at every turn, and though the Foreign Office had an idea that Blaine, the owner, who was said to be on board, was suspiciously active in the financing of schemes of this sort, I failed altogether in getting a sight of him.

"The last time I boarded the vessel at the quayside there was no sign of life on deck. Blaine was absolutely invisible, and I had to content myself with the assurance of the quartermaster in charge that the owner would be on board the next morning at the same hour. To be on the right side, however, I determined to be early, but on reaching the docks a couple of hours before the appointed time, I found, to my disgust, that the Loch Katrine had cleared ten hours before, and that probably by that time she was a hopeless stern chase.

"To come quickly to the pith of the story I accidentally, as I was leaving the quay, mad almost with disappointment and chagrin, fell up against a chap who, it seems, had been, at the last moment, summarily dismissed by Blaine—for what, I do not know. This man gave me such information—obtained, he told me, by the chance overhearing of a conversation between Blaine and the ship's chief-mate—that, there and then, I decided to make first for Amsterdam, and then, for wherever the news I might get in the Dutch capital might lead me."

"What did you learn?"

"That Blaine and Siever Crafte were one and the same; that twelve hours before my arrival the Loch Katrine—renamed the King of the East—had left for the Philippines. She had shipped, in record time, a big cargo of arms and ammunition, and a crew of over a hundred men, chiefly Americans, who had arrived the day before on the Atlantic Transport boat from New York.

"Putting two and two together—Siever Crafte and an armed cruiser—I judged myself warranted in following up the trail."

"Quite right! But tell me, have you any idea whereabouts this precious vessel is?"

"No; but my original informant—whom I have brought with me—is at the present moment prosecuting inquiries among the hands by the waterside here, and I don't despair of his finding out something which shall give me a clue to catch Siever Crafte; and to hold him will not only contribute to the peace of these waters, but will settle more than one old score we have against him."

"He is rich, isn't he?"

"Rich, sir! How he got them, no man knows, but he is worth millions—of pounds sterling, not dollars—and it is of course this fact which gives him the power for evil that he undoubtedly possesses."

"Man—for the Señor."

"All right, Pablo; bring him in. It's your 'State evidence,' Mr. Doyle. One word. As this concerns the American people even more than it does us, what we know, and whatever this man may tell us, I must communicate to the United States admiral at once."

"Well, Dyson?" said the detective to the sunburnt, keen-eyed mercantile-marine man who stood, hat in hand, waiting to be questioned.

"The King of the East, sir, ex Loch Katrine, hove-to off the bar three days ago. Six men left the steamer and were brought by a large 'proa' to Manila. They got drunk, chattered, and let out, before returning to their ship by the same means, that the destination of the King of the East was Palawan Bay, on the East, and that they expected to meet there with a number of Malay 'proas' and Chinese junks."

"Is she still off the bar?" cried Harvey.

"No, sir; she was only hove-to four-and-twenty hours, and then steamed away to the eastward."

"Doyle, this is worse than even you imagined. Palawan Bay is the lair of Mei-ying, the Amazon widow of the dead pirate chief, Ching-Yih! Depend upon it, Siever Crafte is bringing his millions and his western fighting methods to combine with that beautiful she-devil!"

A fixed look, an imperious order or two, together with a few mysterious hand passes, and the pirate-queen was another woman.

"What do you suggest, sir?" queried Doyle, fully as excited as the other.

"First," replied the Vice-Consul, "I will apprise the United States authorities, and then, in the British Consulate steamer, you and I, and the man here, will leave Manila for Palawan to destroy, if we may, this 'compact of blood,' between Mei-ying, the Pirate Queen, and Siever Crafte, the Chicago man of millions."

CHAPTER III.

A Startling Development.

Along the coast-line of Luzon, Mindoro, and the other Philippines, are countless, and, in some instances, naturally impregnable indentations, which form convenient hiding-places and centres for the Malay waterthieves, who issue thence in inconceivable numbers, to plunder and to kill on the slightest provocation.

It was in one of these notches on the Luzon coast, but a mile or two north of the Bay of Palawan, that the dreaded Mei-ying was known to have her headquarters. Her reputation for murderous ferocity and skill in her nefarious profession was such that no one cared to meddle with her, the new American masters of the Philippines having far too much on their hands—in a political and legitimately belligerent way—to be able to give serious attention to a mere piratical detail.

The place was peculiar, half-cave, half-reed and bamboo hut, the latter forming a sort of deep verandah in front of the rock face.

Two people, totally diverse in every respect, sat in two ordinary deck chairs outside engaged in conversation, agreeable evidently to only one of them.

A man and a woman; the latter was remarkable both in appearance and manner.

Very beautiful, in an Eastern sense, her picturesquely gorgeous, if somewhat bizarre costume was a strikingly appropriate and becoming setting for her personal charms.

Her companion we know, for we have met him in London, St. Petersburg, on the Transvaal Veld, and in the shadow of the Great Wall of China.

Siever Crafte, millionaire and mystery-man, does not seem the worse for his bullet-wound that night in the tomb of the Ming Emperors.

"When," asked Mei-ying, who spoke English with hardly the trace of an accent, "when do we begin our war upon these Yankee barbarians?"

"When you will," replied Crafte, lighting a fresh cigar. "But, as I have told you, it can only be on the conditions I have laid down. For years now I have supplied you with money to carry on your trade, and now, because I think the time ripe to take personal action, with a view of getting some of my own back, you put every obstacle in the way."

Digitized by Google

An angry light glittered in Mei-ying's eyes, but her voice was soft and plausible as she answered him:

"My friend; I want not to hurt you—to rob you! For long I have known you by my ears, and in my heart as the one who has helped to make me—what I am."

"I know! I know! but wouldn't it be as well to leave sentiment out of it altogether. My account against you for something like six years amounts to considerably over two million dollars, and as I propose, by means of the King of the East, and those who man her, and a little aid from your own niggers, to recoup myself, and, I hope, a trifle over, I can't quite see how you can consider yourself in any way hardly done by."

"And is that all? Am I, Mei-ying, to take but a second place in what is done? I will not! I will not!"

"I think you will, or, at all events, you will weigh it well before you decline to play the game, as I have planned it."

"Do you know that I have cut off all communication between this place and your ship yonder; and that I have but to lift my finger and you are a dead man?"

"Possibly, but—I think not likely. It may interest you, Mei-ying, to know that I also have made my arrangements and that a certain signal from me to that man yonder on the bridge of the King of the East will bring instant ruin upon you and yours. I should advise you, therefore, to think twice before you do anything rash in connection with myself."

Siever Crafte's power as a hypnotist had, in the course of his career, been often tested, and he deemed this an opportune moment for its exercise.

A fixed look, an imperious order or two, together with a few mysterious hand-passes, and the pirate-queen was another woman.

On her brow stood beads of sweat, while her whole body trembled and shuddered in a way hitherto unknown to her.

"Come with me," said Crafte authoritatively, taking her by the hand; and she rose and walked by his side down the sloping path to the shore.

Out in the deep water were gathered more than a score of large "proas," each with their complement of Malay and Chinese cut-throats. On the seaward side of them lay at anchor the King of the East, while drawn up on the strand were a few small native boats and a quarter-boat from the steamer.

It was towards this latter that Crafte moved with Mei-ying.

"You will go on board your own 'proa,'" he said roughly to her, "and follow my lead in the steamer."

He then helped her into the boat; gave an order or two to the coxswain in charge, and awaited its return.

In a quarter of an hour the boat came back.

Before Crafte could set his foot in it, the coxswain sprang ashore and motioned him up the strand a little way.

"Well?"

"Do you know, sir, what's coming up round the point?"

"No! What?"

"Two American cruisers and a small private steamer flying the Union Jack."

"I don't believe it! the Yanks are too busy in Manila Bay, and as for a Britisher—you're dreaming man!"

"It's true as gospel, sir. Look! you can see 'em yourself now."

Crafte did not waste time in replying, but he saw the three vessels rounding the extreme western point.

Jumping with a bound into the stern-sheets of his own boat, he bid the men pull for all they were worth for the King of the East.

Not a word did he speak till the steamer was reached, and then it was but a brief order to chief-mate Carter, Captain Powers being laid up with fever.

"Up anchor, Carter! Quick, d'ye hear! and head under your last ounce of steam for Formosa!"

The Consulate steamer alone made show of pursuit; the American vessels turning their attention towards the pirate flotilla.

How Mei-ying, left miserably in the lurch by her scoundrelly ally, saw "proa" after "proa" sunk by the big guns of the Yankees; and how her own boat, and one other, managed almost miraculously to beach themselves, she herself, with half-a dozen of her followers, seeking the shelter of the forest a mile or two inland, would take too long in the telling. It may just be said that some weeks later a hunting-party of American Naval Officers came across, in the forest, the corpse of Mei-ying with, round her, the bodies of five of her crew.

* * * * *

Captain Harvey reported, a few days after the surprise at Palawan, that he had chased the King of the East for over a hundred miles in the direction of Formosa, and that he had only desisted from the pursuit through Crafte's vessel disappearing in a night fog. In the morning not a trace of the adventurer was to be seen.

* * * * *

The following extract from an article in a London daily, fairly expresses public opinion with regard to the British Government's attitude, and the want of action in the matter of the Loch Katrine.

After recapitulating the story of Siever Crafte's enterprise, the article goes on to say:

"The British Government, in the person of the Foreign Office, is ever only too disposed to sleep when it should be especially wide-awake.

"Here was a ship, bought in England by a man whom nobody sees, and which, from the moment that she is berthed in the Victoria Docks, is manifestly an object of suspicion. Now that suspicion has been only too well verified by results, perhaps our Official Masters will acknowledge that a little more energy in similar circumstances in the future is desirable. We understand that the detective who went to the Philippines on the track of this man Crafte has been 'carpeted' for misdirected zeal. This, on the face of it, is unjust, and, in a way, immoral; as, after all, Detective Doyle's theory was from the outset the correct one, and had he but been adequately supported by the authorities this precious American adventurer would not have slipped through our fingers. One consolation we have, albeit a poor one, Crafte's prospects of recovering his millions are now so remote that, wherever he is, he may be advised to write off the debt. His debtor is dead, and he, should he dare to face civilisation again, will assuredly do so with his liberty, if not his life, in his hand."

HARVEY SEELY'S WIFE.

"YOUR last day? Dear, dear, must you go to-day, Harvey?" said Mrs. Seely, looking across the breakfast table at her son, with affectionate concern.

And her daughters Kitty and Margery echoed her words.

"Couldn't you have got off for another week?" said his father, breaking a hot roll carefully. "Now, that you're partner, though——"

"Now that I'm partner, it's hard work getting off," responded Harvey Seely. "It was all I could do——"

He paused suddenly.

"What was all you could do?" inquired Kitty.

"Well," said Harvey, laying down his knife and fork with a beaming smile, "here goes. Here's the news I've been saving up for you till the last, from a natural modesty. It was all I could do to get things arranged so that I could go on my wedding trip a month hence. I am going to be married."

Kitty's spoon fell into her saucer with a clatter, and Mr. Seely dropped his roll hastily.

"Married!" said Margery breathlessly.

Mrs. Seely alone remained calm.

She rolled up her napkin, put it in its ring and looked at her son through her gold-rimmed glasses composedly.

She felt, however, that this was an important crisis.

When Harvey—their only son—had, with commendable independence, left his pleasant home to "get a start" in the neighbouring city, they had all expected great things of him.

He would be rapidly successful; he would distinguish himself in the profession he had chosen and amass a fortune; and he would woo and win some sweet girl, with a long row of ancestors—the Seelys, being themselves a good old family, were great respecters of blue blood—a host of accomplishments and a heavy dowry.

Their hopes had seemed likely to be fulfilled. Harvey had proved himself possessed of remarkable business qualities; he had risen quickly, and had recently exceeded their wildest ambitions by being made a junior partner of his firm.

All that now remained to be desired was his safe conquest of the beautiful and aristocratic young person of their dreams, with her many talents and substantial inheritance.

It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the girls were trembling with eagerness; that Mr. Seely fumbled with his watch-chain in nervous suspense, and that Mrs. Seely opened her lips twice before she found strength to propound the all-important question:

"Who is she?"

"She is a Miss Dora Berdan at present," said Harvey smilingly.

"Berdan?" Mrs. Seely repeated, and raised her brows inquiringly. "I don't think I have heard of the family."

"That's quite likely," Harvey rejoined. "They are quite people."

"Berdan!" Mrs. Seely repeated musingly. "No, I have not heard of them. Where do they live?"

"In Weyman Street," responded Harvey.

Mrs. Seely fell back in her chair with a little gasp; her husband turned a dismayed face upon his son; and Kitty and Margery gave little screams.

Weyman Street! It was miles from the region of aristocracy; it was peopled with working girls, and seamstresses and small shopkeepers; with street-vendors and old apple-women for all the Seelys knew.

"Not Weyman Street, Harvey?" said his father appealingly.

"Certainly; Weyman Street," Harvey repeated.

"But she is not—she cannot be of good family, living in Weyman Street?" said Mrs. Seely, anxiously.

"The family is quite respectable," her son responded quietly. "Dora's mother is a widow. She sews for a lace-goods house, and Dora has been assistant bookkeeper in our establishment; that is how I met her."

Mrs. Seely groaned.

"A book-keeper—a seamstress!" she ejaculated. "Oh, Harvey, you could not have done worse!"

"A penniless girl!" said his father, solemnly. "And after all we have hoped for you! No; it could not be worse."

"A common working-girl!" said Kitty, in a choking voice. "And everybody will know it! Oh, Harvey, it couldn't be worse!"

The young man looked from one to another in astonished, hurt, and half-contemptuous silence.

Margery turned to him with a gentle sympathy mingling with the dismay in her face.

"Perhaps," she said hopefully—"perhaps there is something to make up? Perhaps she is a wonderful beauty, or a great genius, or something?"

Harvey gave her a grateful smile.

"I think her pretty, of course," he said. "But I suppose that's because I'm fond of her. I don't think she would be called a beauty. And as for genius—she's very clever at accounts; but she doesn't sing, or paint, or anything of that sort. She's never had the time or money for such things, poor girl!"

But Margery had turned away with an impatient gesture.

"There is nothing then," she said despairingly. "No, it couldn't be worse!"

Harvey rose from his seat, and pushed the chair back noisily.

"This is absurd," he said indignantly. "It is more than absurd; it is unjust and narrow-minded. How sensible—presumably sensible people," Harvey corrected, rather bitterly, "can say, in regard to a person they have never seen, that 'it could not be worse,' is past my comprehension."

"We will not talk of it," said Mrs. Seely, holding up a restraining hand. "Discussion will not mend matters. And you are to be married next month?"

"On the ninth," Harvey rejoined. "Of course you will be there?" he added, rather dubiously.

"By no means," said his father shortly.

"You could hardly expect it," said Mrs. Seely reproachfully.

"Very well; 'if Mahommed won't come——' You've heard the observation. We shall pay you a visit immediately on our return from our wedding tour, with your kind permission. You must know Dora."

When he left the house, an hour later, he had the required permission.

His mother and the girls had even kissed him good-bye in an injured and reproachful way; and his father had shaken hands, coolly.

But his ears still rang with that odious assertion. "It could not be worse!" and he was thoughtful all the way back to the city.

* * * * *

The Seelys were in a state of subdued excitement.

Harvey's wedding tour was completed; and they had received a telegram that afternoon to the effect that he would arrive to-night, with his new wife.

The dining-room table was set for dinner; and Mrs. Seely wandered from one end of it to the other nervously.

Her husband sat under the chandelier with his evening newspaper; but he was not reading it. Kitty and Margery fluttered about uneasily, watching through the window for the carriage from the railway station.

"I hope," said Margery, with a nervous attempt at cheerfulness, "that she will be fairly decent—presentable. Think of the people who will call! I hope she won't be worse than we're prepared to see her."

"She couldn't be," said Mrs. Seely dismally.

There was a roll of wheels, and the twinkle of the carriage-lamp at the door, and the bell rang sharply.

Kitty and Margery clasped hands in sympathetic agitation; Mr. Seely dropped his newspaper and rose; and Mrs. Seely advanced towards the hall door with dignity.

It opened wide before she could reach it, and Harvey entered, his face suffused with genial, blissful smiles.

"This is my wife," he said proudly. "My mother, Dora; my father; my sisters Kitty and Margery!"

And, with a caressing touch, he took her by the hand and led forward among them—

What?

Mr. Seely gazed with wide-open eyes; Mrs. Seely dropped the hand she had started to hold out, with her face growing ashy, and Kitty and Margery gasped.

For what they saw was a woman of apparently forty years, with a face powdered and painted in the most unblushing manner, with thin grey hair crimped over a wrinkled forehead in a sickening affectation of youthfulness, and with a diminutive, gaily-trimmed bonnet perched thereon; with an affected, mincing gait and a simpering smile.

"This is my wife," Harvey repeated. "Have you no welcome for her?"

The bride tittered.

"P'raps they think I ain't good enough for 'em, dear?" she observed tartly.

"Impossible, my pet," Harvey responded; and patted her falsely-blooming cheek affectionately. "Besides, if you were but a shadow—a caricature of your beautiful self, they would not have been surprised. They were prepared for the worst."

He looked at his horrified relations meaningly.

The truth of his words flashed over them.

Yes, they had all said, repeatedly, that "it could not be worse." But this wretched, wrinkled, bedizened creature—had they dreamt of this?

Harvey watched them with an undisturbed smile—his father, turning away at last and rubbing his forehead with his handkerchief weakly; Mrs. Seely, gazing at her daughter-in-law with a dreadful fascination, and the girls sinking into chairs in dismayed silence.

"Well, mother," said Harvey lightly, "of course a new addition to the family is an object of interest; but don't forget that I have an appetite, and getting married has rather improved it. Take off your bonnet, my own. Here, Kitty!"

Kitty came forward with a set face and tightly-closed lips, to receive the marvellous combination of beads and silk flowers held out to her with a disgusting air of sprightliness. She was afraid to trust herself to speak.

Poor Mrs. Seely, sick at heart, had made her way to the bell and rang it, and dinner was served presently.

"Turtle soup!" the bride observed, looking round the table with a girlish smile; "ain't nothing I admire so! Just pass that celery, father-in-law. Delicious! ain't it, darling?"

"Extremely, my dear," said the bridegroom complacently.

Ignorant and vulgar! What dreadful things would they discover next?

It was an evening they never forgot. The unfortunate parents sat with pale faces and unsteady hands, staring into their empty plates, or looking at each other with fresh horror at each simpering, senseless, ungrammatical remark of their terrible daughter-in-law.

Kitty and Margery excused themselves during the second course, and flew to their rooms to cry themselves to sleep in an agony of dismay and mortification.

"I shan't think of setting up," said the bride, rising from the table with an apologetic giggle, and with the last of her dessert held aloft. "I'm too wore out. If anybody calls—o' course everybody'll call—just tell 'em I'll see 'em to-morrow. Come on, dear!"

And she tripped upstairs, with a juvenile nod over her shoulder, and with her beaming young husband following.

Mrs. Seely wrung her hands despairingly.

"We said it could not be worse," she said faintly. "But this! How shall we endure it?"

"I shall not endure it!" said her hsuband; his face had grown almost careworn during the last two hours. "I shall send them packing to-morrow, and if he ever enters my house again——"

He brought his hand down on the table threateningly.

"But that will not help matters," said his wife miserably. "He is ruined; we are disgraced; and everybody will know it."

There was a silence.

"I had pictured her to myself," said Mrs. Seely, beginning to sob, "as a young girl—a person of suitable age for my poor, misguided boy, decently educated, and at least a lady. And even then, when I did not doubt that it was such a one he had chosen, I thought myself the most unhappy creature in the world, because she had not wealth and an old name. Surely it is a judgment upon us. Oh, was there ever so dreadful a thing?"

"Probably not!" said her husband grimly.

It was a solemn group that waited in the dining-room, next morning, for the appearance of the newly-wedded couple.

Mr. Seely stood in front of the fireplace, watching the door with a stern face. He was master in his own house at least, and he was determined that he should not be disgraced by his son's wife for another hour.

No one appeared anxious to mention the subject which was uppermost in everyone's thoughts, but at last——

"Please get them away before anybody comes, papa!" said Kitty. "It would be dreadful if anybody were to see her!"

"Dreadful!" Margery echoed, with a groan. "What can Harvey possibly have seen in such a creature? The very thought of her, as we saw her last night, makes me ill."

There were footsteps on the stairs.

Mrs. Seely turned with a shiver, and the girls caught their breath.

The door opened.

The waiting group looked up slowly. Would she not be still more terrible in the broad daylight—that artificial, simpering horror?

But it was not the sight they were prepared to see which the open door disclosed; it was not a painted, powdered semblance of a woman who came in slowly, with a timid smile and downcast eyes.

It was a slender, sweet-faced young lady, with shining brown hair crowning a charming head, peachy cheeks, in which the colour came and went, and soft, dark eyes, which studied the carpet in pretty timidity; with dainty, slippered feet, and a lace-trimmed wrapper, fitting snugly to a perfect form.

"Good morning," she said gently.

Harvey had followed her closely.

"Well, Dora," he said, looking from one to another of his speechless relatives quizzically, "they don't seem inclined to speak to you."

But Margery had come towards her hastily, and seized both of her hands.

"Was it you all the time?" cried Margery, joyfully. "And the grey hair was false, and the wrinkles were put on, and all that dreadful powder? Oh, Harvey, how could you?"

"I begged him not to," said the pretty bride, raising her dark eyes sweetly. "I told him it was cruel; and such a time as I had, saying all those shocking things he had taught me, and keeping my wig straight, and trying not to laugh. You can't think how difficult it was, and all the while I felt so ashamed of myself. Will you ever forgive us?"

"Forgive you! Oh, my dear!" cried Mrs. Seely incoherently.

And she hurried forward, with a sob of joy, and embraced her daughter-in-law wildly.

"It was rather rough," said Harvey gaily. "I felt like a villain when I saw the way you all took it. But you know what you said, every one of you—that it 'couldn't be worse.' I thought I'd demonstrate to you that it could. Dora is nineteen instead of forty, she can speak correctly when she makes an effort; and I can heartily recommend her for a 'willing and obliging,' good-tempered and thoroughly capable girl—the sweetest in the world."

Mr. Seely left the fireplace and came and clasped his daughter-in-law in his arms, with a beaming face, and Kitty kissed her effusively.

"It was a dreadful lesson," said Mrs. Seely, looking up with a tearful smile; "but I am afraid we needed it, my son."

CONCERNING OLIVE.

UNDER its swirl of ruffled muslin Polly's heel gave a little vicious dig into the earth that sent the gaily-coloured hammock forward. Polly frowned disapprovingly at her smart little shoes and the glimpse of silk mesh above them; frowned, too, at her slender, ringless hands with their pink shining nails.

The country—for Polly, foreseeing that between her mother and Mr. Dillingham she would become Mrs. Dillingham in spite of herself, had taken to her heels and fled to the country.

Polly, in the gay hammock, swung slowly. She looked dejectedly at her slim hand. The flashing diamond that Mr. Dillingham wanted to place there wouldn't have been so bad; Mr. Dillingham, himself, was better than—nobody.

Polly was very dejected. Below these heights, in her world, there were dances, dinners—men.

She sat up very straight, for the man—big, brown, and splendid—who towered above her, was holding out his hand to her, and his eyes were so engagingly blue.

"Olive knew that you were here," he said; "she has just written me about it. She asked me to hunt you up—and there were lots of messages about the old schooldays." He smiled down on her.

Polly caught at those words as a drowning man clutches at a straw. There was only one Olive and she had married Tom—Polly's brain worked frantically—Tom Tate, of course.

She beamed on Mr. Tate. She was pleased with herself at the rush of memory that had saved the situation from awkwardness—for it is awkward to have forgotten the name of the man who has married your dearest school friend.

Mr. Tate was not handsome, but bronzed, and his vital, frank personality was irresistible. He talked gaily; of Olive, and her friendship for Polly; of boat races and football games, and, at parting, he held Polly's hand a trifle longer than custom decreed, and looked into her eyes with eyes that spoke unuttered things.

Given a man, a maid, and a moon—even a baby moon—and the combination is not without danger.

Tate fell quickly into the habit of dropping in on Pauline—she was Polly to her special friends—at all hours. There was a dairy, and she played dairymaid while he superintended the making of the golden pats of butter; there were books, and they read, or seemed to read; there was a piano, and she played and sang for him; there was a lake on which they floated idly.

Once, in pursuit of a squirrel, they went deeper and deeper into the wood. Tate's gun was in his hand, he was in the country for the shooting. But in the big, silent wood they found no squirrels, and that night Polly brought up her thoughts with a little shiver. She had been trying so hard to remember all the tender little things concerning Olive during their schooldays, trying to remember the look in her eyes as she bade her good-bye, and it was Olive's husband's eyes that looked into hers. A vague fear of herself assailed her.

"What are his eyes to me?" she said angrily. "What is he to me? It's preposterous!" She blew out her light, having suddenly felt a longing for home and her mother's arms. Safe in the knowledge of her resolution to return home, she avoided Tate diligently next day, but at sunset she walked through the odour of the sweet, old-fashioned garden to where the hammock swung, disconsolate.

He came; perhaps she had gone there knowing the fact. Oh, the sweet poison that lurks in renunciation! The evening was warm and soft; the wind stirred his fair hair; and he played—strange, sweet tunes that hinted things beyond the telling.

In spite of the warm air Polly shivered. She wasn't responsible while that moon looked on—it put strange thoughts in her head. As if divining those thoughts, Tate suddenly bent forward and took her hand. "Why do you avoid me?" he asked tenderly.

A married flirt! Married, too, to her dearest friend. How could she think tenderly of such a contemptible and treacherous creature.

"Because," she stammered, "I despise you."

"I don't understand you," Tate said, in a bewildered way.

"Perhaps you understand Olive better?"

"Yes."

"What explanation will you give?"

"Explanation?"

"A model husband!" sneered Polly.

"A bachelor until time ends," corrected Tate. "I'm thirty and you are twenty, Polly, but the dream was sweet."

"And Olive," asked Polly, in a hard little voice, "what would she do?"

"Did you know? I didn't know she ever told a living soul."

"What?" breathed Polly.

"Tom's all right," Tate exclaimed, "but sometimes at a dance or card party, he takes too much and it goes to his head. I save Olive from it, always, I hardly thought she realised."

"Does Olive love Tom, her husband?" Polly put the question hesitatingly.

"Good Heavens!" said Tate.

Polly laughed—a low, contented laugh—she moved nearer to Tate.

"What does Olive call you?" she asked.

"I don't know what you are driving at," Tate said, "but Olive calls me Rob; most women call their brothers-in-law by their Christian name."

"Yes," said Polly, "yes." She slipped her warm fingers into his.

"You are a very peculiar young person," said Tate.

"Yes," Polly spoke humbly, "but my friends love me in spite of the peculiarities." Suddenly she swayed towards him. "Love me, Rob," she pleaded.

As Tate swept her into his arms, the moon, having freed itself from the hill and swung off into space, looked from behind a silver-lined cloud, then discreetly withdrew.

IN CONFIDENCE.

Conducted by MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

"H. L."—You both want to get married, but her parents object. Should she defy them? I certainly do not suggest that she should. But if you are sure that you are destined for each other, and are yourself in a position to keep her, I think you should let her parents know that nothing will interfere with your decision, and point out that it would be better for their daughter's happiness if they gave their consent, rather than bring about a runaway marriage and its consequences.

"In Difficulties."—Don't think me unkind, but my whole idea is to tell you what seems to me the truth about the matter. The gentleman you describe is a type of flirt about which we women should know a good deal, so as to avoid deception. He is a young man, and you are, well, a widow in your prime. He is very popular with other ladies, and has an enormous opinion of himself. At the same time, you think he likes you. You say you have an idea that he wishes to draw you on by his manner. I think that is very likely indeed. Those kinds of young men often live only for that object with all women, towards whom they seldom have any serious intentions. I don't wish to suggest all this about him, but I must tell you how your description strikes me, and leave it to you to judge whether it applies to him.

"Shy Male."—I am afraid I cannot tell you off-hand of any young lady in the districts of Tottenham or Stamford Hill anxious to make a young man's acquaintance. But there must be a great many. I am glad you do not go in for flirting like your acquaintances, and hope it will not be long before some nice young lady comes your way. You are, you say, shy. But as you are only nineteen, that is not unusual. In another two years, you should soon have got over that. There are so many ways in which young men and women can meet, if people only know how to deport themselves. I have given several hints on this point in Pearson's Weekly, but may as well repeat that you must be good at social gatherings, must make yourself look as attractive as possible, and when you meet one nice girl, try and secure another meeting, ask if you may call at her home, or which are her favourite bicycle rides or walks, where she spends her time, and other things that ought to bring you into further touch with her. But remember that proverb about "faint heart."

"Ralph" is in despair over one trait in the character of the girl he is engaged to. She will persist in making fun of other people, and, though he has repeatedly begged her not to, she persists in her silly behaviour. He asks what he can do to cure her, as he cannot bear to think that when she is his wife she will turn to ridicule all the sayings and doings of people she mixes with.———I think you take the matter too much to heart, "Ralph." Ask her quietly to try for your sake to check this habit, and I feel sure she will do all she is able to cure herself of it. You must remember that a habit of a lifetime cannot be overcome in a few days, so you must be patient with her.

"Anxious and Hopeful One" wants to know what she could do to pass away her time at home, as she is quite deaf and her eyes are not very strong.———Your eyes being bad makes it difficult for you to do much in the way of home employment, "Hopeful One," knitting or crochet being about the two most simple things to do in which the eyesight is not much needed. I should advise you to go to a really good doctor, tell him plainly how matters stand, and see if he could get you into some hospital where they would do you some permanent good. Surely the clergyman of your parish or some other kindly soul would interest themselves in your case. I can quite understand how miserable and downhearted you must feel.

"Mother of Three" writes me a very pitiful letter. Her husband has met with an accident, and has had to give up his business; they are very poor, but have just enough to keep them from starvation. A rich cousin has offered to adopt one of her children on the condition that his parents shall never see him again. She feels that she cannot part with her eldest boy, and it would break her heart to part with either of her twin babies.———I am so sorry for you, "Mother of Three," and quite understand your feelings in the matter. So long as you have health and strength, and just enough to live on, I feel sure you will be doing right by your children in keeping them with you. After all, no other love makes up for a mother's, does it?

"Victoria F." and her sweetheart have had a quarrel, since which she has been asked to his brother's wedding. She wants to know whether she should go, as her sweetheart will be there? The cause of their estrangement was that the young man had been keeping company with another young lady, who had, however, since given him up.———I am sorry to hear of your little trouble; but I cannot suggest a more excellent preparation towards a reconciliation than your attending the wedding. The marriage ceremony is a splendid advertisement for the matrimonial state, and few men or women can attend one without turning their thoughts in that direction themselves. Now you and your estranged lover will both be there. You will both think of matrimony, and will both realise that the partner of your respective hearts is in that very place of worship. Could anything but a complete reconciliation come of such a thing, supposing, of course, that you still love each other?

By RAFAEL SABATINI.

CHAPTER XXIII. (continued).

TOWARDS eleven o'clock, as the lights in the hostelry opposite were burning low, I descended and made my way out into the now deserted street. The troopers had apparently seen fit—or else been ordered to seek their beds, for the place had grown silent, and a servant was in the act of making fast the door for the night. The door was half-closed, and a man carrying a lanthorn was making fast the bolt, whistling aimlessly to himself. Through the half of the door that was yet open, I beheld a window from which the light fell upon a distant corner of the courtyard.

I drew near the fellow with the lanthorn, in whom I recognised René, the hostler, and as I approached he flashed the light upon my face; then, with a gasp, "M. de Luynes!" he exclaimed, remembering me from the time when I had lodged at the Lys de France four months ago.

"Sh!" I whispered, pressing a louis d'or into his hand. "Whose window is that, René?" And pointed towards the light.

"That," he replied, "is the room of the lieutenant and the gentleman in the mask."

"I must take a look at them, René; and whilst I am looking I shall search my pocket for another louis. Now let me in."

"I dare not, Monsieur. Maître Bernard may call me, and if the doors are not closed——"

"Come, come," I broke in; "I shall stay but a moment."

"But——"

"And you will have easily earned a louis d'or. If Bernard calls you tell him that you have let something fall, and that you are seeking it. There, let me pass."

I got past him at last, and made my way swiftly towards the other end of the quadrangle. As I approached, the sound of voices smote my ear, for the lighted window stood open. I stopped within half-a-dozen paces of it, and climbed on to the step of the coach that stood there. Thence I could look straight into the room, whilst the darkness hid me from the eyes of those I watched.

Three men were there; Montrésor, the sergeant of his troop, and a tall man dressed in black and wearing a black silk mask. This I concluded to be St. Auban, despite the profusion of fair locks that fell from his shoulders, concealing, I rightly guessed, his natural hair, which was as black as my own. It was a cunning addition to his disguise, and one well calculated to lead people on to the wrong scent hereafter.

Presently, as I watched them, St. Auban spoke, and his voice was that of a man whose gums are toothless, or else whose nether lip is drawn in over his teeth whilst he speaks. Here again the dissimulation was as effective as it was simple.

"So that is concluded," were the words that reached me. "To-morrow we will install our men at the Château, for while we remain here it is preposterous to lodge them at an inn. On the following day I hope that we may be able to set out again."

"If we could obtain fresh horses——" began the sergeant, when he of the mask interrupted him.

"What! Think you my purse is bottomless? We return as we came, with the Cardinal's horses. What signify a day or two, after all? Come, call the landlord to light me to my room."

I had heard enough. But, more than that, whilst I listened an idea of a sudden sprung up in my mind which did away with the necessity of gaining speech with Montrésor—a contingency this, moreover, that now presented insuperable difficulties.

So I got down softly from my perch and made my way out of the yard, and, after fulfilling my part of the bargain with René, across to the Vigne d'Or and to my room, there to sit and mature the plan that of a sudden I had conceived.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Of the Passing of St. Auban.

HEAVENS! What an ado there was next day at Blois, when the news came that the troopers had installed themselves at the Château de Canaples, and that the Chevalier had been arrested for treason by order of the Lord Cardinal, and that he would be taken to Paris, and probably—the scaffold.

Men gathered in little knots at street corners, and with sullen brows and threatening gestures they talked of the affair; and the more they talked, the more clouded grew their looks, and more than one anti-cardinist pasquinade was heard in Blois that day.

Given a leader, those men would have laid hands upon pikes and muskets, and gone to the Chevalier's rescue. As I observed them, the thought did cross my mind that I might contrive a pretty fight in the rose garden of Canaples were I so inclined. And so inclined I should indeed have been but for the plan that had come to me like an inspiration from above, and which methought would prove safer in the end.

To carry out this plan of mine I quitted Blois at nightfall with my two knaves, having paid my reckoning at the Vigne d'Or, and given out that we were journeying to Tours. We followed the road that led to Canaples, until we reached the first trees bordering the park. There I dismounted, and leaving Abdon to guard the horses I made my way on foot, accompanied by Michelot, towards the garden.

We gained this, and were on the point of quitting the shadow of the trees when, of a sudden, by the light of the crescent moon, I beheld a man walking in one of the alleys not a hundred paces from where we stood. I had but time to seize Michelot by the collar of his doublet and draw him towards me. But as he trod quickly backwards a twig snapped 'neath his foot with a report that in the surrounding stillness was like a pistol shot.

I caught my breath as he who walked in the garden stood still, his face, wrapped in the shadows of his hat, turned towards us.

"Who goes there?" he shouted. Then, getting no reply, he came resolutely forward, whilst I drew a pistol wherewith to welcome him did he draw too near.

On he came, and already I had brought my pistol to a level with his head, when fortunately he repeated his question, "Who goes there?" and this time I recognised the voice of Montrésor, the very man I could then most wish to meet.

"Hist! Montrésor!" I called softly. "'Tis I,—de Luynes."

"So," he exclaimed, coming closer to me, "you have reached Canaples at last!"

"At last!" I echoed.

"Whom have you there?" he inquired abruptly.

"Only Michelot."

"Bid him fall behind a little."

When Michelot had complied with this request, "You see, M. de Luynes," quoth the officer, "that you have arrived too late."

There was a certain coldness in his tone that made me seek by my reply to sound him.

"Indeed, I trust not, my friend. With your assistance I hope to get M. de Canaples from the clutches of St. Auban."

He shook his head.

"It is impossible that I should help you," he replied with increased coldness. "Already once for your sake have I broken faith with those who pay me by setting you in position to forestall St. Auban and get M. de Canaples away before his arrival. Unfortunately you have dallied on the road, M. de Luynes, and Canaples is already a prisoner—a doomed one, I fear."

"Is that your last word, Montrésor?" I inquired sadly.

"I am sorry," he answered in softened tones, "but you must see that I cannot do otherwise. I warned you; more you cannot expect of me."

I sighed, and stood musing for an instant; then, "You are right, Montrésor. Nevertheless I am still grateful to you for the warning you gave me in Paris. God pity and help Canaples! Farewell, Montrésor. I do not think you will see me again."

He took my hand, but as he did so he pushed me back into the shadow from which I had stepped to proffer it to him.

"Beware!" he ejaculated. "The moon was full upon your face, and did St. Auban chance to look out he must have seen you."

I followed the indication of his thumb and noted the lighted window to which he pointed. A moment later he was gone, and as I joined Michelot I chuckled softly to myself.

For two hours and more I sat in the shrubbery, conversing in whispers with Michelot, and watching the lights in the Château die out one by one, until St. Auban's widow, which opened on the terrace balcony, was the only one that was not wrapped in darkness.

I waited a little while longer, then rising I cautiously made a tour of inspection. Peace reigned everywhere, and the only sign of life was the sentry, who with musket on shoulder paced in front of the main entrance, a silent testimony of St. Auban's mistrust of the Bloisois and of his fears of a possible surprise.

Satisfied that everyone slept, I retraced my steps to the shrubbery where Michelot awaited me, watching the square of light, and after exchanging a word with him I again stepped forth.

When I was halfway across the intervening space of garden, treading with infinite precaution, a dark shadow obscured the window, which a second later was thrown open. Crouching hastily behind a boxwood hedge, I watched St. Auban—for I guessed that he it was—as he leant out and gazed skywards.

For a little while he remained there, then he withdrew, leaving the casement open, and presently I caught the grating of a chair on the parquet floor within. If ever the gods favoured mortal, they favoured me at that moment.

The Richest Coalfield in England.

MORE MONEY FOR MINERS' WIVES.

The richest undeveloped coalfield in England is about to be opened up, and the increased work to be obtained will no doubt mean more money for miners and miners' wives. The new coalfield lies east of Rotherham and south of Doncaster and already a pit is being sunk at Dinnington. Quite close to this very spot there has recently been accomplished a remarkable cure by Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. Mr. Joseph Harrison, an engineman at Kilnhurst Chemical Works, and residing at 9 Rossington Street, Denaby Main, is the person who has such good cause to be thankful for his present state of health. A "Rotherham Advertiser" reporter who called upon him learned the following facts. Mr. Harrison said:—"I have been a great sufferer from biliousness and indigestion; and these two complaints were for a long time the cause of much pain, worry and expense. My symptoms were well marked. In consequence of the obstinacy of the indigestion, I was unable to take a sufficient quantity of nutritive food to maintain my strength, and after even a light meal the pain I suffered was often intense. I grew very depressed and low-spirited—a condition which was aggravated by my inability to obtain any sleep for night after night. My natural buoyancy of mind and body so forsook me that there was no pleasure either at home or at work. The doctor visited me and I took his medicine but it was of little use and I still continued in pain.

"Some weeks ago a friend advised me to try Chas. Forde's Bile Beans as he said they had cured him of indigestion and biliousness. I did as he recommended. Since then I have had good cause to thank him for his advice; for before long I began to feel that the Beans were effecting a cure. I commenced to eat and enjoy my food and gradually I progressed until now—to use a north-country sportsman's expression—I feel 'as well and hearty as a hare.' I attribute this exclusively to Bile Beans."

Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness, which accomplished the above cure, are a certain cure for indigestion, biliousness, sleeplessness, colds, chill, rheumatism, anæmia, constipation, piles, congestion of the liver, headache, neuralgia, fainting fits, attacks of dizziness, flatulence, pains in the chest, loins or back, defective secretion of bile, wasting affections, female irregularities, gout, and the host of ailments having a common origin in impurity of the blood, a general congestion of the system and loss of vital force.

Obtainable from all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 and 120 London Wall, London, E.C., upon receipt of prices, one and three halfpence or two and ninepence.

Stealthily as a cat I sprang towards the terrace, the steps to which I climbed on hands and knees. Stooping, I sped silently across it until I had gained the flower-bed immediately below the window that had drawn me to it. Crouching there—for did I stand upright my chin would be on a level with the sill—I paused to listen for some moments. The only sound I caught was a rustle, as of paper. Emboldened, I took a deep breath, and standing up, I gazed straight into the chamber.

By the light of four tapers in heavy silver sconces, I beheld St. Auban seated at a table littered with parchments, over which he was intently poring. His back was towards me and his long black hair hung straight upon his shoulders. On the table, amid the papers, lay his golden wig and black mask, and on the floor, in the centre of the room, his back and breast of blackened steel and his sword.

It needed but little shrewdness to guess those parchments before him to be legal documents touching the Canaples estates, and his occupation that of casting up exactly what profit he would reap from his infamous work of betrayal.

So intent was the hound upon his calculations, that my cautious movements passed unheeded by him as I got astride of the window ledge. It was only when I swung my right leg into the room that he turned his head, but before his eyes reached me I was standing upright and motionless within the chamber.

I have seen fear of many sorts writ large upon the faces of men of many conditions, from the awe that blanches the cheek of the boy soldier when first he hears the cannon thundering, to the terror that glazes the eye of the vanquished swordsman who at every moment expects the deadly point in his heart. But never had I gazed upon a countenance filled with such abject, ghastly terror as that which came over St. Auban's when his eyes met mine that night.

He sprang up with an inarticulate cry that sank into something that I can but liken to the rattle which issues from the throat of expiring men. For a second he stood where he had risen, then terror loosened his knees, and he sank back into his chair. His mouth fell open, and the trembling lips were drawn down at the corners like those of a sobbing child; his cheeks turned whiter than the lawn collar at his throat; and his eyes, wide open in a horrid stare, were fixed on mine, and, powerless to avert them, he met my gaze, cold stern, and implacable.

For a moment we remained thus, and I marvelled greatly to see a man whose heart, if full of evil, I had yet deemed stout enough, stricken by fear into so parlous and pitiful a condition.

Then I had the explanation of it as he lifted his right hand and made the sign of the cross, first upon himself, then in the air, whilst his lips moved, and I guessed that to himself he was muttering some prayer of exorcising purport. There was the solution of the terror-sweat that stood out in beads upon his brow; he had deemed me a spectre—the spectre of a man he believed to have foully done to death on a spot across the Loire visible from the window at my back.

At last he sufficiently mastered himself to break the awful silence.

"What do you want?" he whispered; then his voice gaining power as he used it, "Speak!" he commanded. "Man or devil, speak!"

I laughed for answer, harshly, mockingly; for never had I known a fiercer, crueller mood. At the sound of that laugh, satanical though may have been its ring, he sprang up again, and unsheathing a dagger he took a step towards me.

"We shall see of what you are made," he cried. "If you blast me in the act, I'll strike you."

I laughed again, and raising my arm I gave him the nozzle of a pistol to contemplate.

"Stand where you are, St, Auban, or by the God above us I'll send your ghost a-wandering," quoth I coolly.

My voice, which, I take it, had nothing ghostly in it, and still more the levelled pistol which of all implements is the most unghostly, dispelled his dread. The colour crept slowly back to his cheeks, and his mouth closed with a snap of determination.

"Is it indeed you, master meddler?" he said. "Why! I thought you dead these three months."

"And you are overcome with joy to find that you were in error, eh, Marquis? We Luynes die hard."

"It seems so, indeed," he answered with a cool effrontery, past crediting in one who but a moment ago had looked so pitiful. "What do you seek at Canaples?"

"Many things, Marquis. You among others."

"You have come to murder me," he cried, and again alarm overspread his countenance.

"Hoity, toity, Marquis! We do not all follow the same trade. Who talks of murder? Faugh!"

Again he took a step towards me, but again the nozzle of my pistol drove him back. To have pistolled him there and then, as he deserved, would have brought the household about my ears, and that would have defeated my object. To have fallen upon him and slain him with silent steel would have equally embarrassed me, as you shall understand anon.

"You and I had a rendezvous at St. Sulpice des Reaux," I said calmly, "to which you came with a band of hired assassins. For this you deserve to be shot like the dog you are. But I have it in my heart to be generous to you," I added, in a tone of irony. "Come, take up your sword."

"To what purpose?"

"Do you question me? Take up your sword, man, and do my bidding; thus shall you have a slender chance of life. Refuse, and I pistol you without compunction. So now put on that wig and mask."

When he had obeyed me in this, "Now listen, St. Auban," I said. "You and I are going together to that willow copse whither three months ago you lured Yvonne de Canaples for the purpose of abducting her. On that spot you and I shall presently face each other sword in hand, with none other to witness our meeting save God, in whose hands the issue lies. That is your chance. At the first sign that you meditate playing me any tricks that chance is lost to you." And I tapped my pistol significantly. "Now climb out through that window."

When he had done so, I bade him stand six paces away whilst I followed, and to discourage any foolish indiscretion on his part, I again showed him my pistol.

He answered me with an impatient gesture, and by the light that fell on his face I saw him sneer.

"Come on, you fool," he snarled, "and have done threatening. I'll talk to you in the copse. And tread softly lest you arouse the sentry on the other side."

(To be continued.)

Why Aren't They?

LONDONER: "What fine air you have out here, it's so much fresher than in London." Farmer: "Jess so! That's jest what I was saying to my old woman. Why ain't all these big cities built out in the country."

Realistic.

SHE (poetically): "With this golden bright sky, the sighing of the balmy zephyrs, and the far vista across the foamy waves, one can't but dream they are in sweetest Italy." He: "Good idea. Suppose we have macaroni for dinner!"

50000 TRIAL PACKAGES FREE! RHEUMATISM CURED

By a Simple Remedy which has Cured many cases of 30 & 40 years' standing

IF YOU HAVE RHEUMATISM

Write to me and I will send you free, a trial package of GLORIA TONIC, that wonderful remedy which I discovered by a fortunate chance while an invalid from Rheumatism. This marvellous remedy has since cured thousands of men and women who have suffered almost beyond human endurance, among them persons of more than 70 years of age, and others who have suffered over 52 years. GLORIA TONIC cures this merciless disease by its action on the blood, driving from the system the Uric Acid—the cause of Rheumatism—which is the only way to cure Rheumatism, as liniments and other external appliances only treat the symptoms and not the disease. Write for a free trial to-day. A little book on Rheumatism, with many endorsements from people, not only from the British Isles, but from many other countries, will be sent free with every sample. Use it faithfully until the Uric Acid is banished from your system; by so doing you will not wonder why IT CURED RHEUMATISM of upwards of 52 years' standing. I have 1,000 BONA-FIDE TESTIMONIALS from people throughout England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales. Delay in sending for a Trial Package is an injustice to yourself. When Doctors and University Professors endorse GLORIA TONIC, the remedy must necessarily have overwhelming merit. Write at once, even if every Hospital, Hotspring and Bath on earth has failed to cure you. Remember that GLORIA TONIC has cured THOUSANDS of persons in the past, many of whom had walked on crutches, while others were bedridden and helpless. Address all communications to

More Than One.

CUSTOMER: "Some children's shoes, please." Dealer: "Yes, sir. Now, there is an excellent make of shoe. How old is the child?" Customer (with a sigh): "Child! I have nine of them. Show me the wholesale department."

Masculine Woman.

MAC: "That Miss Jumper is dreadfully masculine in her ways." "What does she do?" Mac: "Oh, I've seen her get off the 'bus before it stopped without falling."

Hope for Him.

HE: "I shall never marry until I meet a woman who is my direct opposite." She (encouragingly): "Well, Mr. Duffer, there are numbers of intelligent girls in this neighbourhood."

Fellow Feeling.

DE JONES (haughtily): "I cawn't see, me good man, why you should appeal to me for relief." Tramp: "Well, sor, Oi saw yez borrow somethin' from yer friend down beyant; and as we'd both been broke, Oi thought Oi'd trust to yer fellow-feelin'."

Dad's Fault.

MRS. BROWN: "I'm so sorry you burnt your fingers, Johnny. How was it the cracker went off in your hand?" Little Johnny: "It was all dad's fault. He was coming up the street, and I was going to drop it out of the window on his head, but he walked so slow that the thing went off before he got underneath the window."

A Meek Man.

A DEMURE-LOOKING little man approached the assistant in a grocer's shop, and meekly asked if he had any coffee to sell. "We have ground coffee," said the young man. "No other kind?" "None. This is the best ground coffee on the market." "But I don't want it," the little man braced up. "I got some sugar here the other day with sand in it, and I don't want coffee with ground in it. You must think I want the earth."

Already.

THERE lived in the West of England an enthusiastic geologist—a doctor of divinity and chairman of the Quarter Sessions. A farmer who had seen him presiding on the bench, saw him shortly afterwards seated by the roadside on a heap of stones, which he was busily breaking in search of fossils. The farmer reined up his horse, gazed on him for a minute, shook his head in commiseration of the mutability of human things, then exclaimed in mingled tones of pity and surprise: "What, doctor! Be you come to this already?"

No One Was Ill.

SMITH (to Jones, who has just closed the front door of his boarding-house very softly): "Somebody ill upstairs, Jones?" Jones: "Sh! no; I'm simply behind with my payments again."

The Children's Treat.

MOTHER: "I want you to be good little children this week." Freddie: "What will you give us if we are good?" "If you are really good you can look on when your father shaves himself next Sunday morning."

Strong People.

AWED TOURIST in the Highlands: "Dear me, I don't wonder these natives are so muscular. The guide-book states that their ancestors were in the habit of lifting cattle!"

Helping Her.

HE: "My dear Miss Golding, I should love to assist you in performing all the tasks that fall to your lot." She: "Oh, I have no tasks. I've nothing to do but sit and hold my hands." He: "Well, I should like to assist you in doing even that much."

No Reform Now.

"LOOK here," said the reforming husband, "we must have things arranged in this house so that we shall know just where everything is kept." "With all my heart," sweetly answered his wife; "and let us begin with your late hours, my love. I should dearly love to know where they are kept." He let things run on as usual.

How He Knew.

LAWYER: "Are you sure that occurrence was on the 17th of the month?" Witness: "Yes, it was the 17th." Lawyer: "Now, remember you are under oath. How do you know it was the 17th?" Witness: "'Cause the day before that——" Lawyer: "Be careful what you say, now. Go on." Witness: "——was the 16th and the day after was the 18th."

Didn't Wait to See.

A SCHOOLMASTER was one day instructing his class in a scientific subject, when, wishing to simplify the explanation of a certain point by an everyday illustration, he asked: "Have any of you boys ever stirred up a wasp's nest?" "Yes, sir, I have," promptly answered one of the smaller boys. "Well," said the master, encouragingly, thinking to draw out the boy's intelligence, "what was the result?" "Please, sir, I didn't wait to see," answered the boy.

A Model Husband.

WIFE: "I saw the loveliest lace curtains to-day, only half-a-crown, and I wanted them awfully, but I knew you wished to economise, and so I didn't get them." Husband: "That's too bad, my dear, you should have got them. Anything which adds to your happiness and brings gladness to your eyes, anything which lightens your domestic cares and gilds the lowering clouds, anything which borders with sweet flowers the thorny paths of duty, and appeals pleasantly to your æsthetic nature, making life more worth living, home a paradise, you are welcome, doubly welcome to, my angel, if it doesn't cost more than half-a-crown."

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium, Nos. 49—54," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, March 3rd, 1902.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

EDWARD FARRELL CHEMIST

By Philip Moon.

III.—THE SECRET EXPLOSIVE.

"I WONDER what on earth he wants?" thought Farrell.

He was looking at a telegram he held in his hand.

"Come at once to Whitehall—important.—A."

Lord A. held a high position at the War Department. He had met Edward Farrell on several occasions, and knew of his high scientific attainments.

Farrell was extremely puzzled as to why Lord A —— should wish to see him.

"I suppose the quickest way to find out," continued he, "is to go and see!" so within half-an-hour he was bowling along in a swift hansom towards Whitehall.

Lord A——, a white-haired, clean-shaven aristocrat, greeted him cordially.

"My dear Farrell, I am indeed glad you have come so promptly. I have a most important task for you, if you will undertake it. There is a not inconsiderable element of danger in it, however, so I will put you in possession of a few of the facts before asking you whether you will help me or not."

"Fire away at the facts as hard as you like," Farrell replied; "only before you begin let me say that you may count definitely upon any help that is within my power to give you, danger or no danger."

"Thanks, my dear fellow, I expected you would say as much, and, as you suggest, I will fire away at facts as quickly as possible—for every hour increases the danger."

Lord A—— unlocked a safe that stood in one corner of the room, and produced from its steel-guarded interior a small square leather bag.

This he opened and disclosed to view a carefully-packed and neatly fitted square tin, which contained a brownish-looking, friable powder.

"This," said he, "I received this morning from one of my special foreign agents.

"He obtained it after much danger and at great expense from the War Laboratory of one of the great foreign Powers—never mind which just now—and immediately fled with it to me.

"It is a secret explosive of wonderful power, and it is said that the army using it will have a tremendous advantage over its foes.

"We have been trying to get a sample of it for months but without avail, its secret has been guarded too jealously.

"At last, however, we have triumphed so far that we have obtained the sample you see before you; but the difficult part is yet to come, for now it has to be examined and its composition discovered. That is the task I wish you to undertake, and had the abstraction of the explosive from the foreign laboratory been kept secret, it would not have been a very dangerous undertaking. Unfortunately, however, they discovered its loss at once. My agent had to run for his life, and only reached me after having been twice attacked on the way.

"At his suggestion I sent off this morning half-a-dozen trustworthy messengers to all our experts, with packets similar to this but containing no explosive, in the hope of putting any spies off the scent.

"It is quite likely, however, that you will be followed and watched—possibly attacked, so you quite realise the danger.

"The only way in which I can help you is to send a couple of Secret Service men to guard your house, and report anything suspicious to you while you are conducting your examination. I won't ask you whether you still agree to undertake the service, for I know what your answer will be; but I can assure you that you will be doing your country an invaluable service, which I shall take care to duly represent in the proper quarter. Now how long do you reckon it will be before you will be able to report to me?"

Farrell had listened with the keenest interest to Lord A——'s story, and no one looking at him could doubt whether he regretted the risk he had undertaken or not.

His tell-tale eyes were sparkling, and it was evident he looked upon his task with the greatest relish.

"Well, in the usual way it would take at least three days," he answered Lord A——; "but I intend to stick at it, without sleep, if possible, till it is finished.

"Much depends upon the material itself, of course, but I hope to have some definite result to lay before you by to-morrow evening."

Lord A—— was delighted; he had not reckoned on Farrell in vain.

"That's the sort of spirit I like," he said. "Now I will send for the men I promised you, and then I must leave you to untangle your skein alone."

The men proved to be two of the most efficient in the Service—shrewd, intelligent, and eager.

"Now; look here," said Farrell, "I suppose Lord A—— has told you all about this business, so I need not impress upon you the importance of carrying it through successfully.

"I shall take a cab from here to my laboratory and you had better follow me in another—keeping your eyes open meanwhile to see whether I am shadowed by anyone. Report to me when you arrive, and we will then take measures for the safety of the house while I am at work."

Farrell hailed a hansom outside the War Office and started for his laboratory.

He saw his two guards enter another cab about fifty yards in the rear, but though he purposely watched he did not see any other cab engaged before he turned out of Whitehall.

A motor-car suddenly turned, as it was passing, and dashed across the path of the cab.

He leant back lazily against the cushions with a look of relief on his face—the precious bag was on his knees—he would not trust it out of his hands, for he intended to run no unnecessary risks.

"And, after all," thought he, "what risk is there? the messengers that were dispatched this morning have probably put any pursuers off the track altogether, and I shall be allowed to pursue my investigations unhindered."

The more he thought of it, the more he was inclined to think that Lord A—— had magnified the danger.

"It is evident I am not followed," he thought, "or else I should have seen them engage a cab."

With this satisfying thought Farrell dismissed the danger from his mind, and settled himself to think out his line of investigation for arriving at the composition of the explosive.

He had succeeded in elaborating his scheme of analysis to his entire satisfaction and was soaring serenely in the clouds of his scientific imagination, when he was called back to earth with a rush by the violent swerving of his cab followed by the caustic and telling sarcasm of his driver.

"Garn, you bloomin' old tin ribs, why didn't yer say perlite as 'ow yer wanted to cut in 'atween my 'oss and keb?"

These words were addressed to the driver of a swift motor-car that had suddenly turned, as it was passing, and dashed across the path of the cab.

Had it not been for the ready presence of mind of Farrell's driver, the cab, Farrell saw, must inevitably have been wrecked.

The only passenger on the motor-car was a short, very broad, black-bearded individual, who was talking rapidly and excitedly to the driver, apparently urging upon him some course that was very much against his will.

As the car dashed across the front of the cab Farrell had noticed the eagerness with which this man had scanned him and his belongings and had seen with an uncomfortable start of surprise the look of fiendish delight that had flashed from his eyes as they fell upon the brown leather bag upon Farrell's knee.

With a shudder Farrell realised that this had been no accident, but a wilful attempt to wreck him. Somehow this man had discovered his secret and had even ventured to attack him in the busy streets of London in broad daylight.

What a narrow escape he had had, and he had been congratulating himself that he had no risks to run.

He had almost been caught napping; he must beware.

The motor-car disappeared round a corner ahead, but as the cab passed, Farrell could see it standing a little way down the road, evidently waiting to get behind the cab once again.

The two guards were still following him in their cab and they had evidently noticed the strange behaviour of the motor-car, for as he looked back they beckoned to him, and pointed frantically towards the road down which he had seen the motor-car standing.

What was he to do? Could he hope to dodge the motor-car and so keep the situation of his laboratory secret? Should he leave the cab at some corner? All sorts of plans crowded upon him at once, and the necessity for prompt decision was apparent.

All at once his face lighted up with a sudden thought.

"I wonder if I dare?" he said; then, as he further considered, he quickly decided, his face set sternly, and he muttered fiercely: "Yes, by Jove, and I'll do it, too. It's the only way."

Then aloud:

"Straight home, driver, as quickly as you can—only mind—no collisions, please."

* * * * *

The evening was closing by the time the laboratory was reached—for Farrell had not received Lord A——'s telegram until well on in the day.

The two Secret Service men entered the house about five minutes later and reported that the spy had dismissed the motor-car as soon as he had seen Farrell safely into the house, and had disappeared down one of the side streets.

"He will wait until it's dark," they said, "and will then try to enter the house."

"Do you think he will attempt to communicate with his friends?" Farrell asked.

Both the men assured Farrell that there was not the slightest fear of that.

"He is well-known to the secret service people, and has long been suspected of being in the pay of a foreign power.

"He is a desperate and dangerous man, and will try and play the game off his own bat, for success to him will mean almost certain fortune," they said.

"So much the better," said Farrell, "for he will fail, and it is safer to deal with one than a dozen."

"Now I must make all my arrangements and start on my examination, for as Lord A—— said: 'Every moment is precious.'

"If you will come with me I will show you what I want you to do."

The men saw that in Farrell they had a master mind, and wisely refrained from any futile questions or suggestions.

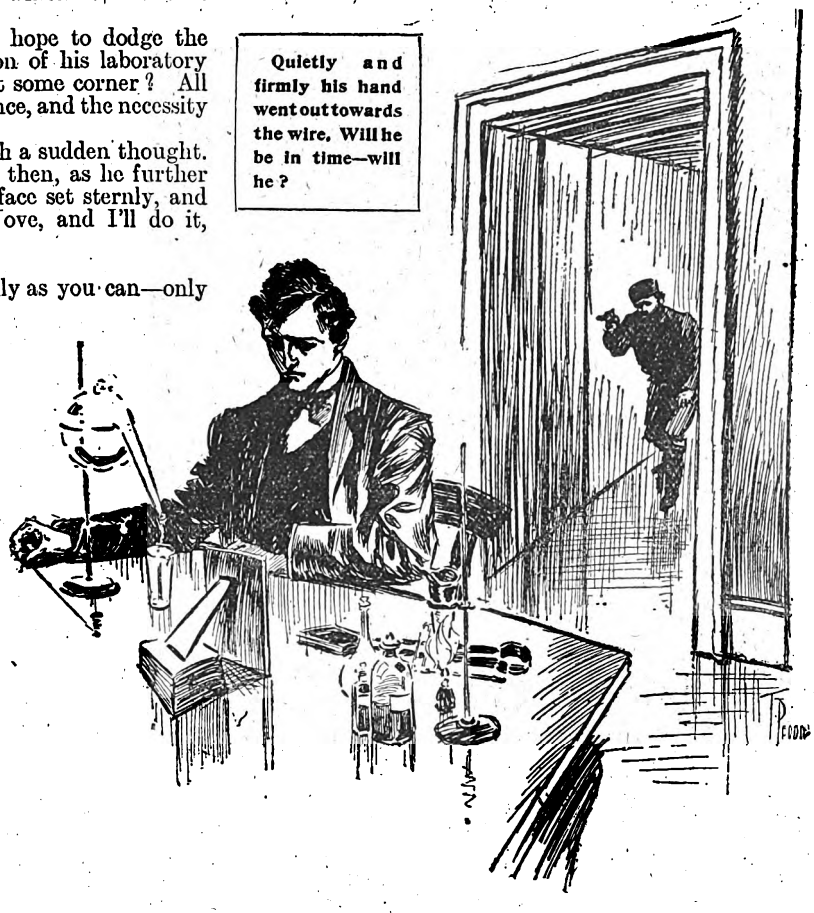
They had not been chosen for the Secret Service for nothing. They knew how to obey even if they wondered and knew not what their master had in view.

Farrell called his housekeeper, Mrs. Cook, and bade her carry some refreshments into the laboratory.

"Then you had better retire for the night, I think," said he, "for my friends and I have some important work on hand.

"Oh, and by-the-bye! do not be surprised or alarmed if you hear any very unusual sound, Mrs. Cook," added he, "for it is just possible our experiments may be noisy ones."

"All right, sir," the old housekeeper answered, and bustled away to fulfil his commands.



Quietly and firmly his hand went out towards the wire. Will he be in time—will he?

"Now we will go to the laboratory, if you please, and prepare to receive our friend the enemy."

So saying Farrell led the way to the stairs, at the foot of which he stopped again, and said to one of the men:

"You see that recess"—pointing to an opening about half-way down the hall—"I want you to conceal yourself there as completely as possible after we have made a beginning upstairs. Then you see that bell-push just at the side—it is connected to a bell in my laboratory for the convenience of Mrs. Cook; if you see or hear anyone ascend the stairs just press the button.

"I will take the bell off but will leave the indicator, so that I can be warned when the intruder is coming without letting him know that he is observed.

"Be very careful you do not let him hear you, or that will spoil all."

Then Farrell led the way to the laboratory. It was reached, after mounting the stairs, by a short corridor.

The laboratory stood parallel to the street and was separated from the house on every side, except where the corridor opened into it. The corridor ended with a double door arrangement forming a lobby, with a space of about four feet between door and door, for the prevention of draughts and the deadening of any noises that came from the house.

Edward Farrell had built his laboratory without stint as to money, and had a good many fads of his own about the place.

Between the head of the stairs and the first door there was a switch or lever arrangement of some sort on the corridor wall that looked as though it was meant for a window opener. Farrell carefully shuttered all the windows and lit the gas. He then fetched a reel of fine wire and attached one end of the wire to the handle of this switch.

He then led the wire along the floor, through the lobby, and across the laboratory, to the side of the bench at which he intended to work, concealing it as he went as much as possible.

The bench was in a direct line with the corridor, and anyone approaching by that way could see whoever was working there quite plainly.

Farrell fetched a mirror and placed it on the bench in such a position that he could easily see down the corridor without having to look in that direction.

He next placed a large rose-spray syringe on a bench near the door and placed beside it a bottle and a beaker.

The bottle was labelled "chloroform."

The Secret Service men, who had up to then been watching and assisting as much as possible without making any comment, could not help exchanging questioning glances with each other.

What did Farrell mean to do? Surely he did not expect that a desperate man like their pursuer would allow himself to be calmly smothered with chloroform.

Farrell's manner, however, forbade questioning, and there was somehow a look of power about him that told the men that his plan was much deeper than that.

"Now," said Farrell, "I think our arrangements are about complete; we dare not waste any more time—for it is quite half-an-hour since we entered, and he may force an entry at any moment.

"We will keep all our lights going just as usual, for it will perhaps lead him to think he was not noticed, and so give him greater confidence to enter. We cannot feel safe till he is disposed of one way or the other—so the quicker we get it over the better.

"Just take a few of these refreshments, and then you"—indicating the man he had instructed at the foot of the stairs—"had better conceal yourself at your post, and wait for developments. It is now ten o'clock. He may enter at any minute, or, on the other hand, you may have to wait for hours, but you must keep a strict silence and a sharp watch, for much depends on your warning."

Then to the other man:

"You had better sit down in that corner where you cannot be seen from the corridor. Do not speak a word or make a sound, I want him to think I am quite alone."

These were strange instructions for the capture of a dangerous spy, but the men obeyed without a word, and Farrell settled himself to the task before him. Both the doors leading to the stairs were left wide open so that one could see from end to end of the corridor.

Farrell locked most of his precious explosive stuff up in his safe, leaving out only as much as he needed for his immediate purpose. First he worked at his balance, weighing off portions of the explosive, then at his bench with his beakers and chemicals, but always keeping his eye on the indicator connected with the bell-push in the hall below.

The time crept slowly by. It must have been quite an hour since Farrell had dismissed the men to their posts.

The man in the laboratory sat as though carved in stone. Not a sound came from the other part of the building to tell that any living creature was there.

Still the indicator was blank, still no sound came from any part of the house.

Had Farrell reckoned in vain? Was the spy going to leave him in peace after all? He almost hoped it might be so; and yet he knew that the secret at stake was far too great for that.

He settled himself as best he could to his task again; and, considering the strain upon him, apart from his work, progressed better than he had dared to hope.

Suddenly the indicator on the opposite wall gave a low click, and Farrell saw that the little disc had fallen.

Farrell still went on with his work as though nothing had happened, but his eyes were constantly searching the mirror to see if anyone was creeping along the corridor.

For a full minute after the warning had been given the corridor was deserted, then, at the further end, a head slowly appeared round the corner by the stairs.

Gradually the whole body made its appearance and someone commenced to slowly creep along by the side of the wall.

Farrell saw that it was the same short, black-bearded man that had been in the motor-car earlier in the evening.

In his right hand he carried a weapon of some sort.

It was certain he could see Farrell, and evidently thought him alone.

As he crept slowly on in the dim half-light of the corridor his great fear must have been that Farrell should turn and discover him.

Farrell, however, still kept on with his examination. His nerves were strained to the utmost, for he could see his foe creeping gradually nearer, and yet he dared not show that he knew it.

Nearer and nearer yet he crept. Farrell could see by the mirror that he had reached the first doorway.

Nearer still—he passed the doorway—and crouched in the space that formed the lobby; he raised his arm slowly and noiselessly, and Farrell saw that the weapon he carried was a revolver.

Now was the moment ripe for action; now he would put his plan to the test, yet he must be quick for the revolver already covered him—another step forward and it would be too late!

Quietly and firmly his hand went out toward the wire. Will he be in time—will he?

Thank Heaven, yes! A sharp, short tug, followed by a crash, and two heavy iron slides fell, one before and one behind the astonished victim.

The slides formed part of an arrangement he had fitted up for securely shutting off his laboratory from the house in case of fire and was worked like a portcullis. The whole arrangement could be liberated at a moment's notice by the lever in the corridor.

The slides were arranged with an air space between them to more effectually prevent the progress of any conflagration, and ran up and down in special grooves placed just inside each of the ordinary doors of the lobby.

Cries and shrieks of rage, oaths and curses galore came from the little space between the iron doors.

The Secret Service man jumped up from his chair and rushed forward—the whole scheme was plain to him now; he marvelled at its simplicity and its cunning effectiveness.

Farrell rushed to the chloroform, poured out about half-a-pint of it into the beaker and filled the syringe.

Then he quickly mounted a chair by the slide, opened a small ventilating hole at the top, poured the whole contents of his syringe upon the raving man beneath, and quickly shut the opening again.

It must have drenched the poor wretch for his fury was redoubled for a moment or two and he kicked the door in a wild madness of rage.

Soon the anaesthetic began to tell upon him, however, his cries became feebler, and at last, ceased altogether.

Farrell then directed the Secret Service man to cautiously raise the iron doors again by turning a crank at the side of the room.

As the slides gradually lifted the unfortunate spy could be seen lying senseless on the floor—a revolver still firmly grasped in his right hand, and his clothes soaked in chloroform.

They soon had him out, and—with the help of the other Secret Service man, who had been summoned from his station downstairs—bound him securely.

"Take that fellow downstairs into the kitchen," said Farrell. "You had better take it in turns to guard him until I have finished my investigation and reported to Lord A——, then we can decide what to do with him."

* * * * *

Farrell's report was eminently satisfactory, and revealed to Lord A—— and his expert advisers the key to the secret of the foreign explosive.

Lord A— was greatly pleased by the way the spy had been tricked, and insisted upon his being handed over to the tender mercies of the War Department.

Edward Farrell's services received recognition from high quarters, and he had no reason to complain of the lack of gratitude on the part of His Majesty's Government.

[Next Week: THE HIDDEN MESSAGE.]

AT HER OWN VALUATION.

"You see how exquisitely it fits, madam?"

"I see that the young lady's figure is perfect," Mrs. Alsteyn replied dryly.

Grace Williams moved up and down in front of the long mirror that the great lady might get a better effect of the garment she contemplated buying.

The compliment had not brought the faintest shade of colour to the beautiful rounded cheek. Compliments were an hourly occurrence in the life of Grace Williams, cloak model. They filled her with a slow, consuming anger that turned her life into gall and wormwood.

Why should these women who came to buy cloaks of Brown & Buxton feel at liberty to make personal comments on her appearance every hour of the day. She was there to try on cloaks, not as a target for their personalities.

She slipped the Persian lamb and sable garment from her shoulders and stood waiting for her orders to tempt the next customer. Her black satin frock, cut in the princess style, was an additional offence. Why should she be obliged to wear this hateful livery in her working hours when the only gown that her leisure hours afforded was a wretched black serge.

The tears that filled her eyes turned the electric light into dissolving rainbows that burnt and blurred the cloak department till she could see nothing.

"You won't sell many cloaks if you look like that." The voice was cheerful, even sympathetic.

"Poor girl, what's the matter, have those girls been teasing you because you're the best-looking girl in the shop? It's a shame!"

She struggled desperately to pull herself together.

"No, indeed, Mr. Brown, everyone is just as kind to me as can be. I don't know why I was so foolish."

The young proprietor looked at her kindly. "The trouble with you is, that you don't have any amusement in your life, poor girl, nothing but prance and preen in front of a mirror all day long, trying on warm coats in a warm room, and then after your day's work is done, get into a thin jacket and face the blast."

"I was thinking something of that sort when you caught me—just now."

"How would you like to go to a theatre to-night and then have a little supper afterwards?"

The girl raised a pair of frightened eyes to his. That the "young boss" as he was familiarly called, should ask any of the girls to supper was an unheard-of thing.

"I thank you, but——"

"You think it would make talk?"

"I know it."

"Confound it, Miss Williams, why should it make talk? I am a decent enough fellow, with no scandals clinging to my coat-tails; why shouldn't I take you to the theatre? The mere fact that you happen to earn your living in my shop has nothing to do with the matter."

The offer was very tempting. Grace was so tired of going home to the cold bedroom night after night—the theatre, supper afterwards, with the "young boss"—think of it—the other girls would be mad with jealousy next day—but could she stand the gossip?—surely she owed something to herself, to her honest name.

"I'm very much obliged to you, Mr. Brown, but it would not be fair to either of us. You are good enough to take me out just because you see that I need a little amusement. It would be a poor way to repay your kindness by getting you talked about."

He flushed a little and looked embarrassed. "I had not thought about it exactly in that light."

Then Miss Williams was called to try on a white ermine opera cloak. The young proprietor watched her as she walked back and forth in front of the mirror. "Oh, what a life for such a girl!" He went back to his private office, neglected all his affairs for the remainder of the afternoon and called himself names.

The gong for closing had struck, the army of employés were filing out. In the throng was Grace Williams, her light summer jacket buttoned up tightly about her throat. A shabby serge skirt had replaced her satin livery. She carried herself like an empress.

She followed the throng for several streets, then struck off into a side street. She mounted the steps of a shabby boarding-house. Someone was playing on a crazy piano in the dining-room and the odour of boiled cabbage rushed out to greet the weary bread-winner.

How silly she had been. Why had she not accepted his invitation.

"Miss Williams—Grace—do wait a moment." It was the young boss.

"Grace, I want you to take me at your own valuation. It's better than I deserve. Come to the theatre with me to-night as my promised wife?"

She put her little, cold, bare hand in his.

"Thank you!" was all she said. W. E. York.

STATUE or WOMAN?

Two Loves that were Lost.

YIELDING to the pressure of my friend, George Harland, I consented at last to accompany him to the home of his grandmother in Lanstone, where I had been many times invited. When we descended from the train at the station we found the old lady seated in the carriage which had come to convey us and our luggage, and beside her two young ladies, who were presented to me as:

"Miss Agnes Thomson."

"Miss Jessie Gerton."

The first, a blonde, pink and white, and very pretty, seemed the expression of gladness. Her red lips smiled, her blue eyes sparkled, and the soft little ring of hair which lay about her face blew in the wind with a sort of merriment that fitted her exactly. She was lovely, but her companion made a more striking impression on me.

Tall, slender, self-possessed, she seemed to carry a sort of majesty in her presence. Her hair and eyebrows were of an intense blackness, which heightened the delicate, though perfectly healthy, whiteness of her skin. Her features were beautiful in their regularity, and the whole face breathed a calmness which contrasted greatly with the vivacity of the girl beside her. Her eyes, of a beautiful brown, were half-hidden under long, heavily-fringed lids, which were of the same pure white as her face. As her companion seemed the spirit of gaiety, she expressed the very essence of repose.

The two girls, after having responded to my bow, turned to welcome George. Agnes, with the most perfect frankness, expressed her delight at seeing him, and shook hands vigorously; Jessie bestowed on him her hand, and, without a smile, and in the most musical voice I had ever heard, spoke a few words of conventional welcome.

When we reached the house and I found myself alone with my friend. As we changed our clothes for dinner, I asked him about the two girls.

"Agnes and Jessie have been orphans from infancy. Agnes was the child of one of my grandmother's friends, and Jessie is her grandniece and a distant cousin of mine. What do you think of Agnes?" he asked, a trifle anxiously.

"She is attractive, indeed!" I answered.

"I wanted to wait until you had seen her before telling you that I am head over ears in love with her. I mean to marry her if she will only have me."

"She is very pretty, but I must confess that the other attracted me more. I think I have fallen in love with Jessie, if it is possible to do so in twenty minutes."

George shrugged his shoulders.

"Jessie is beautiful, it is true," he said, "and possesses all the virtues on the calendar, but she is not a woman—she is a statue."

"A statue!" I repeated.

"Yes, that is what I have always called her. She is insensibility itself; she feels nothing, cares for nothing, nothing affects her cold nature. She is made of marble, and made perfectly, but she is not flesh and blood."

"Some one will breathe life into the marble some day and she will come to life," I answered.

"I doubt it," said George. "She is incapable of feeling any kind of sentiment, sorrow, joy, or love. Why, you might as well try to move a stone to pity! As far back as I can remember she has never expressed even a preference for anything. If I have asked her what we should do she has always answered, 'As you please. It makes no difference to me!' That is her whole disposition in a phrase!"

I felt that George was doing her an injustice, for in my short interview I had felt a strange sympathy with her and I knew that under that beautiful calmness lay a mine of undiscovered treasure. Oh, that my hand might be the one to bring it to the light!

As in all our rides and walks George so managed as to be the companion of Agnes, I was thrown constantly with Jessie.

She was a delightful companion so long as the conversation was of a conventional and impersonal turn, but try as I would, I could not pierce her calm; I could not know her true self. She was closed to me, her thoughts a sealed book, and I grew discouraged before her obstinate coldness.

By this time my own heart had become so involved that I could not give up trying to betray her into self-revelation. I loved her as she was—statue or woman. I watched her always, hoping always for some key to her enigmatical soul.

At last, in the most unexpected way, I found it.

One night at dinner George was telling some personal experiences with the charming manner of a good story-teller. My look left him and fell on Jessie, and I could scarcely refrain from an exclamation of surprise. Her eyes, which were usually half-hidden, were opened wide and fixed on her cousin; her cheeks glowed with a soft pink; her whole expression was one of unconscious animation that made her ten times more lovely.

I studied her face attentively. What a soft light burnt in those beautiful eyes as they gazed at George!

Suddenly Jessie turned her head as though feeling my scrutiny and our eyes met. In an instant the colour faded from her cheeks, the light in her eyes was veiled and she had become the statue again.

But I had had a glimpse of what I knew was hidden. The statue possessed flesh, blood and sentiment. I knew it now and the vision did not give me the happiness I had expected.

That evening I watched her more closely than ever. She had taken up a piece of embroidery and sat under the lamp, sewing, her hair shining in the light. George and Agnes drew softly to the long window and disappeared into the garden. The grandmother saw them, and laughed:

"There they are, running away again; those foolish children!" she said.

Jessie's head was bent so low over her work I could not see her face, but I saw her hands tremble so that she had to stop sewing until she regained control of them.

A statue! A fragile one, then. And George had said she could not suffer!

The grandmother retired to her room shortly, and I followed, sick at heart. Five minutes later I discovered that I had left my paper, and I returned to the salon.

Jessie was still under the lamp, but she was not sewing. Her embroidery had fallen to the floor and her head was bowed on her arms upon the table. Her shoulders were shaken by sobs.

An immense pity filled me for this woman whose sorrow had revealed her to me. I crossed the room and stood beside her. As soon as she heard me she jumped up, and would have left the room, but I said:

"Jessie, don't run away. You need not be afraid, for I have guessed everything."

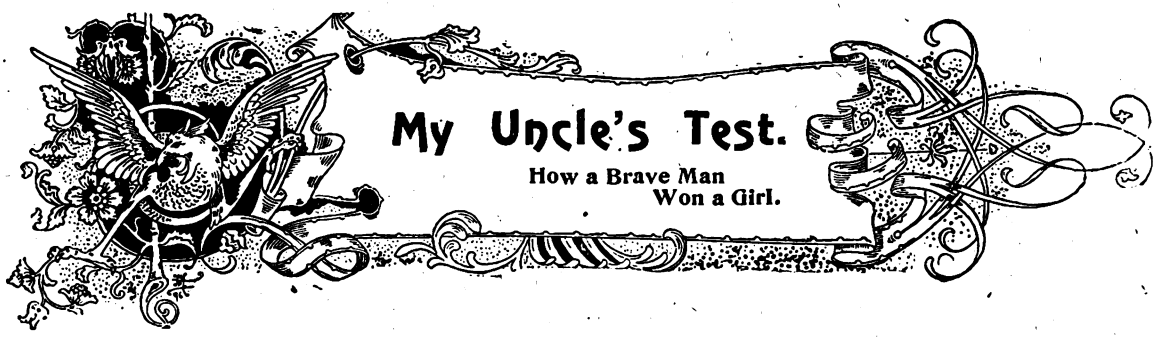
She looked at me, her beautiful mouth trembling, her eyes wet, her cheeks flushed, and all her reserve broke down.

"No, you could not guess how much I love him," she said. "Ever since we were children together I have worshipped him and feared him. Now I love him with a love so strong and deep it merges everything else, and he does not suspect it. I know he calls me a statue and thinks I'm hard and cold. If I were not that way I should throw myself at his feet."

She was vibrating with emotion, making a picture so beautiful that my eyes were dazzled. And with what despair I saw her come into life!

"You will not betray me," she said, a great pleading in her voice and face. "He is going to marry Agnes, and they must never know. But I shall never love any one but him."

I took the hand she held out me, and promised to keep her secret—and my own T. H. French.



When the dry voice of the little lawyer died away we three beneficiaries by the will stood amazed, astounded at its peculiar provisions.

My cousin, George Vardon, was the first to break the silence. "The man must have been mad," he exclaimed.

"It is such a strange will. If I understand it, his immense property is cut into halves, of which my cousin, Nora, receives one part and the other is to be divided between Mr. Harold Waring and myself," continued George Vardon.

"Quite right," assented the lawyer.

"But in the event of the death of Miss Nora Waring within one hour of the reading of this testament, the entire property is to go to found an orphan asylum; not only her portion but ours as well. In the event of the death of either Mr. Harold Waring or myself within the same time his portion is to be added to the share of Nora, and is to become hers. In case all three survive the hour, the property willed to us becomes ours unconditionally. Am I right?"

"Right again, Mr. Vardon," answered Mr. Brief, the lawyer.

"But why this absurd provision about our sudden death within the hour? I assure you"—with a nervous little laugh—"I have no immediate intention of giving up the ghost, Miss Nora looks superbly healthy, and Mr. Harold Waring is at least not an invalid."

"I can't explain the will at all. The old gentleman had queer fancies, gathered during his long sojourn in India. But you may depend upon it that he was quite sane and that the testament is absolutely valid. I drew it up myself, and there is no possible flaw in it. Let me call your attention again to another peculiar provision of the will. You three are to go at once into the blue room, close the door, and remain there fifteen minutes. You will find upon the floor a carved box, which one of you is to open. It may possibly be that in that box there may be some explanation of the terms of the will. I have the honour to wish you a very good day and long life to enjoy your property." With which Mr. Brief bowed himself out of the room.

My uncle had amassed a large property in India, where he had led a very curious life, being familiar with a very mixed company of natives and whites. His confidential valet, Lal Singh, was a man of such varied accomplishments that I never found him looking at me without feeling the creeps shiver down my back.

I, Nora Waring, was the favourite of the three kinsfolk who were left my uncle upon his return to England. He was absurdly fond of me, and in a continual fear lest I should make an unhappy marriage to some man unworthy of me. As to his nephews, who were also my cousins, I had never been able to find out whether he liked them or not. Often I had observed him looking curiously at them, and then anxiously at me, for my cousins were patiently, if not yet confessedly, admirers of mine. He was always quite civil to them both and very generous in his gifts to them, but what his secret feelings were I had never fathomed. Sometimes it had seemed to me that I had seen him chuckle when he looked at the sedate, careful George Vardon or the reckless, don't-care Harold Waring, much as if he had some surprises arranged for them in the future.

I do not know what curious fancies passed through the minds of my cousins as the automatic lock of the blue room clicked behind us, but I confess that for my part I was ready to conceive all manner of Borgia devices. From the puzzled, strained look on the handsome face of George, I knew he was worrying over the situation. As for Harold Waring, he strode in with his usual easy, debonair cavalry swing, looking every inch the soldier and gentleman. I glanced swiftly from one to the other, and for the life of me I could not tell which I liked the better. Before I left the blue room fifteen minutes later I knew which I loved and which I despised.

The room was bare of all furniture, save a roll-top desk and a small table in one corner, on the top of each of which lay a cane walking-stick. The carved box mentioned in the will stood on the floor in an opposite corner.

"Let Nora open the box. It will be something for her to remember when we laugh about it in the future," suggested George.

We walked over together to the box, and I was about to turn the key when Harold Waring thrust me roughly to one side, struck by some sudden impulse of danger.

"No, no, Nora! Let me," he cried, and quickly turned the key.

The lid rose from the box before he had time to touch it, and from beneath it slid out half-a-dozen horrible flat heads and sinuous necks. I shrieked aloud in terror, and fled screaming across the room to the door. But the walls flung back my cries, and the door seemed to mock my efforts to wrench it open. I was in a palsy of agony, expecting every moment to feel the dreadful clutch of death fasten on me.

"Courage, Nora, courage! We'll win through yet, little cousin," cried a tremulous voice in my ear.

The strong arm of Harold Waring was wrapped about my waist, and I felt myself propelled towards the table. He lifted me from the ground and leapt across a reptile which barred the way. George Vardon was already cowering on the table, beside himself with terror, all manhood gone. His face was ashen grey, and his limbs shook beneath him.

"Keep back!" he cried. "There is no room for more, and I got here first. Keep back, I say!"

He seized the cane which lay on the table and struck wildly at us. Harold warded it aside and lifted me to the table.

"There's room for two," he said. "And if there were room for only one, that one should be Nora, you coward.'

"Jump, Harold!" I cried. "Jump, quick."

He leapt aside just in time to avoid the spring of the cobra. He circled round the room, jumping from side to side in his efforts to avoid the horrible death which menaced him. My heart stood still. It seemed to me that the room was filled with those ghastly erect, quivering bodies, with hooded heads, from which shot forked tongues of death, with unnatural, distended necks. I knew now who the man was that I loved, and I covered my face with my hands that I might not see him stricken down before my eyes. But the awful fascination of it was greater than my will. I had to look again. The face of Harold Waring was covered with beady perspiration, and in his eyes lurked gruesome fear.

"The cane!" he gasped, as he passed the table.

But George Vardon clung to it despairingly, imploring Waring to save him at any price, for Heaven's sake to save him.

"Oh, you coward," I flung at him. Then, with a sudden inspiration:

"The cane on the desk, Harold," I cried to him.

He reached the desk in safety, grasped the cane, and as he touched the roll-top it swung back. From the desk two more cobras slid with a dull thud to the ground. Harold Waring made his way to a corner of the room, and made a last stand with his back to the wall like a British officer.

Again and again he beat back the venomous reptiles with swift cuts of the cane, or trampled upon them with his heavy boot-heels. But the end was near, and I knew it.

I could stand it no longer. Snatching the cane from the palsied hands of George Vardon, I leapt to the ground and made across the room. I heard a curious whistle, and instantly every reptile was still. The whistle was repeated and they began to crawl towards the box whence they had come.

A panel slid aside in the wall, and Lal Singh stood smiling in the opening. He looked from one to another of us with a curious light of understanding in his eyes, as if he appreciated perfectly the part that each had played in the scene just finished. Then he came forward with his usual obsequious bow and handed me a letter.

I took it, swayed uncertainly for a moment, and pitched forward in a faint. When I came to myself Harold was bending over me with a face like chalk. Lal Singh and George Vardon stood back a little way, the one still smiling, the other with twitching limbs.

I tore open the letter and read it. The signature at the bottom was my dead uncle's.

> "Dear Nora,—There can come to a woman no greater misery than to marry the wrong man. She had better be in her grave than find that the man she has promised to love and honour is selfish and a coward. From long experience I know that it would be useless for me to tell you which of your cousins is a man and which is not, so I have arranged a little test for you to judge them by. It is at the supreme moments that there appears the difference between the coward and the brave man. For that reason I have brought you and them face to face with such a moment. If the strain has been a hard one, remember that it has been only on account of the great love I bear you, and forgive
> "James Waring."

I handed the letter to Harold Waring, and he read it aloud. George Vardon shrank back in shame, his breath coming in laboured gasps.

When he had finished reading my soldier cousin faced me, standing very erect, but with a countenance from which all the colour of blood had fled.

"And this—'little test'—has it availed, Nora?" he asked.

There was something in his manner that forbade me to trifle with him. "You will have but a short courtship, and a long sad mourning, Nora, for—I think I am about to die, sweetheart. I was bitten three times, and the bite of the cobra is—fatal," he told me sadly. Then, smiling a little: "You see one of us is to die within the hour after all."

"No so, sahib," interposed the soft voice of Lal Singh. "The fangs of the cobras had all been removed."

THE GREAT NEW SERIAL,

"LINK BY LINK,"

Starts Next Week.

THE newspaper boys and the crossing-sweepers were unanimously of opinion that Dixon was a millionaire. They never said so to his face, of course, but they touched their hats when he came in sight, and they knew that when he gave them a penny for a halfpenny paper he would never wait for the change. Whenever he did a thing he always did it in style.

He was not exactly a millionaire, but considering the small salaries they give in the City nowadays, it is wonderful how well the junior clerks manage to dress on £25 a year. It must be remembered, moreover, that this young man was wealthier by a small farm and £500 in the bank than most of the clerks who belonged to the firm of Morris Weight and Co. Otherwise, so far as character and ability went, he was much the same as the other young men in the establishment. Theoretically speaking he should have been proportionately happier than they. Doubtless he would have been, but for a certain unfortunate peculiarity of temperament. He fell in love too easily.

Whenever Dixon found himself sufficiently interested in a girl to ask for her photograph, he immediately lost all interest in other girls, and became at once irresistibly tender, jealous, and generally foolish. He got into trouble in this way. It used to happen very often, and each time it was the most violent attack of the disease which he had ever known.

About every other week he used to fall in love with a new girl. Then he forgot his studied languor, and ran over muddy crossings when the cause of his malady approached. He practised graceful bows before the mirror, yet when she, to whom all these bows were made in imagination, stood before him, he would do nothing but speak of the pleasant weather, which was rather inappropriate when, as is usually the case in England, the sun had not seen the ground for a week.

It was at the theatre that he first met Laura Mann. Just as the maid, who was dusting furniture on the stage cried, "Here he comes at last," and flung herself quickly round, accidentally revealing a glimpse of black stockings and snowy lace with perfect success, some one asked him if he would mind moving his legs, and he looked up to see a pompous old lady, followed by the prettiest girl he had ever seen.

The seats next to him were vacant, and to his intense delight the ladies immediately proceeded to occupy them. The lively little housemaid with the black stockings no longer interested him, and his whole attention was devoted to his next-door neighbour. Once or twice he caught her looking at him out of the corners of her eyes, which were, of course, modestly dropped directly he met her gaze.

Towards the end of the second act the old lady most conveniently fainted, and Dixon after this could not very well do otherwise than volunteer to escort them home.

The following Sunday evening he called by permission, at their house in Brixton. He sang to Miss Angelina Norton's accompaniment, to the admiration of the fat old lady, whom he already regarded as his future mother-in-law. She would not have admired him, perhaps, if it had not been that she was deaf with one ear, and always sat with that ear towards the piano when Angelina's young men came in to sing.

A week later, and the little drawing-room had already begun to feel quite homelike. He was perfectly at his ease by this time, and talked as if he had been a friend of the family for at least ten years. He alluded to his country estates and to his banking account in a casual sort of way and with a shrug of his shoulders which might mean anything, and then he went away with the comfortable belief that he was making a good impression.

The following Wednesday he had three tickets given him for the dress circle of the Gaiety. He thereupon wrote to Beaumont, Mortice Avenue, Brixton, and said he was going to try and get some tickets for the theatre that night, and would they care to come with him. They understood from what he said afterwards that he had paid at least three times the ordinary amount for those seats, as there was a great run on the tickets.

On the way home he was quite sure that Miss Angelina leant up against him in the 'bus. He didn't say anything at the time, but in the hall, when the old lady had gone on ahead, she made a little exclamation, and said he mustn't think of such a thing, but he did—he kissed her.

And he went down into the street with feelings of exultation, doubt, and helplessness well-mixed and shaken together.

He was not quite sure that this kiss had not been a little premature. It was very nice, of course; but somehow or other he thought a good deal about his indiscretion, and recalled several little speeches of Angelina's, which irritated him, and made him regret that he had gone so far.

On Sunday he called again. He was reserved, almost cold, during the first part of the evening; but later, when they sat on the sofa together for the first time, his reserve wore away.

On all his subsequent visits they sat on the sofa.

* * * * *

The clerks in the office of Messrs. Morris, Weight and Co. were taking their holidays by turns, and early in September Dixon packed up his Gladstone bag and went down to Margate.

He found society down there very pleasant, and he had hardly been away five days before the young lady who sang on the pier usurped the place in his heart which once had been sacred to Angelina. That pretty creature's charms became dim when regarded from a distance, and although he had told her the night before he went away that Margate would be unendurable for more than a week without her; he now secretly determined to stay down there a fortnight at least. He passed a restless night, making up his mind on the subject, and he awoke with a headache. He rang the bell, and sent the waiter for a brandy and soda. He was a very abstemious youth, and it may have been that this unusual dissipation went to his head. At all events, by the time he was dressed he had fully made up his mind that he couldn't marry that shallow, ignorant girl for all the wealth of the world.

Fickle? Yes, he knew he was fickle. But it was better to draw back now, better for her—better for him, especially for him. He had never known what love was until he had seen the young lady who sang on the pier. He felt that it would be kinder to let Angelina know the truth at once. They were not suited to one another. If he did not break the engagement off, it would only lead to everlasting regrets.

On second thoughts, however, he thought that he would let the matter taper off gradually. So he made his second letter to Brixton, say, about a third as warm as the first, and said casually that he had decided to stay at Margate for the whole of the holiday.

In her reply Angelina said she did not know what she had done that he should throw her over in that disgraceful way. She supposed that he had found people down there who were more to his taste than his homely Brixton friends.

Dixon felt, as he read this letter through for the second time, that the tapering process was going to be rather abrupt. He ordered another brandy and soda and then sat down and wrote a reply at once.

He referred to the danger of making mistakes. He did not think that any man was justified in marrying a girl unless she was willing to trust him as she would trust herself; unless he was absolutely certain that he was in a position to make her happy. Both for her sake and his, but especially for hers, he thought that they had better come to a distinct understanding. It would be far wiser to deliberate calmly and carefully before taking a step which they could never recall, and might afterwards regret. There could be, he said, nothing more terrible than a life-long union of two uncongenial souls, and he begged to remain, hers faithfully, Harold Dixon.

Miss Norton's reply was brief. She saw exactly what he had in his mind, and she had placed the matter in the hands of her solicitors.

"That young woman's driving me to drink," said Dixon, as he ordered the third brandy and soda he had absolutely needed since he had been down at Margate. There was no mistaking the meaning of the letter. She was going to bring an action for breach of promise. Once more certain traits in Angelina's character recurred to him. There was no question about it—he was certain.

Yes, he reflected, she is just the girl to do it. He thought of the notoriety, of the public disgrace, the ridicule, the expense, and, as a last straw, his instant dismissal from the firm of Morris, Weight, and Co.

He had long desired to visit Ireland, and he suddenly came to the conclusion that there is no time like the present. He would go over there and stay long enough for this nonsense to blow over.

He wasn't going to pay £1,000 to a girl like Angelina, especially as he only had £500, and he immediately drew that £500 from the bank, and took the very next boat across the Irish Channel. When he arrived at Dublin, after a very rough crossing, he suddenly came to the conclusion that he would stay there permanently.

After that experience nothing would induce him to go back. This was his idea.

The next evening he was sitting in the smoking-room of a quiet commercial hotel in Dublin. It seemed to him he might well congratulate himself on having given An ina the slip, and he laughed softly to himself at the thought of the distracted solicitor arriving at Margate and finding the bird had flown.

He was still laughing when the waiter opened the door and brought in a letter addressed to him in an unknown hand. It bore the London postmark.

"Well, that's very strange," he thought to himself, as he weighed the envelope on the tip of his finger. "How in the world have they got my address? I suppose Morris and Weight's manager told them. I wish I had never met him at the station now. But I thought he could be trusted, and it seemed just as well to have someone who knows where you are. I wonder who this is from."

He tore open the letter and glanced hurriedly through it, and then he started up, with his hand pressed to his forehead.

It was from a firm of London solicitors who wrote on behalf of their client, Miss Angelina Norton, to say that the damage done to the lady's affections was estimated at £1,500. They confidently believed that Mr. Dixon could not fail to see the justice of their client's demand, and expressed a hope that he would be good enough to settle the matter without the formality of submitting the case to a jury.

"There's only one thing to do," thought Dixon, as he leant his elbow on the mantelpiece; "I must take the next train to Queenstown, and continue my travels to America. I have always had a great wish to go there. And I feel I want change of air."

The shock this letter had been to Dixon was sufficient to create a demand for brandy and soda. The waiter brought in the spirit in a tumbler and a syphon. Dixon mixed the two with very little of the syphon. Then he asked for a time-table, and discovered that the midnight train was the first that he could catch.

"I may as well stop here for dinner," he thought. Then he went upstairs and packed his bag. Having done so, it occurred to him that there were one or two things in the town it might be as well to get off his mind, and he went out and bought a tooth-brush, a sponge-bag, and a few other little articles which he had forgotten in his sudden flight from Margate.

It was eight o'clock as he once more reached the hotel, and he went at once into the dining-room. His appetite had sadly diminished since the receipt of that letter, and whenever the door opened he started nervously. He wished he was safely on his way to America, or that he had never quarrelled with Angelina. He did not much care which; but his situation in Dublin was embarrassing. At ten o'clock the passengers from the afternoon boat arrived.

The landlord bustled about shouting directions to the waiters, hanging up overcoats, and welcoming his old friends among the commercial travellers.

"Supper is ready, gentlemen," he called out in his cheery voice, and they all trooped out of the hall into the coffee-room.

All except one. He was a little man, small and thin, with a red moustache, and sandy hair of a peculiarly sickly shade. His eyes were hidden beneath immense eyebrows, and his shoulders were stooped forward.

"Do you know what time the train to Queenstown goes?" he said, holding out his hand to the fire, and addressing himself to Dixon.

Dixon was sitting with the fatal letter on his lap, rolling a cigar in his mouth. He was in no mood for conversation, and he was quite unconscious of the stare he fixed upon his interlocutor, who was rubbing his hands nervously.

"At midnight," he said shortly.

The little man seemed disquieted by Dixon's steady stare, and he shifted from one leg to the other. He dropped his eyes, and they fell upon the envelope which Dixon had allowed to fall to the ground. He started when he saw it and changed colour. Then he seated himself in a chair, placing his little black bag between his feet, as if he were frightened of forgetting it, while he cast frequent glances at Dixon from under his shaggy eyebrows.

"I wonder what the dickens that fellow's staring at me for," thought Dixon, when at last he became conscious of the fact that every movement was being watched by the weird specimen of humanity in the opposite chair. He felt nervous and irritated, but for some time his thoughts were too busy with his plans for escape even to ask himself why.

Suddenly he sat bolt upright in his chair.

A cold shiver ran down his back and seemed to settle in the calves of his legs, leaving them clammy and moist.

"By Jove," he thought, "that man's a detective."

When he came to look at it there was no mistaking that flimsy disguise. The moustache did not always move in exact time with the upper lip, and the whiskers shifted with the man's ears, and not with his jaws.

At that moment the landlord returned from the coffee-room, and Dixon turned to him as to an old friend. He felt safer in the presence of a third party.

"Won't you have any supper, sir?" said mine host, with a bow towards the stranger.

The little man passed the back of his hand nervously across his mouth.

"No thank you," he said, keeping his eyes fixed on Dixon. "I'll stop here, if you don't mind. It's not winter yet, I know, but I'm glad you've got a fire," and he shivered.

Dixon thought he would try a bit of bluff. "Make out my bill," he ejaculated, turning to the proprietor, "I shall be going on early to-morrow."

Mine host turned towards his desk, and as he did so he stooped down leisurely and picked up an evening paper which one of the travellers had dropped.

"Hullo," he said, "another bank cashier gone wrong. Got away with his money, too."

"What's that?" said the little shrivelled-up man, looking up quickly.

The proprietor finished up the paragraph before he answered.

"Head cashier of the Anglo-American Joint Stock Company," he replied. "Gone off with £50,000 and the detectives can't trace him. They never can," and he laughed softly to himself as a man who has a notion he could do the work of the Scotland Yard officials a good deal better than they seem to.

"Can't they?" said Dixon. He was thinking of his own case, and he carefully avoided looking in the direction of the little man opposite, lest he should see a malicious gleam of triumph.

"Do you think he won't get away, then?" queried the stranger, and the leather of his chair creaked as he bent forward.

"I'm certain of it," said Dixon. "The law never yet failed to ferret out a runaway."

He was still thinking of his own case and he groaned inwardly. The little man opposite groaned too, only it was audible in his case, and involuntary.

Dixon looked up suddenly.

"That man's a good actor," he thought to himself. "If I didn't know about these things I should never have guessed he was a detective. It was an unnecessary expense sending him over here, but I suppose they guessed I should go on to America when I got as far as this. I hope he won't arrest me publicly. I think I'd better let him see I am going back like a man. So," he added aloud, "the letter got here before you, eh?"

He was looking at the stranger. The little man fidgeted uneasily, and the leather of his chair creaked again.

"I'd like a word with you in a private room, sir," he said, with a meaning glance.

Dixon nodded. He was grateful to the man for his thoughtfulness. Certainly mine host suspected nothing.

In another moment the proprietor had shown them into a private sitting-room. There was a good deal of dust on the chairs, and the whole apartment wore a gloomy and uninhabited aspect.

Both men shivered.

They drew up two chairs to the table, and the little man laid his bag down in front of him.

"Well," said Dixon, "I was about right when I said it was impossible for a man to get out of the reach of the law, eh?" and he laughed nervously.

The little man beat his hand on the table. Then he pushed back his chair.

"You don't look like a hard-hearted man," he said.

Dixon flushed slightly.

"I'm not exactly," he explained, thinking of Angelina and the young lady who sang on the Margate pier.

The stranger rose and paced up and down the room. He was on the other side of the table when he stopped suddenly and faced Dixon.

"Tell me," he said, and his face looked almost haggard, "are you married? Have you a wife you love, and children who call you daddy, and put their soft little arms round your neck and kiss you?" A dry sob choked the stranger, and he began walking up and down again, to and fro, between the fireplace and the window.

At last he stopped and drew the blinds aside. He pressed his forehead against the glass and looked out with unseeing eyes.

"Tell me," he said, turning round suddenly, "how would you like to go to prison? How would you like to lie on a bed of straw, and think of those dear ones at home praying for you and starving, starving, starving, while you served your term of imprisonment? How would you like it?" he repeated, coming up to the table and bringing his hand down with a thump that nearly started the life out of Dixon.

That young man had been at first mystified by the stranger's earnestness and deep agitation, but he found himself growing hotter and hotter at these insinuations. He had no idea it was a question of imprisonment, and what were these false charges of marriage someone was bringing against him? He may have fallen, but he had not sinned. He was indignant that any one should even suppose that he had been a husband and a father when he had been courting Angelina. He got up and stood facing the stranger.

"How dare you insult me," he began; but the little man interrupted him.

His face wore a far-away expression, and he evidently had not heard what Dixon said.

"Look here," he whispered, "I don't want to give you unnecessary trouble. What I want to know is this: Can anything in the world induce you to go back to England alone and at once, without saying a word about seeing me?"

Dixon said afterwards you could have knocked him down with a feather. Then with his usual penetration he saw through the mystery. The detective they had sent after him wanted to go after the bank robber. It was a bigger job, with more attaching to it, more fame and a greater reward.

The idea of being left to go back to England by himself pleased him mightily. He would take the trip viâ America.

"I am quite willing to go back alone," he said.

There was a knock at the door.

"If any gentlemen are going by the midnight mail," the proprietor said, putting his head in, "the 'bus starts in ten minutes."

The stranger looked at Dixon, and Dixon looked at the stranger, and they both looked on the floor.

"Well," said the little man, "it rests with you whether I go by the midnight train or not. Can you be trusted?"

Dixon held out his hand.

"I'll never breathe a word of this meeting," he said, fervently. He had never expected that things would turn out so well as this.

The little man opened his bag and took out a roll of papers. He thrust them into Dixon's hand, and then went out hurriedly. Dixon has never seen him again to this day, and he never wants to.

"This is the summons and other interesting legal documents, I suppose," he said to himself. "What an ass that detective must be," he went on throwing the bundle down on the table unopened. "I wonder whether he really thinks I am going quietly back to England."

Another drink seemed more in his line just then, and he ordered a brandy and soda.

"It's all Angelina's fault," he said to himself apologetically, when the waiter brought in the refreshments.

How long he sat in that room he did not know. The sudden fright and the merciful escape had upset his nerves.

Then he stretched out his hand and carelessly opened the roll of papers.

They rustled as he spread them out, and his heart suddenly jumped into his mouth.

Bank notes for £10,000!

"Horace Dixon you're an ass!" he said to himself, and then he rang the bell for brandy. "You might bring in two, I think," he said to the waiter, and he drank them both down, one after the other.

He saw it all now. The little man was the bank cashier, who had mistaken him for a detective, and this was his bribe, £10,000, to say nothing about the meeting. He felt he ought to laugh, but his throat was dry, and his head burning.

* * * * *

Two days later he called upon the firm of London solicitors, and paid the £1,500 down without a murmur. It was an easy way of getting out of the difficulty. His conscience smote him, it is true, for he felt in a way that the money belonged to the bank; but after all it had been obtained honestly enough, and the balance would do nicely for setting up house with the girl on the Margate pier.

The next day they arrested him for complicity in the great bank robbery, and he is still trying to make the authorities believe his story. Angelina has been arrested, too, but there is every chance of their getting off. The fright will do them both good probably, and at all events Dixon will be cured of falling in love too easily.

All That Was Left.

"Professor, what has become of Tom Appleton? Wasn't he studying with the class last year?" "Ah, yes, Appleton—poor fellow. A fine student, but absent-minded in the use of chemicals—very. That discolouration on the ceiling. Notice it?" "Yes." "That's he." "I'm not surprised. I always thought Tom would make his mark if he got a chance."

What He Wanted.

The young man's face was flushed, and his manner was strangely agitated. As he addressed the fair girl before whom he stood, a faint tremor was noticeable in his voice. "Miss Blanche," he said, "I hesitated about coming to you, but my feelings have overpowered me at last. Will it be too much for me to ask——" "Pray go on," said the maiden, with heart wildly beating, as his face faltered. Yes, they were coming, the words that she and her dear mamma had so long waited for. "Pray go on," she said again, as he stood looking at her with burning eyes. "I came to ask you, Miss Blanche——" "Yes," she smiled encouragingly. "If it would be too much trouble for you to write off that recipe which you said you had for warding off indigestion. I'm sure I'm going to have it, and those confounded doctors always charge so much for a prescription."

A Strange Weapon.

WE had finished dinner and settled ourselves on either side of the fire to smoke and talk. After some time the conversation turned to the subject of valuables and I asked my host which of his many possessions he most valued. He shut his eyes and leant lazily back in his chair as if thinking deeply.

"I never really thought much about it," he said at last. "There are two or three things I value very highly, but perhaps, of all my possessions, a curious weapon which was the means of saving me in what might easily have been a very nasty experience some years ago is most worthy of my regard. From a monetary point of view it is worth practically nothing, but if I had not chanced to have it with me on the occasion of which I speak, things might have gone badly with me and with Minnie too, for the matter of that." Minnie was his wife and was staying with friends.

My curiosity was excited. I had never known John Harpenden had been in any particularly dangerous predicament and I said so.

"No, I daresay you didn't hear of it," he replied, "but if you like I'll tell you the story now and also show you the weapon. Or suppose you try and guess what it is. I'll give you three guesses, though I don't suppose you would find it out in thirty."

I suggested the first weapon that occurred to me, a revolver.

He smiled indulgently and shook his head. "Nothing so hackneyed as that, my friend."

"A dagger?"

"No."

As the mention of legitimate weapons seemed only to amuse him I spent my third guess in suggesting that the weapon might be a walking-stick.

Harpenden laughed and rose from his chair. "No one has ever guessed," he said as he opened a small cabinet, took out a wooden box and put it on the table before me. With great solemnity he raised the lid and lifted out—a patent leather shoe, a new, shining, lady's little evening shoe, with a high heel and neat little silver buckle.

I stared speechless. Surely Harpenden was joking.

"You look mystified," he observed complacently, "and if I may say so, rather sceptical. But wait till you hear my story. One December night several years ago Minnie and I went out to dinner with some friends.

"We were then living at Thornfield which as you know is quite in the country, and the friends with whom we were to dine occupied a house about a mile away. Well, Minnie (though the sweetest little woman in the world) is like the rest of her sex in wanting to show off her belongings, so, though the dinner was no very big affair she put on all her warpaint, including the diamond necklace which was left to her by her old godmother and which is very valuable. Our village only boasted one cab in which we drove to the Elmers (our friends) and I told the man to call for us again at eleven o'clock.

"However, he never came at that time nor, though we waited and waited till nearly mid-night. Mrs. Elmer wanted us to stay the night and I suggested that I should go and hunt for the missing cab and bring it back for Minnie. However she decided that the simplest thing to do would be for both of us to walk home.

"It was a lovely moonlight night, and the distance was nothing to speak of. Elmer and a friend who was staying with him offered to escort us, but we refused the offer. We knew the way perfectly and had no fear Minnie wrapped herself up and we started.

"Just about half-way, there was a particularly lonely little piece of lane with a hedge on either side. The lane led through a wood on the other side of which was our house. Just as we reached the entrance of the wood two men seemed to grow up out of the ground before us.

"As a matter of fact they had really been crouching in the hedge and we did not see them till they stepped in front of us. They had on masks and of course we both knew in a moment what they wanted, Minnie's necklace and any odd trifles such as my watch and her rings and bracelets besides.

"We found afterwards that they were a gang of three. The third had engaged the solitary cab on a fictitious errand and so arranged that it was impossible for it to return to the village in time to call for us. They knew of course that Minnie would wear her diamond necklace and they imagined that to ask for it would be to get it from a woman and one unarmed man. But they were a little out of their reckoning.

"Though I say it myself, I am no coward, and, unarmed as I was, I determined to fight for the diamonds in spite of the assurance of one of the robbers that they would not hurt us if we made no resistance. Almost unconsciously I put my hand in my pocket for a weapon and there I felt Minnie's shoes which I was carrying for her. I thought that a blow with the sharp heel would probably be more efficacious than one with my fist and I put out my hand calling 'Keep off!'

"To my utmost amazement both men stopped dead, they stared at my hand as if fascinated, then simultaneously muttering, 'He's armed!' they turned and made off as fast as they could.

"They were very raw highwaymen no doubt, but things might have been very nasty for us, had it not been for the shoe. In a second the reason of their terror dawned upon me. As I said, it was a moonlight night, and the moon shining upon the patent-leather shoe gave it in some inexplicable way, the appearance of a revolver, the glint of the silver buckle helping the illusion.

"They did not wait to investigate it; so far as their eyes could tell, a revolver was levelled at them and they thought flight their safest course. But ill-luck attended them. They ran straight into the arms of some workmen returning from the village and a little time afterwards I had the satisfaction of hearing them sentenced to a term of imprisonment. And now you know why I value this strange weapon."

CATS AND DOGS.

The Winning of the Dean's Daughter.

THE dean's cheeks are flushed a deep red beneath the eyes; the rest of his face is shaded with a stiff grey stubble of twenty-four hours' growth. It is not, if the truth be known, the healthy glow of sleep which has caused that sudden colouring, so conspicuous by its contrast with the immaculate, tasselled night-cap, and the snowy bed-clothes. Those widening circles, as the vergers and choristers have good cause to know, are the finger-marks of a dangerous and exceedingly irritable temper.

Annoyance, perhaps, was excusable under the circumstances. The dean was a man whose movements for the last twenty-five years had been regulated with clock-like precision. It was his habit to read prayers every night at a quarter to ten and after embracing his daughter to turn out the great brass lamp in the hall, and to reach his bedroom just as the cathedral bells chimed that hour.

Once in bed, it was his intention and his custom to sleep until the gentle insinuating clatter of his man-servant with the shaving water and the shutters enticed him almost unconsciously from the infinite realms of dreamland on the stroke of half-past eight.

It is now only six, and his slumbers have been rudely disturbed.

He sits up in bed and rubs his eyes. He hears nothing but the shrill chattering of the sparrows playing and quarrelling among themselves in the variegated ivy which covers the whole side of the Deanery, mingled with china-roses and masses of yellow jasmine.

"I'm sure I heard something," he says, catching sight of himself in the long mirror in the wardrobe, and adjusting his night cap.

However, the cause of his disturbance, whatever it may have been, is hushed, and with a sigh of intense vexation, which is the synonym of an oath in the dean's vocabulary, he settles himself down again and pulls the blankets more closely round him to repulse the fresh morning air which is creeping into his warm bed, and insinuating itself in a most aggressive way between his shoulder blades.

His regular breathing tells that he is once more asleep, when the same shrill wail of agony which had startled him before floats in through the half-open window.

In a moment the dean is out of bed and paddling across the polished boards with naked feet. The circles below his eyes are burning brightly, and his whole face wears an expression of extreme earnestness. The boards are very cold, and the dean, remembering a trick of his youthful days, snatches a bath towel from the washing-stand and throwing it on the ground, shuffles along on this moving carpet to the window.

It is a beautiful summer's morning, and outside everything is bathed in sunshine.

On the right a well-kept lawn of velvety turf slopes down to the grey old cathedral walls, and on the other a thick shrubbery, broken here and there with a border of gaily painted flowers, half hides the tall green fence which divided the dean's garden from the bishop's palace.

Immediately in front the broad gravel path which diverges at the basin of the fountain, and comes together on the farther side, leads down to the little gate in the iron railing which is the boundary of his lordship's park.

The dean from his window can see nearly three miles across this gently undulating pasture-land, here rolling a great bank towards the early sun until every dew-bathed blade of grass is silvered, and there sloping gently backwards towards the west in solemn shade, clothed with huge beds of bracken and stunted undergrowth.

Here and there some magnificent forest tree stands out in solitary grandeur, its lower branches trimmed with absolute exactness where the deer have nibbled, while on the crest of the farthest hill the sun is already throwing shadows through a cluster of hoary oaks which wave their gnarled branches in a soft midsummer breeze, and suggest further scenes of sylvan beauty down in the miniature valley below.

The dean has already expressed his belief that there is a time for everything. Standing on a damp towel at the open window, shielded only by a fluttering night-shirt and a cap, he does not see his way to bestowing even one thought on the glories of that early morning scene, and his whole attention is concentrated on an effort to trace the unearthly sounds which are disturbing the pleasant hours of his well-earned rest.

It is not long before he recognises in those agonised cries the voice of Beetle, his daughter's favourite cat. As the cause of all this commotion is invisible, most men would have contented themselves with throwing a boot into the bushes and, having called down a few maledictions on the head of the unfortunate creature, would have crept back into bed.

The dean, however, had not left his warm couch for nothing, and he does not intend to get back again until the cause of his disturbance has been removed. He is fully conscious of the fact that such an exceedingly well-behaved cat as Beetle would never be making all that noise unless she had some very good and excellent reason, and he therefore peers about in all directions to discover where she may be hidden, and, if possible, the circumstances which are converting the serene old tabby into a public nuisance.

It was not long before he had solved the problem. At the farther end of the shrubbery, half-hidden behind a clump of lilacs, there is a straw-thatched summer-house, and through the mullioned window he can, by standing on tip-toe and straining his neck, just make out the outline of a boy in a red and white blazer and a straw hat.

"Ha, ha!" he mutters to himself; "the bishop's boy again! Wait a minute, my young friend; wait a minute!"

In a second he is slipping on his trousers, and there is a gleam of satisfaction in his eye, which can hardly be accounted for merely by the pleasure of getting up in the early hours of the morning to punish an erring schoolboy.

This is by no means the first time that he has discovered the bishop's boy climbing over that green fence for the sake of victimising Beetle. On three occasions he has remonstrated with his lordship, and each time he has been snubbed—once in the presence of all the Chapter.

The bishop had raised his hands in pious horror. One of his boys treating an animal cruelly! The idea was preposterous. The dean must be mistaken. The dean ventured to maintain that he knew what he was talking about, and the bishop had retorted that such a suggestion amounted to a personal rebuke for not having brought up his children as they ought to have been brought up.

The bishop was rather a quick-tempered man, and, annoyed at what he considered unwarrantable interference on the part of the dean, he had even gone so far as to hint that before preaching to other fathers about the management of their children, it would perhaps be just as well if he turned his attention to his own home. A smile had gone round the Chapter-room at this sally, for the dean's daughter had a reputation in the neighbourhood for being a desperate flirt, and for having broken the hearts of all the curates attached to the cathedral.

This accounted for the lines of exultation which hovered round the dean's stern mouth as he put on his shoes and then unhooked the strap from the wall, which hung there for the sole purpose of putting a keen edge on his razor.

"I'll make that boy's sitting-places an abhorrence to him," he chortles to himself. "I will brand him this time, and the bishop shall see the marks and apologise. I will take down his lordship's pride in these boys who spend their holidays breaking down my fences, robbing my fruit trees, plundering my garden, and teasing my daughter's cat. They may be the sons of the bishop, but they're worse than the village boys," and the circles on the dean's face grow larger as he pushes open his bedroom door and slips noiselessly down the stairs.

The grass is soaking wet, and his bedroom slippers are not waterproof, but in the excitement of the chase the dean prefers to run the risk of rheumatism to the chance of warning the boy of his approach by walking on the gravel.

He dodges mysteriously from tree to tree and from shrub to shrub, occasionally standing still or crouching down to listen intently, and all the time caressing the strap with a loving hand. Finally he disappears into the bushes, breaking thousands of fairy barriers, woven in silver gossamer from leaf to leaf, and bringing down a whole shower of dewdrops in his path.

As he does so a disinterested spectator might have noticed a small boy with a very scared face, in a red and white blazer and a straw hat, hastily clambering over the green paling into the bishop's garden.

At last the dean arrives at the door of the summer-house, soaked to the skin, and shivering with the cold, and as he creeps in with a self-satisfied chuckle he finds himself face to face with Beetle, tied hand and foot, and lying on her side.

"Confound it," he says, "the boy has gone after all. Oh! if I had only caught him," and the strap swishes through the air and whistles threateningly.

In the meantime there is nothing for it but to release the poor cat, which had apparently been playing the part of prisoner in some wild Indian game, and judging from her scared appearance, was momentarily expecting to be scalped, and having done this to let himself into the house again, and dawdle over his dressing until the breakfast bell rings.

The breakfast-room at the Deanery is quite the most charming in the house, and its broad windows, with the deep cushioned seats, look out over the same expanse of lawn and pasture-land as the dean's bedroom. In the morning it gets the full benefit of all the sunshine, and more than once on Christmas Day the dean has sat with his back to the open window while his daughter has poured out his coffee from behind the great hissing silver urn.

The door opens, and Lilian comes in, dressed in her riding habit.

This morning he is down first, which is hardly surprising, as for the last hour he has been doing nothing but wait for the sound of the gong. He stands for a few minutes watching the gardener sharpening his scythe with long musical sweeps of the rubber, and then he turns and carelessly takes up a pile of letters. The first four are addressed to his daughter, they are bulky and bilious, and the last is in the well-known handwriting of an old college friend.

He tears open the seal with unusual eagerness, and takes a hasty glance at the letter before he sits down at the table to read it carefully. Evidently it gives him satisfaction.

It has long been his secret and cherished wish that his daughter should marry the only son of this old friend of his boyhood days, although the two young people have never seen one another. At last he found courage to broach this delicate subject to his friend, and the answer is that Captain Fairley will be most charmed to accept the dean's kind invitation and to spend a week with his father's friend, of whom he has heard so much. There is a postscript, however, which for a moment threatens to bring out those red circles under the dean's eyes.

Captain Fairley wants to know if he may bring his terrier with him. He has heard of Lilian's attachment to her cat, and therefore he is all the more confident that his friendship for his dog will be appreciated by the dean. The two are never out of one another's sight for long.

The dean passes his hand across his forehead with a gesture of impatience and annoyance. He foresees that it is more than possible that all his carefully-laid plans may be frustrated by this innocent request which he cannot very well refuse.

"It's enough to turn Lilian against the man right away," he thinks. "There will be a fight between those two pets as sure as I am sitting here, and if Beetle is hurt, the child will never forgive me or Captain Fairley either. However, I suppose it can't be helped. I must warn her—no, on second thoughts, I don't think I will. It will be wisest to abstain from any reference to such an unpleasant subject. Ah, here she comes."

As he speaks the door opens, and Lilian comes in, dressed in her riding habit, and with a black straw hat tilted jauntily on the back of her head. She runs across the room and entwines her arms lovingly round his neck. She is a daughter of whom any father might be proud, and the dean may be pardoned for holding her at arms' length and gazing at her for fully a minute with a passionate admiration before he releases her.

Her hair is brown and wavy, her features small and regular, and when at rest they have a demure way of looking serious and motherly. It is only when she smiles, which she does at the smallest provocation, that her large grey eyes light up with roguish merriment, and she looks the very incarnation of the mischievous beauty which she is.

The morning greeting over, Lilian takes her place at the head of the table, and, all unconscious of the little conspiracy which her father's active brain has been concocting, she busies herself in the most matter-of-fact way with the cups and saucers.

Beetle sits herself on a high-backed chair by the side of her young mistress, and smacks her lips as she watches the cream poured out. She seems sublimely indifferent to the perils through which she has passed that morning, or else she is sharing the dean's anxiety that Lilian may be spared the pain of hearing anything about the discreditable adventure.

The dean is a man of immense tact, he is anxious to tell Lilian of to-morrow's visitor, and at the same time to avoid the slightest chance of her suspicions being aroused, or even put on the alert. He is perfectly aware of the fact that he has only to let her suppose that Captain Fairley is coming down with the intention of winning her affections, to remove the remotest chance of the ultimate union between them, which at this moment is the dearest project of his heart. If there is one thing to bring a high-spirited girl to open rebellion it is having a lover thrust upon her.

"Lilian, my dear," he says at last, laying down the paper and drawing his coffee a little nearer to him, "I hear this morning that the son of a very dear friend is coming down here to-morrow for a few days on—er—on business, my dear."

"On business, papa?"

The dean is a little ruffled at her tone of absolute incredulity.

"My dear," he says, "please don't emphasise your words in that way as if you considered it ridiculously impossible for your father to have such weighty matters as business to attend to."

"Is he good-looking, papa?" Lilian asks, slyly turning the subject.

The dean sees his opportunity, and does not hesitate to make full use of it.

"There you go at once," he exclaims, and then stops with well-feigned embarrassment, while Lilian raises her eyebrows in surprise.

"Little one," he goes on, after a moment's pause, during which he determines on a bold policy, "little one, you won't be angry with your father if he warns you against the dangers of flirting, especially with men like Captain Fairley. For all I know he may be engaged; a popular man like that is sure to be, and I would not have you losing your heart to him. If I were you I should see as little of him alone as you can. You understand, my dear, let your position as hostess be clearly understood."

The dean watches his daughter's face closely, and notes with much inward satisfaction that the bait has been swallowed. Woman-like, Lilian's interest and curiosity have been aroused, and she is secretly determining to make the most of the captain during his short visit, and exulting in the thought of meeting someone really worthy of her arts.

* * * * * *

Captain Fairley has not been in the house many hours before the dean has the gratification of finding that the two young people get on most admirably together, and especially when he is out of the room or pretending to be deeply engrossed in sermon-writing, which is always a good sign.

Only one thing now remains to make him the happiest man on earth, and that is one more opportunity for wiping off his old score with the bishop. He is more annoyed than he likes to confess at having been led on that wild goose chase after the boy in the red and white blazer, and the deliberate way in which the bishop has ridiculed his charges still rankles very bitterly with him.

He has taken to waking up at all sorts of unearthly hours in the morning, and lying in wait at his bedroom window in the hopes of once more catching that little rascal in the garden, and he is quite sure that he shan't escape a second time. Ah! to take that saintly boy by the wrist and lead him round to the palace would be very sweet. The bishop would have to apologise, and that would be even sweeter.

However, just for a few days he would be glad if even this happiness might be withheld. His conscience tells him that the bishop's sarcastic suggestion that he should look to his own home would have a special significance now, and much of the polish would be taken off the score if the bishop, after confessing that his faith in his own parental training had been shaken, could turn round and accuse the dean of actually encouraging his daughter in her forward ways, and even of importing a young man into the house for the purpose of carrying her off.

The dean is, if the truth be known, rather ashamed at having done so himself, and the bishop's taunt, if he guessed the truth, would be very bitter.

He takes the precaution of hinting to the bishop and his clergy, that Captain Fairley has come down on matters solely connected with business, and he determines that, whatever happens, they shall have no opportunity for guessing the truth.

On the last day of the captain's visit he has invited half the county to dinner to meet the bishop, and on the previous evening he follows Lilian to her bedroom, a very unusual occurrence.

Having played the part of a social hypocrite before, he has to stoop to mask himself again, and after gently reproving Lilian for the evident attachment which has sprung up between her and the captain in spite of his warning, he goes on to guard her against giving her guests the smallest opportunity for even guessing at the true state of affairs. He points out that until the captain has made a definite proposal, he would not for all the world have their names connected together, and Lilian promises to be on her very best behaviour.

Truth to tell the captain has fallen head over ears in love with the dean's daughter; he is fascinated by her beauty, enchanted by her vivacious manner.

Until his first appearance in the Deanery drawing-room, he had not the least idea why his father insisted upon his paying this visit to the dean, whom he knew little more than by sight; but when the truth dawned upon him that he had been sent down to this provincial town for the sake of marrying a certain young lady, he is not in the least disposed, for once in a way, to quarrel with the governor, especially as there are several bills which have shortly to be met with ready money, which, at present, is to be found only in his father's pockets.

There is one thing, however, which threatens to ruin his visit and to frustrate his father's purpose, and that is Lilian's affection for her cat. To begin with, he is madly jealous of the beast which comes in for all those caresses, and in the second place every opportunity which has presented itself for a comfortable tête-à-tête has been completely ruined by that confounded cat.

It is impossible to make love to a young lady who will insist on talking about her pets instead of about her lover or herself. It was Beetle this, and Beetle that, and Beetle everywhere, until the captain was thoroughly exasperated.

She finds herself face to face with Captain Fairley.

One evening he even plucked up courage to remonstrate at having to take a second place in the girl's affections, and declared his jealousy of the cat with all the eloquence he could command.

This was when Beetle had her soft paws round her mistress' neck, and the occasion seemed specially appropriate. To his intense surprise and disgust he had been politely called a donkey for his pains. After this he had done nothing but wish Beetle dead and buried. In his anger he muttered something about setting his dog at the wretched tabby, and unfortunately Lilian had overheard him.

Of course he only meant it in fun, but he confessed afterwards that the next hour or two were the warmest he had ever spent in his life, and that facing the fire of a whole Russian regiment was absolutely child's play in comparison.

After that he saw it would be impossible to close the career of that chaperonic cat, however stealthily he did it, for suspicion was sure to fall eventually on himself or his dog, and his own ends would be frustrated.

As for Lilian, her one and only objection to Captain Fairley was his friendship for that horrid little terrier, which in the first place she considered it great impertinence for him to have brought into the house at all. Its one delight seemed to be to chase Beetle, and the tabby was by no means used to making sport for dogs.

Miss Hillyard was every bit as much jealous of the dog as the captain was of the cat. She thought it ridiculous to try and make love to a man who could think of nothing but a stupid terrier.

As a matter of fact Captain Fairley had no idea what a fuss he made over his pet. It was so natural for him that the little fellow should occupy the warmest corner in his heart that he never considered the question at all.

To his mind it was quite impossible to think of a more engrossing topic of conversation, whereas Lilian, very naturally, looked at the matter from a different point.

On three distinct occasions she had shut Beetle up in her bedroom, because it seemed to her that there were times when two were company and three none, even if the third party was a cat, and each time, instead of a tête-à-tête which she had sacrificed so much for, that disgusting little terrier had turned up and done nothing else but jump on and off his master's knee and demand her admiration. She was a lover of animals, but she learnt to hate that terrier with a deadly hate.

At last the day comes which is to end the captain's visit to the Deanery. It is very unfortunate for all parties concerned that so many people are coming to dinner on this, of all days, but it is a matter of long standing, and there is no way of postponing it.

The captain is conscious that his hour has come. It is now or never so far as declaring his intentions is concerned. However, the morning was spoilt by the presence of Beetle, and the whole afternoon Lilian made herself disagreeable on account of the terrier.

They have had five o'clock tea with the dean, and in an hour's time some of the guests will begin to arrive. Lilian goes off to dress without a word to Captain Fairley. He sees that his only chance is to follow her example, and by dressing early he may have an opportunity of getting one last word alone with her.

Lilian is the first down. She has not seen Beetle since tea time, and she goes out into the garden to look for her. It is a beautiful evening, but the heat is almost oppressive and the air is heavily scented with the perfume of flowers and newly-cut hay.

She has an idea that the captain will be coming out to look for her in a minute, and she is glad. As she reaches the shrubbery she hears a faint noise behind her, and turning round she sees the captain's terrier coming across the smooth, velvety lawn, and in another moment she expects to hear his master's footsteps. However, nothing comes.

Then a sudden idea enters her head. The terrier has been delivered into her hands. She will shut it up in that old oak chest in the summer-house until after dinner. It will be out of the way then if the captain does—"yes, quite so." And smiling to herself she takes the little fellow up in her arms and disappears through the bushes.

In the meantime Captain Fairley has come down to look for Lilian, and not meeting her in the drawing-room he goes out by the back way, expecting to find her in the green-house tending the flowers. However, she is not there, and he strolls through the kitchen-garden and enters the shrubbery from the other side, intending to collect his tennis things from the summer-house.

Presently he becomes conscious of a soft pitter-patter behind him, and turns round to find Beetle rubbing herself against his legs. The captain is a man of the world. He knows Lilian is probably near, and he takes the cat up with an extravagant show of affection, and lathers it with all the endearing terms he can conjure up. In this way he reaches the summer-house, and finds, rather to his surprise, that the girl is not there after all.

A malicious gleam lights up his face. By a merciful dispensation of Providence the cat is at his mercy. He listens intently and can hear no one. What a glorious opportunity. It does not take him a minute to lift up the lid of that great oak chest and to drop that cat in.

"There, Mrs. Tabby," he says, with a savage chuckle. "That will do very nicely for you until after dinner. Perhaps now I shall have an opportunity of making love to your mistress without getting sworn at by you, and scratched."

He had hardly said these words when he hears the creepers outside rustling. Someone is coming. If the cat mews he is undone, and in a desperate plight he jumps into the cupboard where the tennis things are kept, and crouches down with his eye to the keyhole.

He is not surprised to see Lilian come in. But what in the world is she doing with his dog under her arm? He is simply breathless with amazement, and presses closer and closer to the cupboard door.

In the meantime Lilian's conscience is pricking her, and as she puts one foot in the summer-house she is seized with a sudden fear, and her terrified imagination can distinctly hear the captain coming after her across the lawn. In a moment she has banged the door, and stands quite still listening.

Then she opens the lid of the chest, drops the dog in, and—finds herself face to face with Captain Fairley.

She has not time to faint, or even to scream, for she is petrified by the terrific shrieks of agony which are coming from that box. There is no mistaking Beetle's voice.

In a moment she has thrown the lid open again, and is down on her knees by the side of the chest; but the captain, his face pale with agitation, pulls her back.

"For heaven's sake, don't put your hand in!" he cried. "The dog will bite you all to pieces!"

They peer into the chest together; but it is so dark that they see nothing but four round balls of fire and flying fur. Never was there such a terrible fight between a dog and cat.

Lilian is frightened out of her life, but there is no time for explanations.

"Oh, Beetle, Beetle!" she cries; "the dog is killing her! Oh, save her, captain! save her!"

The captain is perfectly aware that the dog would just as soon bite him as the cat, now that his blood is up, but there is nothing for it but to dive down and catch hold of the first thing his hands light on. This happens to be Beetle's tail, and he drags her out with the dog hanging on to her fur.

Lilian, with a cry of pain, rushes forward and seizes her darling, while the wretched captain does what he can to disentangle the terrier, and now that he has time to think, he swiftly arrives at the conclusion that he is master of the situation.

Presently the two combatants are divided, and while Lilian binds up her cat in one corner of the summer-house, the captain attends to his dog's bleeding ears in the other.

There follows a few minutes' silence, broken only by the terrier's frantic barks and Lilian's sobs, while the cat swears terribly.

At last Lillian looks up through her tears.

"You brute," she says.

The captain feels his temper rise at this, but he takes rather a mean advantage of the girl.

"I thought you were so fond of your cat," he remarks, with a sneer.

"So I am," says Lilian indignantly. "What do you mean?"

"Oh, nothing. I was only rather surprised at your setting my dog at her in that inhuman way. We do not generally throw dogs on to the top of cats we care for particularly."

"I didn't throw him on the top of her," Lilian cries. "You put her there, you nasty mean, sneaking fellow. What do you mean by touching my cat?"

"My dear Lilian, or—I—I mean Miss Hillyard—how can you talk such nonsense? If it comes to that, what do you mean by throwing my dog into that great chest? I suppose you knew it was the only thing in the world I love, and thought you would leave it there to die."

"You put my cat in first," Lilian retorts with a sob, and then the whole thing seems so ridiculous that she cannot help laughing, and the captain laughs, too.

After a time, as these things will, it comes out that it was only their love for one another that leads them to this ridiculous climax, and in making this delightful discovery they grow so emphatic and demonstrative that the dog and cat get loose and have another go at one another amidst the most terrific yells.

"I say, we had better get out of this," says the captain, when the combatants are once more separated. "It must be getting late."

He picks up the terrier under his arm and gropes his way towards the door, for the window is so overgrown with ivy that it is growing dark in there.

Suddenly he turns round with an exclamation of horror.

"My dear Lilian, what have you done to the handle?"

Lilian runs forward, and they find that in slamming the door, she has jarred the handle off inside, and the iron joint has fallen to the ground outside.

"Wait a minute and I will get my knife," Captain Fairley says, and then he finds that in dressing he has left it in his bedroom.

He tries to break the door open by force, but it is made of solid iron-bound oak in imitation of a church door, and all his weight makes no impression whatever. Then they try shouting, but no one appears.

There is nothing for it but to make the best of a very bad job and wait until someone comes to the rescue.

"It won't be very nice to be found out here together by the servants, will it?" Lilian suggests, and the captain agrees with her.

"We may be here all night," he says, "if they don't hear us. But, by Jove, they must be deaf if they don't hear this infernal din."

At the thought of this last catastrophe Lilian bursts into tears again, and the captain feels that it is his duty to comfort her. He suggests that they shall tie the dog in one corner with a handkerchief, and the cat in the other. They won't be so hampered in that way, and in another minute the lovers are so engrossed that they forget all about the dinner party, and everything else in the world but their love.

* * * * *

The dean is rather late with his dressing, and once or twice he fancies that he hears strange sounds at the other end of the garden, but as the summer-house door and his window are both shut, nothing very distinct reaches his ear, and he rather fancies it must be some drunken men in the town.

He hears the bishop's voice downstairs, and one by one all his guests arrive. He fondly imagines that Lilian is entertaining them, and he does not hurry.

At last his white tie is finished, and he opens his bedroom window, and looks out across the park. At this moment Beetle and the terrier have just got at one another for the second time, and in an instant the dean recognises the cat's voice.

"Ha," he cries, dancing with delight, "the bishop's boy again. At last! At last I am avenged."

The butler is rather surprised to see his master coming down the stairs three steps at a time, and the dean so excited that he scarcely stops to shake hands with all his astonished guests before he buttonholes the bishop.

"Come, my lord," he says with a glance of triumph and a voice loud enough to be overheard by many of the clergy standing round, "I want you to come into the garden for a minute and I will show you something which you would never believe unless you saw it with your own eyes. I want to show you the result of a father bringing up his children with boundless confidence in himself and in them, and also to impress upon you a fact which you are slow to believe—I mean that a man who brings up his family in what he considers the right way and does not take the trouble to watch them closely is a foolish man. Of course, I am aware that it is more difficult to make you believe this as you are the father of such a saintly set of children, but—" and the dean, with a smile to the assembled company, leads the way through the French window followed by the greater number of his guests.

His delight, as he hears the cat still screaming, is almost too much for him, and as they reach the summer-house he catches the sound of half-inaudible voices. The boys are trapped this time and no mistake. How foolish the bishop will look.

He picks up the handle which has fallen to the ground, fits it in very quietly, and then opening the door, stands back to make way for the bishop.

His cup of joy is full, when a titter runs round that interested group of guests, but he is hardly prepared to hear the bishop give an embarrassed little cough, and then join with the others in a covert smile. He looks in himself and sees Lilian and the captain standing hand in hand, while a wounded cat is mewing in one corner, and a bloodstained terrier in the other.

"I was not aware that such sports went on so near to the cathedral, Mr. Hillyard," the bishop says with grave disapproval as he sees the poor cat and dog for the first time.

And then he turns round and walks towards the house, followed by the rest of the guests, and leaving the unfortunate dean to collect his thoughts as best he can.

"I SCARCELY think you could get an interview from him, on any condition whatever," continued Mr. Joseph Harvey, editor of the Empire Monthly, leaning back in his chair. "We have frequently asked him to print something of his inner life, the methods of his work, and so on, but he always slips out of the calculations somehow, and the result is that while we have a hundred letters every month asking us to print something about the personality of the man who has the whole literary world trailing after him by the writing of one book, we can furnish nothing to satisfy the appetite of our readers."

Harvey sighed.

It was a girl that answered:

"But you see I don't intend to go about it like the official interviewer. He has just gone down to his new farm in Cornwall, and there they say he is as natural as the trees on his land, and as easily approached. Why not let me write the article after a few weeks of association right on the spot—his next-door neighbour, as it were? I can lodge at one of the neighbouring houses, on the pretence that I am there for the good of my health. Then I can watch him performing his daily tasks. All the while I can, by feigning a natural interest in agricultural affairs, get down to the bottom of his nature. Perhaps he will—yes, he cannot help branching out into what is his real interest in life. Doesn't that seem like a plan that will succeed, Mr. Harvey?"

"You don't know the man, Miss Tippin, he'll know your mission the first time he sets eyes on you, and he'll shut up like an oyster. But," he continued, "if you can get a truthful insight into his nature we will handle the article with much pleasure. It must be truth, though."

And Miss Tippin said, "All right," and left.

"Are you the boy that was to meet Miss Tippin at the station?" said that young lady, addressing a shabbily dressed urchin, who seemed to be looking for some one.

"Yes, ma'am," he answered. "Are you the lady?" he inquired shyly. Explanations followed, and soon the two were off down the dusty road, in a one-horse cart, the trunk and small luggage behind, and Miss Tippin holding her parasol over the boy, who held the reins.

"And you say your farm is next to that of Mr. Arthur Fairfax?" said Miss Tippin affably. (Arthur Fairfax was the celebrity she was trying to get at.)

"Yes, ma'am," said the boy, relapsing into silence.

"What does he do?"

"Oh, just farms, I s'pose. There ain't nothing else to do here." Then the boy turned and looked at Miss Tippin. "But he only come last month"

Miss Tippin smiled. So Fairfax was posing purely as a farmer! So much the better. She could pose as one with much interest in the same pursuit herself. She thought it best not to talk too much about the celebrity, for the boy had looked questioningly at her, and she knew he had a notion to ask her if she knew the man. Too much interest might arouse suspicion, and Fairfax might get to hear of it. So she talked commonplaces with the boy till they arrived at the little cottage where she was to make her headquarters while reconnoitring and taking the measurement of greatness.

The next morning Miss Tippin awoke with the songs of birds tickling her ears. It had rained during the night, and the cool breath of June filled the heart of the valley with jubilation. The perfume of some strange sweet blossom drifted in the window, and the sun danced like diamond gems in the rain drops that hung to the lobes of the leaves.

Miss Tippin was not the sort of girl to let nature run away with her real mission, however. She kept a keen look out for the celebrity as she busied herself exploring the place. She ventured out far into an adjoining meadow, edged with a little wood, and curiously pryed into spaces the hawthorn had not crowded into, and looked over the bank of a babbling brook, in the hope of catching the great man in one of his wandering moods, gazing up at the sky, thrilled at the birds, or talking back to the saucy brooklet.

She had given up her search for the morning. Returning home, she was just a trifle cross with herself, and the celebrity. Now, if there is one thing a cross girl ought not to meet, it is a five-barred gate. And that is just what Miss Tippin did meet. It stood up before her, bold and impregnable, as she emerged from the little woodland, and no hole to crawl through!

Beyond was an open field. The brambles and hawthorn branches extended up and even over the gate on the side from which she was to make the attack.

"Bother it!" blurted out Kitty Tippin.

She looked out over the field. She saw no person. Then she climbed up the gate, carefully gathering her skirts, and made the half-slide, half-leap that girls use when getting down from a gate. Not a trifle of her skirt caught.

But as she started to walk the first step, her head was jolted backward, and she felt a tug at her hair. One of the bramble twigs had caught her.

She put her hand up to loosen it.

There stood the celebrity!

Not out in the field, where she had looked, but quite close to her.

He was looking at her quizzically. Kitty Tippin felt somewhat confused. One hand she raised desperately to release her hair from the bramble, but every effort seemed only to make the tangle the tighter.

The celebrity seemed to comprehend the trouble.

"Pardon, Miss; can I be of assistance?" He advanced. Kitty had to smile. He had a hoe in one hand and his hat in the other. The soil clung to his shoes in great chunks every step he took.

"Do you own this farm?" asked the girl, evading the first question.

"I hate to acknowledge that I own the brambles," said the celebrity.

"But you do?" persisted the girl, standing erect, with one loop of golden-red hair drawn out and twisted about the impertinent bramble twig. It was one way of making sure that she had caught the genius.

"Well, I'm the landowner, and the labourer, and the water boy, and several other personages all in one. But may I not untangle the briar?"

"Before I give you that honour, promise me that you will clear away the brambles before I come down this way again."

"Trespassers don't, as a usual thing, demand that a path be cut through farms they want to tramp over——"

"And also I want you to promise that you will build a stile at this crossing-place," continued the girl, never noticing the interruption.

"And I'll root up a row of corn from this place right to the other end of the field, so that the stalks won't worry you later on in the season," he added, and the girl saw that he was facing about in his tactics.

"But do you promise?"

The celebrity hesitated.

"Then I hang here for an eternity," said the girl, "for you would release me only to set the trap again the next time I wish to climb that gate."

"I promise." He said this solemnly, and stuck the hoe into the soft soil. Then he wiped his hands on his trousers, and soon had the lock of hair free.

"Thank you," said the girl quietly. "Men never like their deeds of honour to go unnoticed, and that you may know who remembers yours——" She handed him her card, and he looked at it with a smile.

"Sorry I haven't any card," he said. The hard-used hands went deep into the muddy trousers, with yellow finger-marks on them.

"Oh, it doesn't matter much. I know you are too gallant to be the labourer, and I have heard of the genius who owns the land—and the brambles."

"The genius?"

"Yes, isn't that what they call them?".

"Well, I've been called about everything else since I came down here to farm, so I expect I can stand that too."

He laughed, half to himself; so merrily to himself that she thought him slightly impolite. But celebrities always are. She turned to go. He started too.

"Don't neglect the farming, pray, and the brambles," with an upraised hand to stay him.

"But—" and he made a couple of steps forward.

"Finish the row, that's more important."

"I just finished a row."

"And were just beginning another," and she hurried over the soft field, the man standing like the official dummy in front of a marked-down clothing house.

He looked at the brambles. One branch he eyed curiously for a moment, then drew from the leaves a long, golden-red hair.

The bramble he chopped down with his hoe, and threw away. But men never throw away golden-red hair.

* * * * *

The evening after meeting the celebrity, whom we must now refer to as Kitty Tippin referred to him—as Mr. Arthur Fairfax—the girl wrote a short letter to the editor of the Empire Monthly, telling him that she had fortunately met the genius under most favourable circumstances, and that she would immediately start to take down his theories on corn-planting; his snappy briefs on nature; his love of yellow mud; his deftness in getting people out of difficulties in real life, as well as in his books; his laughing blue eyes, with as many shades to them as hours in the day; his laws concerning trespassers on his premises; his capacity for doing everything at the same time; his occasional bursts of brusqueness that almost disarmed confidence in his claim to gentility, and his apparent youth, notwithstanding the seasoning of his wisdom. All of which mightily pleased the editor of the Empire Monthly. So he wrote back to "enter into the details of Fairfax's life, no matter if there is a great deal of yellow corn mixed in."

Then Kitty Tippin felt that she had a real start. She had met the celebrity, had evidently made impression enough upon him to interest him as much as his corn-field, which he had asked to leave for her sake, and had received authority from the Empire Monthly to find out all about his crops and his hair and his eyes, and to jot it down and give it to the world in burning lines of truth.

It was pleasant work, this detective authorship, too, and Kitty Tippin went about it with a smile in her heart and an air of confidence. All of which she was justly entitled to, under the circumstances, seeing that she was solving her problems according to the schedule.

For three weeks Mr. Arthur Fairfax kept giving up his secrets to Miss Kitty Tippin. The girl found the celebrity very much like other men—sometimes she thought he was considerably finer than some grades of mankind—and he sifted through the sieve of her ideal exactions without a second's coaxing: again, she discovered lumps in his nature, and when the gold had drained off she saw the dross in his heart. Then she changed her mind about celebrities.

But more often she changed the measure of her sieve, and let the hints of the mud that were in the man pass through without close investigation.

Now, when a man finds himself looking in a mirror in order to get extra glimpses of a girl turned from him, he can safely put it down that he is in love. And so with a girl. When she finds herself measuring with undue nicety the faults and frailties of a man, she, too, is in danger of finding that the gold is heavier than the clay. For all women are kind.

This is just the situation in which Kitty Tippin found herself. She did not know it though. As her work upon the biographical sketch progressed, however, she noticed that the fourth chapter had considerably more of the spirit of forgiveness for the faults of Mr. Fairfax than had the third chapter. This was an alarming symptom. But not for the girl. She thought it only a proof that she was learning more of the celebrity, who, in truth, had some symptoms himself, by this time, that he was not acquainted with. He noticed that he had more than unusual interest in the portion of the fence where he had cut down the brambles. He cleared away the weeds and the high grass. He built a three-step stile there, and always felt that he needed a rest when he got to the end of that row near that stile.

"I suppose it's because it's the only thing to sit down on," he said to himself one day. But what made him so furious when a crow on a dead limb not far away echoed peevishly: "Caw, caw"?

"You black fool!" he muttered. But crows are wise birds. They knew the stile had not been put up there for a scarecrow, even if it was on the edge of the cornfield.

When Kitty saw that stile and that tidy hedgerow, she had more clearly defined symptoms!

* * * * *

A week later the girl had sent off the article which she had worked upon through the pleasant month of June to the editor of the Empire Monthly. She felt that she had a "scoop" of decided value, and wrote as much to the editor. She might have taken it personally to the Empire Monthly, but she had a strong fancy that a "rose social" which was to be given at the neighbouring church two evenings later could not get along without her. The celebrity had said that same thing.

A week later the "rose social" was only a memory—but it had left a fragrance in Kitty Tippin's heart, She was sitting in the doorway of the cottage, thinking how only a celebrity could have framed the pretty phrase with which he had told her his love "closed the rose social," as he had said, "with the taming of his wild rose and the kiss of the rosebud lips."

It was a very sweet memory, that warm, dark night, with the mild odour of green things on the wayside and the music of his words, and Kitty put her face to the cluster of roses that hung by the doorway of the cottage and closed her eyes on the sweetness.

She was aroused by footsteps—pattering feet—and the boy who had driven her to the cottage from the station, and who was now her devoted servant, came up the pathway with a letter.

It was from the editor of the Empire Monthly, and it read:

> "What kind of nonsense are you sending us? We deem it possible that you were 'really in need of better health when you went to spy on the celebrity.' Mr. Arthur Fairfax has been in this office every day for the last month. In fact, he arrived before my letter could have reached you, and he had not been on his farm for a week before that time. We can't use the sketch, because, while Mr. Fairfax has a farm, he says he didn't plant a cabbage or a grain of corn. He knows nothing about building stiles, and your description of his personal appearance would be about as true as the biography of a polar bear sent in to throw light on the 'Personal Side of the Egyptian Sphinx.' You might dispose of this thing to one of the fiction magazines."

Kitty Tippin gasped. Fainting was not one of her accomplishments. After a long, dumb look she turned to the boy.

"Who owns this cornfield next to your farm?" she asked.

"Do you mean the one you go through so often?" said the boy.

"Well, y-e-s."

"Mr. Brighton owns that. He bought it this spring, you know, from Widow Brown. She's dead now That's her new grave up there at——"

"And what does Mr. Brighton do? I mean what did he do?"

"I don't know, miss. They said he was one of the high-up fellows in London, and that he got sick of all the fuss and just come here to live awhile. He must have money, though, for he has got good horses, and he isn't stingy. The fellows went to him one day, and— "

"But didn't you tell me that Mr. Arthur Fairfax lived on a farm next to yours? Don't you remember? You told me that coming in the cart from the station?"

"Yes, ma'am, but he's over here on the other side of our farm. The folks say he can't grow nothing. His farm begins just down over the hill, there."

"On the other side?" and the girl leapt to her feet. A moment later the boy heard her racing up the stairs and slamming the door of her room. He thought he heard sobs.

The editor of the Empire Monthly two days' later received a very short note from Kitty Tippin, declaring that "a very peculiar chain of circumstances over which she had had no control had led her into the unpardonable blunder," asking at the same time that "mercy be granted, as she had granted mercy to the villain who had been the cause of the mistake." In the autumn, however—in blushing October—the editor received another letter, and when he had opened the double envelopes, a card dropped out. He fished forth a stylish invitation, announcing that "Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Tippin requested his presence at the marriage of their daughter Katherine Gertrude, to Henry Watterson Brighton, at——"

The editor of the Empire Monthly was one of the prominent guests at the wedding. After the bride's cake had been cut, and Mrs. and Mr. Brighton had made their escape amid a shower of shoes and rice, the complacent editor told one of the best stories the smart set had added to its list in the season. He told it when Kitty's mother was not within hearing, and the guests had to lie to that lady when she innocently inquired about the cause of all the merriment.

"I say, Harvey, that story's worth keeping in the official roster," said one of the men to the editor. "What name shall we give it for reference purposes?"

"Let's see," said the editor, scratching his head Oh, yes, it wasn't printed, but here's a fine climax for the final chapter to-night. I think we'll call it 'Kitty Tippin's Scoop.'"

IN CONFIDENCE.

Conducted by MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

"Another Woman" sends me a very nice letter and asks my qualification to give advice that may make or mar a life.———In reply I can only say that I have no qualification but my own sympathy with my correspondents and desire to help them with their love affairs. I cannot claim infallible wisdom, but I can tell them how I should act were I in their place, which they can adopt or reject according to their own personal feelings. Nobody can really advise a lover by cold calculation. One must just feel as they feel, and tell them such truths as perhaps, in the blindness of love, they have overlooked. In the long run, of course, love laughs at love experts, no less than locksmiths, and I daresay I shall come in for a certain amount of the merriment. But reasoning is to love what a signpost is to the traveller. It tells him were certain roads lead, but which he takes is his own affair I simply try, out of my own reasoning, to be a signpost, with sympathies.

"Difficulty" (aged twenty) is attached to a lady five years older than himself. He earns 25s. a week, with the prospect of double in three or four years' time. She earns £2 a week, but supports her widowed mother and family from it. Should he start courting her now, and if so, how?———I am sorry to have to be a horrid signpost in answering you. You will not be in a position to marry for three or four years. That would not be so unfortunate under other circumstances, but seeing that your friend is in business, and that several lives are dependent on her efforts I fear you would be doing ill in entertaining any ideas of marriage. In the first instance, your wife would have to throw up her business engagement, or neglect your household. If she did the former, the responsibility for her helpless relations must fall on you, which you could ill afford. There is no harm, however, in telling the girl the facts of the case; if she is willing to have a long courtship, well and good, though, at the same time, I should not advise it. And if she continued in business, you would have rather a rough time of it at home. A woman cannot work all day, and then turn to household duties without serious danger to her health, to say nothing of her happiness. Unless your business prospects look up very considerably within the next few years, I fear you would be encountering great trouble for both yourself and the girl by marriage under present circumstances.

You want to know of a wash or lotion for darkening fair hair, "Snowdrop," and yet keeping it glossy. Well, I am afraid unless you can afford to go to a first-rate hairdresser from time to time you will find it practically impossible. Hair dyes which are sold to the public are almost invariably worthless, and it needs a skilled hand to insure keeping the gloss on it. Why dye it at all? Fair hair is so pretty. Write to me as often as you like, and ask as many questions as you please. I shall always be glad to help you. Thanks for good wishes.

Now, "Dick," if you think for a minute, you will see that it is just a little selfish on your part to expect your sister to sew things for you and help you to attend to your goldfish and rabbits, and yet object when she asks you to make her house duties a trifle easier for her by keeping your room a little more tidy. My impression is that many boys and young fellows lose a great deal of pleasure in life by not treating their sisters in a brotherly way. They say "she is only a girl," as though that settled it; but you take my advice and treat your sister as your equal—she is your equal, though you may not like to acknowledge it—and you will be surprised to find how jolly it will be.

Of course, "Harry," young men have love troubles as well as young ladies, and your letter is just as welcome as from one of the opposite sex. You are desperately in love with a young woman, who is a little higher in the social scale than yourself, and on that account you feel that you cannot venture to tell her of your esteem for her. Yet you think that she has a similar feeling for you. You are making efforts to rise in the world and have reason to think that you will succeed. Well, you know that "faint heart never won fair lady," if you are backward in declaring yourself, the probability is that you will lose her. So "take your courage in both hands," as they say on the Continent, and tell her that you love her and of your prospects and plans for the future. I shall be surprised if you do not win her.

"M. W. B." was once a groom but is now a publican with means When a groom a young lady he walked out with disdained his suit because of his poverty. Now he is better off she has discovered she loves him. But meanwhile he has taken up with another damsel, who it appears always loved him.———I think you should obey your own feelings in this matter. Whom do you love the best, the girl who thought you were not good enough for her until you got your present position, or the girl who loved you all along? You should certainly marry the one you really love, and agree to let bygones be bygones. At the same time, the young lady who only began to think of you as a husband when you improved your finances would seem to be rather a worldly individual, and if I had the settlement of the matter, I should be strongly inclined to seal the union between you and the other one, whose love for you would appear to be the more enduring. But if it is the first one you love, don't hesitate to take her back to your bosom, if you can do it without breaking anyone's heart.

REJOICED to see the man so wide awake in him, I followed him closely across the terrace and through the rose garden to the bank of the river. This we followed until we came at last to the belt of willows, where, having found a suitable patch of even and springy turf, I drew my sword and invited him to make ready.

"Will you not strip?" he inquired sullenly.

"I do not think so," I answered. "The night air is sharp. Nevertheless, do you make ready as best you deem fit, and that speedily, Monsieur."

With an exclamation of contempt, he divested himself of his wig, mask, and doublet; then, drawing his sword, came forward and announced himself at my disposal.

As you may well conceive, we wasted no time in compliments, but straightway went to work, and that with a zest that drew sparks from our rapiers at the first contact.

The Marquis attacked me furiously, and therein lay his only chance; for a fierce, rude swordplay that is easily dealt with in broad daylight is vastly discomposing in such pale moonshine as lighted us. I defended myself warily, for of a sudden I had grown conscious of the danger that I ran did he once by luck or strength get past my guard with that point of his, which in the spare light I could not follow closely enough to feel secure.

'Neath the fury of his onslaught I was compelled to break ground more than once, and each time he was so swift to follow up his advantage that I had ne'er a chance to retaliate.

Still, fear or doubt of the issue I had none. I needed but to wait until the Marquis' fury was spent by want of breath to make an end of it. And presently that which I waited for came about. His attack began to lag in vigour, and the pressure of his blade to need less resistance, whilst his breathing grew noisy as that of a broken-winded horse. Then, with the rage of a gambler who loses at every throw, he reviled me with every thrust or lunge that I turned aside.

My turn was come; yet I held back, and let him spend his strength to the utmost drop, whilst with my elbow close against my side, and by an easy play of wrist, I diverted each murderous stroke of his point, that came again and again for my heart.

When at last he had wasted in blasphemies what little breath his wild exertions had left him, I let him feel on his blade the twist that heralded my first advance. He caught the thrust, and retreated a step, his blasphemous tongue silenced, and his living face bathed in perspiration.

Cruelly I toyed with him then, and with every disengage I made him realise that he was mastered, and that if I withheld the final blow, it was but to prolong his agony. And to add to the bitterness of that agony of his, I derided him whilst I fenced; with a recitation of his many sins I mocked him, showing him how ripe he was for death, and asking him how it felt to die unshriven with such a load upon his soul.

Goaded to rage by my bitter words, he ground his teeth, and gathered what rags of strength were left him for a final effort. And before I knew what he was about, he had dropped on to his left knee, and with his body thrown forward and supported within a foot of the ground by his left arm, he came, like a snake, under my guard, with his point directed upwards.

So swift had been this movement, and so unlooked for, that had I not sprung backwards in the very nick of time, this narrative of mine had ne'er been written. With a jeering laugh I knocked aside his sword, but even as I disengaged, to thrust at him, he knelt up and caught my blade in his left hand, and for all that it ate its way through the flesh to the very bones of his fingers, he clung to it with that fierce strength and blind courage that is born of despair.

Then, raising himself on his knees again, he struck at me wildly, I swung aside, and as his sword, missing its goal, shot past me, I caught his wrist in a grip from which I contemptuously invited him to free himself. With that began a fierce tugging and panting on both sides, which, however, was of short duration, for presently my blade, having severed the last sinew of his fingers, was set free. Simultaneously I let go his wrist, pushing his arm from me so violently that, in his exhausted condition, it caused him to fall over on his side.

In an instant, however, he was up and at me again. Again our swords clashed, but once only. It was time to finish. With a vigorous disengage I got past his feeble guard, and sent my blade into him full in the middle of the chest, and out again at his back, until a foot or so of glittering steel protruded.

A shudder ran through him, and his mouth worked oddly, whilst spasmodically he still sought, without avail, to raise his sword; then, as I recovered my blade, a half-stifled cry broke from his lips, and throwing up his arms he staggered and fell in a heap.

As I turned him over to see if he were dead, his eyes met mine, and were full of piteous intreaty; his lips moved, and presently I caught the words:

"I am sped, Luynes." Then struggling up, and in a louder voice, "A priest!" he gasped. "Get me a priest, Luynes. Lord! Have mer——"

A rush of blood choked him and cut short his utterance. He writhed and twitched for a moment, then his chin sank forward, and he fell back, Death stiffening his limbs, and glazing the eyes which stared hideously upwards at the cold, pitiless moon.

Such was the passing of the Marquis César de St. Auban.

CHAPTER XXV.

Play-Acting.

For a little while I stood gazing down at my work; my mind full of the unsolvable mysteries of life and death, then I bethought me that time stood not still for me, and that something yet remained to be accomplished ere my evening's task were done.

And forthwith I made shift to do a thing at the memory of which my blood is chilled and my soul is filled with loathing even now, albeit the gulf of many years separates me from that June night at Canaples.

To pass succinctly o'er an episode on which I have scant heart to tarry, suffice it you to know I bound a heavy stone to St. Auban's ankle; then lifting the body in my arms, I half-dragged, half-bore it across the little stretch of intervening sward to the water's edge, and flung it in.

As I write I have the hideous picture in my mind, and again I see St. Auban's ghastly face grinning up at me through the moonlit waters, until at last it was mercifully swallowed up in their black depths, and naught but a swirling wavelet that spread swiftly across the stream was left to tell of what had chanced.

I dare not dwell upon the feelings that assailed me as I stooped to rinse the blood from my hands, nor yet of the feverish haste wherewith I tore my blood-stained doublet from my back, and hurled it wide into the stream. For all my callousness I was sick and unmanned by that which had befallen.

No time, however, did I waste in mawkish sentiment, but setting my teeth hard, I turned away from the river, and back to the trampled ground of our recent conflict. There, with no other witness save the moon, I clad myself in the Marquis' doublet of black velvet. I set his mask of silk upon my face, his golden wig upon my head, and over that his sable hat with its drooping feather. Next I buckled on his sword belt, wherefrom hung his rapier that I had sheathed.

In Blois that day I had taken the precaution, knowing the errand upon which I came, to procure myself knickerbockers of black velvet, and black leather boots with gilt spurs that closely resembled those which St. Auban had worn in life.

Now, as I have already written, St. Auban and I were much of the same build and stature, and so methought with confidence that he would have shrewd eyes, indeed, who could infer from my appearance that I was other than the same masked gentleman who had that very day ridden into Canaples at the head of a troop of His Eminence's guards.

I made my way swiftly back along the path that St. Auban and I had together trodden but a little while ago, and past the Château, until I came to the shrubbery where Michelot, faithful to the orders I had given him, awaited my return. From his concealment he had seen me leave the Château with the Marquis, and as I loomed suddenly up before him now, he took me for the man whose clothes I wore, and naturally enough assumed that ill had befallen Gaston de Luynes. Of a certainty I had been pistolled by him had I not spoken in time. I lingered but to give him certain necessary orders; then while he went off to join Abdon and see to their fulfilment, I made my way steathily, with eyes keeping watch around me, across the terrace, and through the window into the room that St. Auban had left to follow me to his death.

The tapers still burnt, and in all respects the chamber was as it had been; the back and breast pieces still lay upon the floor, and on the table the littered documents. The door, I ascertained, had been locked on the inside, a precaution which St. Auban had no doubt taken so that none might spy upon the work that busied him.

I closed and made fast the window, then I bethought me that being in ignorance of the whereabouts of St. Auban's bedchamber, I must perforce spend the night as best I could within that very room.

And so I sat me down and pondered deeply o'er the work that was to come, the part I was about to play, and the details of its playing. In this manner did I while away perchance an hour; through the next one I must have slept, for I awakened with a start to find three tapers spent and the last one spluttering, and in the sky the streaks that heralded the summer dawn.

Again I fell to thinking; again I slept, and woke again to find the night gone and the sunlight on my face. Some one knocked at the door, and that knocking vibrated through my brain and set me wide awake indeed. It was as the signal to uplift the curtain and let my play-acting commence.

Hastily I rose and shot a glance at the mirror to see that my wig hung straight and that my mask was rightly adjusted. I started at my own reflection, for methought that from the glass 'twas St. Auban who looked at me as I had seen him look the night before when he had donned those things at my command.

"Hola there, within!" came Montrésor's voice. "Monsieur le Capitaine!" And a fresh shower of blows descended on the oak panels.

I yawned with prodigious sonority and overturned a chair with my foot. Then bracing myself for the ordeal, through which I looked to what scant information I possessed and my own mother wit to bear me successfully, I strode across to admit my visitor.

Muffling my voice, as I had heard St. Auban do in the inn, by drawing my nether lip over my teeth.

"By Gad!" quoth I, as I opened the door. "It seems, lieutenant, that I must have fallen asleep over those musty documents."

I trembled as I watched him, waiting for his reply, and I thanked Heaven that in the rôle I had assumed a mask was worn, not only because it hid my features, but because it hid the emotions which these might have betrayed.

"I was beginning to fear," he replied coldly, and without so much as looking at me, "that worse had befallen you."

I breathed again.

"You mean?"

"Pooh, nothing!" said he, half-contemptuously. "Only methinks 'twere well whilst we remain at Canaples that you do not spend your nights in a room within such easy access to the terrace."

"Your advice no doubt is sound, but as I shall not spend another night at Canaples, it comes too late."

"You mean, Monsieur?"

"That we set out for Paris to-day."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Impossible! I have just visited the stables, and there are not four horses fit for the journey. So that unless you have in mind the purchase of fresh animals——"

"Pish! My purse is not bottomless," I broke in, repeating the very words that I heard St. Auban utter.

"So you said once before, Monsieur. Still, unless you are prepared to take that course, the only alternative is to remain here until the horses are sufficiently recovered. But perhaps you think of walking?" he added, with a sniff.

"Such is your opinion, your time being worthless, and it being of little moment where you spend it. I have conceived a plan."

"Ah!"

"Has it not occurred to you that the danger which threatens us, and which calls for the protection of a troop, is only on this side of the Loire, where the Bloisois might be minded to attempt a rescue of the Chevalier? But over yonder, Chevalier, on the Chambord side, who cares a fig for the Lord of Canaples or his fate? None; is it not so?"

He made an assenting gesture, whereupon I continued, "This being so, I have bethought me that it will suffice if I take but three or four men and the sergeant as an escort, and cross the river with our prisoner after nightfall, travelling along the opposite shore until we reach Orleans. What think you, lieutenant?"

He shrugged his shoulders again.

"'Tis you who command here," he answered with apathy, "not I."

"Nevertheless, do you not think the plan a safe one, as well as one that will allay His Eminence's very natural impatience?"

"Oh, it is safe enough, I doubt not," he replied coldly.

"Your enthusiasm determines me," quoth I, with an irony that made him wince. "And we will follow the plan, since you agree with me touching its excellence. But keep the matter to yourself until an hour or so after sunset."

He bowed, so utterly my dupe that I could have laughed at him. Then,

"There is a little matter that I would mention," he said. "Mademoiselle de Canaples has expressed a wish to accompany her father to Paris, and has asked me whether this will be permitted her."

My heart leapt. Surely the gods fought on my side.

"I cannot permit it," I answered icily.

"Monsieur, you are pitiless," he protested, in a tone of indignation, for which I could gladly have embraced him.

I feigned to ponder.

"The matter needs consideration. Tell Mademoiselle that I will discuss it with her at noon, if she will condescend to await me on the terrace. I will then give her my definite reply. And now, lieutenant, let us breakfast."

As completely as I had duped Montrésor did I presently dupe those of the troopers with whom I came in contact, among others the sergeant, and anon the Chevalier himself.

From the brief interview that I had with him I discovered that whilst he but vaguely suspected me to be St. Auban—and when I say, "he suspected me," I mean he suspected him whose place I had taken—he was nevertheless aware of the profit which his captor, whoever he might be, derived from this business. It soon grew clear to me from what he said that St. Auban had mocked him with it whilst concealing his identity; that he had told him how he had obtained from Malpertuis the treasonable letter, and of the bargain which it had enabled him to strike with Mazarin. I did not long remain in his company, and deeming the time not yet ripe for disclosures, I said little in answer to his lengthy tirades, which had, I guessed, been made for scope to trap me into betraying the identity he suspected.

It wanted a few minutes to noon as I left the room in which the old nobleman was confined, and by the door of which a trooper was stationed, musket on shoulder. With every pulse a-throbbing at the thought of my approaching interview with Mademoiselle, I made my way below and out into the bright sunshine, the soldiers I chanced to meet saluting as I passed them.

On the terrace I found Mademoiselle already awaiting me. She was standing, as often I had seen her stand, with her back turned towards me and her elbows resting upon the balustrade. But as my step sounded behind her, she turned, and stood gazing at me with a face so grief-stricken and pale, that I longed to unmask and set her torturing fears at rest. I doffed my hat, and greeted her with a silent bow, which she contemptuously disregarded.

"My lieutenant tells me, Mademoiselle," said I in my counterfeited voice, "that it is your desire to bear Monsieur your father company upon this journey of his to Paris?"

"With your permission, sir," she answered, in a choking voice.

"It is a matter for consideration, Mademoiselle," I pursued. "There are in it many features that may have escaped you, and which I shall discuss with you if you will honour me by stepping into the garden below."

"Why will not the terrace serve?"

"Because I may have that to say which I would not have overheard."

She knit her brows and stared at me as though she would penetrate the black silk that hid my face. At last she shrugged her shoulders, and letting her arms fall to her side in a gesture of helplessness and resignation, "So be it; I will go with you," was all she said.

Side by side we went down the steps as a pair of lovers might have gone, save that her face was drawn and white, and that her eyes looked straight before her, and never once, until we reached the gravel path below, at her companion. Side by side we walked along one of the rose-bordered alleys, until at length I stopped.

"Mademoiselle," I said, speaking in the natural tones of that good-for-naught Gaston de Luynes, "I have already decided, and you have my permission to accompany your father."

At the sound of my voice she started, and with her left hand clutching at the region of her heart she stood, her head thrust forward, and on her face the look of one who is confronted with some awful doubt. That look was brief, however, and swift to replace it was one of hideous revelation.

"In Heaven's name, who are you?" she cried in accents that bespoke internal agony.

"Already you have guessed it, Mademoiselle," I answered, and I would have added that which should have brought comfort to her distraught mind when,

"You!" she gasped in a voice of profound horror. "You! You the Judas who has sold my father to the Cardinal for a paltry share in our estates! And I believed that mask of yours to hide the face of St. Auban!"

Her words froze me into a stony mass of insensibility. There was no logic in my attitude; I see it now. Appearances were all against me, and her belief was no more than justified. I overlooked all this, and instead of wasting time to recount how I came to be there, and thus deliver her from the anguish that was torturing her, I stood, dumb and cruel, cut to the quick by her scorn and suspicions that I was capable of such a thing as she imputed, and listening to the dictates of an empty pride that prompted me to make her pay full penalty.

"Oh, God pity me!" she wailed. "Have you naught to say?"

Still I maintained my mad, resentful silence. And presently, as one who muses, "You!" she said again. "You whom I—" She stopped short. "Oh! The shame of it!" she moaned.

Reason at last came uppermost, and as in my mind I completed her broken sentence, my heart gave a great throb, and I was thawed to a gentler purpose.

"Mademoiselle!" I exclaimed.

But even as I spoke she turned, and sweeping aside her gown that it might not touch me, she moved rapidly towards the steps we had but descended. Full of remorse I sprang after her.

"Mademoiselle! Hear me!" I cried, and put forth my hand to stay her.

Thereat she wheeled round and faced me, a blaze of fury in her grey eyes.

"Dare not to touch me!" she panted. "You thief! You hound!"

I recoiled, and like one turned to stone I stood and watched her mount the steps, my feelings swaying violently 'twixt anger and sorrow. Then my eye fell upon Montrésor standing on the topmost step, and on his face there was a sneering, insolent smile which told me that he had heard the epithets she had bestowed upon me.

Albeit I sought that day another interview with Yvonne, I did not gain it, and so I was forced to sun myself in solitude upon the terrace. But I cherished for my consolation that broken sentence of hers, whereby I read that the coldness which she had evinced for me before I left Canaples had but been assumed.

(To be concluded.)

[In the next number of Short Stories will begin a serial romance of powerful human interest, entitled "Link by Link." STRANGE MENTAL POWERS.

HOW PEOPLE ARE INFLUENCED.

Startling Words from the Committee Appointed to Investigate Hypnotism for the Benefit of Journal Readers.

REV. PAUL WELLER, Gorham, N.Y.

G. S. LINCOLN, M.D., 101 Crutchfield Street, Dallas, Tex.

F. H. STOUFER, Sec. & Treas. of Railway Conductors, Pueblo, Col.

JUDGE HENRY SCHAFER, Flemington, N.J.

Hypnotism is no longer a myth, a fanciful creation of the mind, but a reality, a most potent power capable of producing infinite good For the purpose of ascertaining the exact value of this much-talked-of power, a committee, composed of a physician, a well-known jurist, a prominent minister and a leading railroad man, was appointed to investigate Hypnotism.

The committee carried on a series of investigations in regard to the power of hypnotism to influence the actions and deeds of people in the everyday walks of life.

The first step taken by the members of the committee was to master the science in every detail, so that they might state from personal experience the good or evil this strange power might produce. They wrote the New York Institute of Science, of Rochester, N. Y., the greatest school of Hypnotism and Occult Science in the world, and received full and complete instructions in regard to how hypnotism may be used to influence people in business, how to use it in treating diseases, etc., etc. In a few days they mastered these instructions and were full-fledged hypnotists.

It was clearly demonstrated that hypnotism may be employed so that the person operated upon is entirely unconscious of the fact that he is being influenced; and, all things considered, the committee regard it as the most valuable discovery of modern times. A knowledge of it is essential to one's success in life and well-being in society.

Doctor Lincoln says, after a thorough investigation, that he considers it the most marvellous therapeutic or curative agent of modern times.

Judge Schafer, although a legal light, turned his attention to healing the sick, and in a few treatments he completely cured John E. Myers, of Flemington, N.J., of a strange malady that had kept him bedfast for nine years, and which the doctors said must surely kill him. Judge Schafer's fame spread for miles around, and hundreds of people applied to him for treatment.

Mr. Stoufer performed the astonishing feat of hypnotising Mr. Cuningham, of Pueblo, Col., at a distance of several blocks. He also hypnotised an aged gentleman and had him run through the streets shouting, "Redhot peanuts for sale." Mr. Stoufer says it is indispensable to one's business success.

Rev. Paul Weller says that every minister and every mother should understand hypnotism for the benefit they can be to those with whom they are brought in daily contact.

In speaking of this marvellous power, President Eliot, of Harvard College, said to the graduates: "Young gentlemen, there is a subtle power lying latent in each of you, which few of you have developed, but which, when developed, might make a man irresistible. It is called Personal Magnetism or Hypnotism. I advise you to master it."

The New York Institute of Science has just issued 10,000 copies of a book which fully explains all the secrets of this marvellous power, and gives explicit directions for becoming a practical hypnotist, so that you can employ the force without the knowledge of anyone. Anybody can learn. Success is guaranteed.

The book also contains a full report of the members of the committee. It will be sent absolutely free to anyone who is interested. A penny postal card will bring it. Write to-day. Address:

Her First Engagement.

Of all the hopeful English girls in Milan who had reached the close of their term of preparation for the operatic stage that year, none gave such small promise of success—so the others whispered—as a certain little maid from Devonshire, by name Bettina Langdon. The croakers were obliged to own that she had beauty, but her voice and temperament! Horrors! No impresario could think of engaging her. And yet Bettina was the very first of the lot to get an engagement. It came about this wise—all in the springtime.

Most of the girls studied with old San Donino, a wily snuff-taking master of music, who, it cannot be denied, knew much about training the human voice. But he was a master as well in the art of making English girls who came to Italy to study, believe that they were born for the stage, and if they only took lessons of him—it was merely a matter of time (and money)—when they should embitter the existence of Nordica, Eames, Calvé, or any other great star that might be glittering in the firmament. So there was seldom an hour of the day when his rather shabby little studio—two flights up on the rear court, in Via Brera—did not sound with the voices of his "victims," as the sculptors and painters on the floor above used to call the girls.

Near the studio, its broad porte-cochère opening on the pavement of Via Brera, stood the palace of the Duke of Loduoli—a stately pile, grey with its centuries of age. The old nobleman, who had once served Italy in a diplomatic post at St. James', was fond of the society of the Britishers, and was often seen at their colony's evening parties. It was his delight now and then to have San Donino bring his English girls to the palace to assist at a musicale or a conversazione.

It was on one of these evenings at the palace that Bettina met the impresario who gave her her first engagement. Among the glided youth of Milan who made up part of the company was the duke's elder son, Prince Francesco, a wide-awake aristocrat who forgot to pose, and who travelled everywhere. He was fond of practising his English, and he talked to Bettina of his tour in the British Isles, and made her laugh by saying that the thing he liked best was a song he had heard in London about one little girl who didn't want to play in another little girl's garden, as he put it. Bettina had often sung the ditty in her schooldays—she thought of it sadly—and the words and tune began to run in her head. This happened while the master was showing off his pupils. One after another they had taken their places at the piano while he accompanied them in arias from the operas in which they dreamt some day of singing the leading rôles; and one after another they had been rewarded with the polite applause of the company. At length it became Bettina's turn. In a low voice she spoke to the maestro while he opened a sheet of music and placed it on the ledge.

"I shall not sing that," she said.

"What!" San Donino swung round on the stool and stared at her in amazement, a spot of snuff on the tip of his nose. He met the calm gaze of Bettina. "What you sing, then?" he said, somewhat meekly.

"Listen, and you will hear."

Then while the maestro sat open-mouthed at the silent piano she began the simple strain of "I Don't Want to Play in Your Yard." She sang in the sweet artless manner of her early girlhood, free from the studied mouthings and breathings that often make the vocal scholar ridiculous, and in a voice as pure as nature. It was a strange piece to sing to an Italian company, but everyone listened in delight. This time the applause was not merely polite. It rang with genuine feeling and mingling cries of "Brava!" and "Ancora!" though only the Duke and his son understood the words.

"You sang like an angel of Heaven," Prince Francesco whispered as he took her into the supper of coloured sweets that the Italians like even more than coloured pastry and sparkling red wine of Asti that they love so dearly. "And you sang it for me," he breathed, looking into her eyes.

"It pleased me as well," she said, and he felt that her meaning was free of self-conceit. "I seemed to be at home again in England singing—a little girl again in the days when mother was alive."

They met the next afternoon in the Victor Emmanuel Arcade, where he had waited two hours for her to pass. They walked to the cathedral in the piazza, and he showed her a chapel that his ancestors had built four hundred years ago. She told him of a poor little churchyard in a Devonshire town, and of a girl who came to Italy to study music that she might make her own way in the world.

In a few days it had grown to be their custom to walk together from the music studio. Once they were passing the porte-cochère of his father's palace. Spring was in its full flush, and plants bloomed on the balconies of Via Brera, and she spoke of their beauty.

"Will you come into our garden?" he asked. Through the arch of the portico she could see the wealth of greenery. "Come, I will show you some flowers." Side by side they walked through the grounds, under canopies of gorgeous magnolias, beside fragrant oleanders and sparkling fountains and urns of blossoming glory.

"Beautiful! beautiful!" was all that she could say.

"Yes," he said passionately; "but not so beautiful as you are to me. Bettina, I love you. Some day this yard will be mine. Will you come and play in it?"

For a moment they regarded one another silently, he holding her hand, and then both gave way to joyous mirth.

"I want you for my princess," said her impresario, and Bettina's first and last engagement was sealed then and there.

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium, Nos. 55—60," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, March 10th, 1902.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 55. LOST WORDS.

Fill in the blanks of the following lines with a word of seven letters, using the same letters, transposed, each time:

That merciless —— was hurled at you,
At you, a proud ——, of Dons the chief.
No wonder you were —— when you knew
It might —— a mind both calm and true
Let's feel ——; that may be some relief.

No. 56. WORD SQUARE.

Form a word square from equivalents of the following: A disease; pertaining to a heavenly body; a fruit; a bird; a place of public exertion.

No. 57. PROVERB MAKING.

The following letters, rearranged, constitute a well-known proverb:

AA C EEE FF HH IIIII M NN OOO P RR SS TTTTT.

No. 58. TRANSPOSED SENTENCES.

The following words when rearranged will form two sentences, one of eighteen words, the other of thirty:

From a splendid clear ceiling at two edged from invisible lamp masked by a black head hanging above a linen veil of blue vestments steady in burnt priest with her golden brows with eyeholes a flame shaven white suspended the altar of the end stood in his either.

No. 59. CHARADE.

My FIRST is void of ornament,
With artfulness unfilled:
You'll find me in the forest,
And also view me tilled.

A SECOND of good spirits
Some people take in tea;
But do not have a SECOND
If you can't discover me.

My WHOLE now, if you wish to be,
Sue someone, say, for cash,
Tho' mind I don't advise you
To be so very rash.

No. 60. DOUBLE ACROSTIC.

Initials and finals of equivalents of the following give names of two English cities: A deadly plant; a wild evergreen shrub; to condemn; a fish; a fruit; a servant.

Unsentimental.

Mr. Poeticus (entering cheerfully): "My love is like the red, red rose!" Mrs. Poeticus (looking up from the stove): "You'd look red, too, you lazy scribbler, if you'd been bending over a frying-pan for twenty minutes!"

She'd Had a Good Time.

Maid: "Gentleman wishes to see you, mum, Here's his card." Miss Flirtie: "Um—I don't remember that name." "He said, mum, that you was to see him, or else give him something of his you had." "It must be someone I met at the seaside last summer. Take that box of rings, and ask him to pick out his."

Why he was Dirty.

Benevolent Lady: "I can pity your hunger, my poor man, and I am willing to relieve your wants, but why do you keep yourself so dirty? There is plenty of water about." Tramp: "Fact is, marm, my physician told me to take a bath two hours after my meals, and I ain't had a meal for a fortnight, and—thank you kindly, marm."

A Hero's Death.

Inspector: "Now, boys, can any of you tell me the names of any Englishmen who have died whilst bravely doing their duty?" First Boy: "General Gordon, sir." Inspector: "Very good, my boy, but" (looking round the classroom) "surely he was not the only one." Second Boy: "My father, sir." Inspector: "Oh, indeed, what was he?" Second Boy (proudly): "A referee at football matches, sir."

No Desire to Corrupt.

Old Tightpurse: "Mr. Timmings, is it true that you remarked at a recent meeting of the Young Men's Society that 'Money is a curse and the root of all evil'?" Mr. Timmings (his employé): "Yes, sir." Old Tightpurse: "That being the case, Mr. Timmings, and your views on the subject being so sincere, I have no desire to pervert your noble nature by forcing you to take the rise of salary I had intended giving you. Good morning."

Bringing the Wick Up.

The other day a lady in the West-end sent her servant to light the gas. Being a long time gone, she went to find her. She found her in the hall on top of a pair of steps picking the burner with a pin. "What on earth are you doing?" asked the lady. "Shure, Oi'm bringing the wick up," was the reply. On being told that there was no wick, and all that was required was a lighted match, she replied: "Go 'long wid yer! Oi may look a bit ignorant, but, begorra, Oi'm not so silly as to put a loight to a piece of cold iron!"

The Poor Martyr!

"The time has come," said Mr. M'Brick's wife, "when woman may forsake the light, ephemeral things of life and take up the heavy subjects." And her husband rejoined, wearily: "Are you going to make bread at home again, Maria?"

They Were Too Quiet.

Visitor: "How do you like your new neighbours?" Little Boy: "I don't like them at all. They're too quiet." Visitor: "Too quiet?" Little Boy: "Yes'm. Mamma makes me keep still all the time, so that she can hear what they're doing."

One Way of Doing It.

Sweet Girl: "Papa, I wish you'd lock up your money and pretend to fail; there's a good old dear. It needn't last more than a week or two, and there are so many failures now no one will find fault." Father: "Of all things! Wha——" Sweet Girl: "Oh, it's all right. You see, I'm engaged to nine young men, and I've got to get rid of at least eight of them, somehow."

All He Got.

"I never robbed a man but once," said the honest tramp, "and then I was starving. He would not give me a penny, and I couldn't stand the gnawing in my stomach any longer. So I knocked him down and went through his pockets. What kind of a haul did I make? Just one little bottle which read on the label: 'Pepsin'; for that full feeling after eating.'"

A Triumph of Art.

"There is one very dramatic situation in my new play. It is where the mortgage on the old farm is foreclosed and the hero can't pay it off." "Does it affect the audience very much?" "Oh, my! Why, last night a millionaire in one of the boxes was so affected that he wrote out a cheque for £5,000, and sent it up to pay off the mortgage and get the hero out of difficulties."

Didn't Want the Spring.

A London exquisite, having become agriculturally ambitious, went into the country in search of a farm, and, finding one for sale, began to bargain for it. The seller mentioned, as one of the farm's recommendations, that it had a very cold spring on it. "Ah, aw!" said the fop, "I won't take it, then, for I've heard that a cold spring ruined the crops last year, and I don't want a place with such a drawback upon it."

"Having" the Policeman.

A police-inspector, being informed that a restaurateur was serving game out of season, visits the restaurant in plain clothes and orders dinner. "Waiter, pheasant for one." The inspector finishes his dinner leisurely, and then says to the waiter: "Ask the governor to step this way a minute, if you please." "What for?" "I wish to notify him to appear in court to-morrow and answer for selling pheasant out of season. I am the police-inspector, and have secured the necessary evidence against him." "It wasn't pheasant you had." Police-inspector (uneasily): "It wasn't pheasant? What was it, then?" Waiter (cheerfully): "Crow."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

Miss CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Bucklegh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weigh was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stookport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lance., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 12st. 6lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago: they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since Send me a box for my mother."

A Friend's Recommendation is the Best Testimonial.

YOU will not have far to go before finding a friend, acquaintance, or neighbour who can tell you from personal experience that BEECHAM'S PILLS are the most efficacious medicine yet known for the cure of all forms of

INDIGESTION, BILIOUS DISORDERS, SICK HEADACHE, POORNESS OF BLOOD,
NERVOUS DEBILITY, AND GENERAL WANT OF TONE.

Such unquestionable testimony can be obtained by almost anyone anywhere. Those who have taken have realised the immense benefits derived from their use, and have recommended them to their friends.

There is no denying this fact, for a man is not likely to be gulled a second time, and every dissatisfied purchaser does ten times more harm to the reputation of any specific than one satisfied does good.

But notwithstanding the gigantic sale of over SIX MILLION BOXES PER ANNUM, there are still thousands of sufferers who are spoiling their lives, and possibly ruining their health, with experiments, while the old-established remedy, BEECHAM'S PILLS, remains still untried. Note the axiom on the top of this page—"A friend's recommendation is the best testimonial"—and remember that in the case of BEECHAM'S PILLS this is an easy thing to obtain.

CHAPTER I.

A Strange Meeting and an Escape.

"GOOD-NIGHT, porter!"

"Good-night, sir!"

The big gate of Moulstone Asylum closed with a dull clang as Gerald Mortimer strode out into the road leading to Moulstone village. It was late. Dinner with his friend Dr. Branksome and one or two others of the asylum medical staff had killed the evening hours enjoyably, and the doctor's well-selected whisky and cigars had served to prolong the merry meeting to almost midnight.

At the Manor House a mile and a half away—beyond the village—Mrs. Mortimer and the rest of the household would have retired by now, and so Gerald swung leisurely along. The night was fine, lit by the moon and countless stars, and in spite of a crispness born of a January frost, the air was pleasant and exhilarating.

All around him the country spread like a huge, elongated dish, he surveying it from the vantage ground of a sloping rim. Typical Kentish country, hills and valleys, with hedgerows trailing through fields like velvet ribbons, and the little river Kel winding in the moonlight like a silver serpent among the low-lying meadows. Here and there in the valley a spot of yellow light showed where a household kept late vigil, while ahead, some three miles, a rising glow located the massed lamps of Kelbridge, the nearest town.

The phrases of a sweet melody from Faust ran through Gerald's brain as he traversed the long white road that led from the asylum, and his lips formed themselves for a low whistle.

But his whistling and his walk were both suddenly arrested.

From a point at the roadside where the tall, thick-set hedge was broken by a gate guarding a cart-track across a common, there issued an apparition! Or if not an apparition, a figure that suggested one.

The figure of a woman, tall and gaunt, dressed in a long cloak of faded blue, with eyes that seemed to burn dully like live coals growing cool. Swiftly she came with a lithe, gliding movement, right to the middle of the road, and as she moved, Gerald Mortimer could see those weird eyes of hers moving restlessly in their distended sockets. His sense of startled wonderment gave place to one of pity as he noticed her face, white and drawn with suffering.

Fearlessly she approached, right in his path. He stopped, waiting! She placed her hands upon his shoulders and peered at his face so closely, that he could feel her breath upon his cheek, and see those dull red eyes within a few inches of his.

As she thus gazed the woman's tongue found utterance—half-moan, half-whispered words.

Gerald Mortimer gently removed her hands from his shoulders. The hands were deathly cold.

"I beg your pardon, madam," he said. "But what do you want?"

The woman looked at him a moment and shrank back.

"Not you," she said, again with that strange moaning sound, "not you. I thought you were—— But he has not come. He will come! I must wait—wait."

She shivered again, and made as if to return to her resting place by the gate.

"What is it?" he asked kindly. "Who is it you are expecting?"

Once more she turned her dull-red eyes upon her questioner. Then she went on, unheeding his question.

"He will come—he may be here presently, and if not to-night, why then to-morrow. I must wait—wait always."

The thought had come to Gerald that this poor creature was demented, perhaps had escaped from the asylum, though that was hardly possible, since his friend Dr. Branksome would surely have mentioned it.

"You cannot wait here," he said; "it is nearly midnight, and you are cold and weary. Come with me to my mother's house till the morning."

She shrank further from him, and almost shrieked:

"No, no, no! My place is here. I must wait."

"But you will be better for a rest," he urged. "Come with me!"

Her mood demanded silence and solitude, and she did not reply. Instead she swung round with sudden quickness and passed through the gate on to the common beyond. Then at a pace that surprised Gerald Mortimer, she sped along the cart-track.

Irresolute, Gerald gazed after her, his brain in conflict with itself. He had no right to detain this woman, and yet—she was in distress! What if she were demented, as she certainly seemed? In such an event harm might easily come to her alone and uncontrolled, in that lonely by-way. He must try once more to persuade her.

He pushed open the gate. The track dipped and rose among the furze of the common. The flutter of the woman's cloak among the undulations met his eye for a second. He started in pursuit. But she was too far ahead. A wood, thick with brown ferns and dying undergrowth loomed ahead. He saw that cloaked form stop for a moment at the edge; there was a bobbing appearance as of a jump across a narrow ditch, and then he saw her no more. The wood had swallowed her up.

Gerald raced to the border of the wood. But the tangled brambles defied his sight. No sign of life could he see. He listened for the snapping of a twig that might furnish a clue to the woman's whereabouts, but no sound reached his ear save the soft and melancholy sighing of the wind. He skirted the wood each way for a hundred yards, listening and peering at every few paces. But eyes and ears were still defied. The wood seemed dead.

Reluctantly he retraced his steps, pursuit being useless. He regained the wood and strode homewards. And even now, whenever an odd sound struck upon his ear, he would catch his breath and turn round to listen and look back along the road he had traversed.

His walk to the Manor House was beset with those conditions of melancholy solitude in which the imagination ever finds the freest play. His brain whirled with strange fancies in which there always appeared the cloaked woman with the wondrous eyes. And even after he had ascended to his room and had got into bed, the haunting vision of those eyes of fire pursued him through a series of eerie dreams.

* * * * *

At breakfast the next morning he was taciturn and depressed. The memory of his encounter with the strange woman, trivial as seemed its direct import to him, rested on his mind like a dead weight, and left him with a gloomy foreboding of future evil. Vague enough his apprehensions were, and unfounded when his reason examined them, but like most others of us, Gerald sometimes had moments when instinct superseded and ruled reason. This was one of them. To his mother and young sisters, who, with himself, comprised the widowed household, he spoke scarcely a word beyond the usual formalities during breakfast.

Even towards the slight, fair girl with the beautiful hair and violet eyes, who sat quietly conversing with the little Mortimer girls, whose governess she was, he showed a disinclination to talk. Which was strange, for, during the few weeks that Nina Penhurst had been in the house, he had shown a desire to look upon her and talk to her on every possible occasion. So much so that already the tongues of the gossips were busy in the kitchen and village, and the opinion that the "handsome Gerald Mortimer" and "beautiful Miss Penhurst" would make a match of it, generally held. An opinion, which had Gerald been the only one to consult, might have been speedily proved. But of that more anon.

Meantime, he sat silent and preoccupied, eating very little breakfast. But even as they entered upon the marmalade stage, the parlourmaid appeared.

Excitement could be read in Mary's face, and her hurried words to Mrs. Mortimer bore out the reading.

"If you please, ma'am, Danvers has just brought the news that one of the lunatics has escaped from the asylum."

Gerald sprang from his chair.

"Lunatic escaped! When did it happen?" There was a ring of almost fierceness in his demand.

"Last night, sir, so Danvers says, but he wasn't missed till this morning."

"He—it's a man then. Why did you say it was a woman?" Gerald was quite irritable.

"I beg your pardon, sir," replied the maid. "I'm sure I didn't know I'd said such a thing."

"No, Gerald," said Mrs. Mortimer, turning to her son in surprise. "Mary said nothing about its being a woman."

"I'm sorry," Gerald said hurriedly. "It was my mistake." He flushed as he mentally traced to its source the cause of his supposition that the escaped lunatic was a woman.

Breakfast was practically finished, and he covered his obvious confusion by rising and excusing himself.

"I should like to see Danvers," he explained. "I was with Dr. Branksome last night, you know, and he knew nothing about it then. The escape must have occurred after that."

His thoughts were in a fresh turmoil as he sought out Danvers, the under-gardener. Somehow he could not detach the news of the escape from his encounter with that woman of the previous night. In some mysterious manner the two things were connected. Of that he felt convinced. But in what way?

The gardener could help him little towards the answer to that question. Danvers had only heard, as he passed the lodge gates, the bare news that a man had escaped in the night, and that search parties were being organised.

"That's all I knows about it, sir," the gardener concluded. "But no doubt they can tell you more up at the 'sylum."

To the asylum Gerald at once made his way.

"Yes, it's perfectly true, Mortimer," replied Dr. Branksome, whom Gerald had promptly sought out. "A man has escaped, and the warders are scouring the neighbourhood for him now."

"Is it a dangerous case?" Gerald asked.

"No: and that's the extraordinary part of the business. This man, Felix Cordelvin, was one of the quietest patients here. He never gave any trouble, and was the last person in the world I should have expected to bolt."

"Is he young or old?"

"Oldish—nearly sixty. He's as sane as you or I on most things, but labours under the delusion that Felix isn't his name. Thinks it's Anthony Cordelvin, and imagines he has been done out of a lot of property in the past."

"Any grounds for his delusion?"

"None at all. But you seem very interested, Mortimer."

"Do I?" replied Gerald. "Well, perhaps I am. When I first heard of this escape I thought it was a woman."

"A woman? What suggested such a possibility?"

"An adventure I had last night."

"Last night! But you were here till nearly twelve."

"Yes, I know. It was after that."

"You pique my curiosity."

"Well, I'll gratify it." And in a few words, Gerald told Dr. Branksome of his encounter of the previous night.

"She was a woman of about fifty," he concluded, "and was evidently expecting somebody. Isn't it possible that she was in some way connected with Cordelvin?"

"It's possible, of course, though I never heard of the escaped man having any friends. However, if the men fail to find Cordelvin it may be necessary for you to inform the police. Your adventure was certainly a singular one. It is hardly usual to find a lady roaming about alone at midnight."

Gerald Mortimer left his friend soon after that and returned home.

That load which had been upon his mind since the previous night was still there—that strange foreboding of evil seemed rather to grow with the hours.

But it lightened when, on entering the garden at the rear of the Manor House, he caught sight of Nina Penhurst. The sight of that girlish figure and beautiful face arrested his wandering thoughts and quickened his heart. Manifest admiration was in his glance as he approached, and into his brain there rushed an almost overwhelming desire to speak the thoughts that were in his heart. But so far she had never given him sufficient indication that such a declaration would be acceptable, and so, smothering his inclination, he simply raised his hat with a polite salutation.

She smiled as he approached.

"I have just been to the asylum," he said.

Her face became grave.

"Ah, yes," she returned; "to inquire after that poor man? Is there any fresh news?"

"Very little. He escaped very late last night or early this morning. The warders are now hunting the neighbourhood. It is to be hoped that the poor old man has not thrown himself in the river."

Nina shivered compassionately and nodded her head slowly.

"He is an old man, then?" she inquired.

"Yes; nearly sixty, Dr. Branksome tells me. A strange old man without friends, who imagines himself to be the rightful owner of property which, so far as anybody knows, has no existence outside his own imagination."

"Not an uncommon delusion, I believe," Nina suggested.

"No," Gerald answered. "Such a thing is, of course, quite prevalent among lunatics. But in this case the poor fellow supports his idea by declaring himself to be somebody else."

"That surely is also a common symptom of madness, is it not?" inquired Nina. "I have heard that people in asylums often declare themselves to be kings and queens."

"That is so," Gerald assented. "In this case, however, the claimed identity is the stranger because of its trifling difference from his own. His name is Felix—whereas he claims to be Anthony."

"Felix—Anthony—he thinks his name is Anthony—Anthony what?"

"Cordelvin—Anthony Cordelvin."

Nina Penhurst looked up quickly as Gerald Mortimer uttered the name. Then she made as though to step forward. Her lips formed for speech, but she could utter no word. Her beautiful eyes changed in a moment their look of clear intelligence for one of awesome vacancy. She swayed where she stood—swayed to the left and the right. A moment more and she would have fallen, but Gerald Mortimer stepped to her side just in time to catch her as, her senses leaving her, she fell forward in a dead swoon.

CHAPTER II.

Dr. Ephraim Manisty is Offered a £1,000 Fee.

It was twelve o'clock midnight, and very cold. The church of St. Mary, Whitechapel, boomed out the hour in slow, sonorous tones. At the same time, a swiftly-driven hansom from the City direction turned to the half-right, and rattled over the stones along the Commercial Road.

The lamp inside the cab was extinguished; but a close scrutiny, as the vehicle whirled past the yellow shafts of light from the gas-standards, would have revealed a mysterious-looking figure inside. A man's figure, tall, and broad of shoulder, and with a massive head covered with an iron-grey mop of hair, which, with the heavy beard, and the closely-buttoned coat-collar, suggested an attempt at disguise.

She placed her hands upon his shoulders and peered at his face closely.

Two long, thick fingers lifted the trap in the roof of the cab, and a staccato direction in deep, bass tones, passed clear-cut through to the driver.

"Cannon Street Road—first on the right—drive to Ratcliff Highway—then look out for Stevedore Street on the left."

"Right, sir!" and the driver flicked his horse.

A hansom in Ratcliff Highway (or High Street, Ratcliff, as it is called in these days) was not so common a sight as to pass unnoticed. Men and women staggering along the street, or lounging at tavern doors, paused to look at the vehicle inquiringly, and even menacingly, as it flashed past. But no untoward incident occurred, and the cab turned duly into Stevedore Street.

Half-way down the street, on the right-hand side, was a long, low window, the glass of which was ruby-coloured, while a lamp over the door shed rays of the same hue over the narrow road.

A brass plate announced that

lived there; while the stencilled inscription on the red window, "Advice and Medicine, Sixpence," betokened the social status of the doctor's patients. In a poor neighbourhood, medical fees must inevitably rule low; and, after all, a doctor's income is not of necessity commensurate with his ability. But among poor practices, Dr. Ephraim Manisty's was of the poorest.

That could be seen at a glance. The low, tumble-down house that seemed to huddle against its neighbours for support; the feebly-illumined windows, with their shabby blinds of cheap muslin; the rusty door-knocker; the dilapidated bell—all pointed to the poverty-stricken condition of the tenant.

The man in the cab alighted as soon as the vehicle stopped. He knocked at the door. There was a pause of about a minute, and then an uncertain step was heard in the passage. The door was opened by a man of about fifty—shabby, like the house, and dissolute-looking. It was the "sixpenny" doctor himself. Surprised at the sight of a well-dressed stranger, he was silent for a second.

Then the visitor said:

"I wish to consult Dr. Manisty."

The doctor indicated with a slow thumb pointed at himself, that he was the identical man, and led the way to the surgery. The interior of the house was even more grimy and poverty-stricken than the outside.

The doctor signed to his visitor to sit down, and at the same moment endeavoured to secrete a glass and a half-empty whisky-bottle, to which, it was evident from his condition, he had been paying attention just previously. The visitor observed the movement.

"Don't let me interrupt you, Dr. Manisty," he said. "Your profession must be a terribly trying one, and you doubtless find a little whisky an excellent sedative after a hard day's work. And now let me tell you I have come to seek your professional assistance."

"What's the matter with you?" queried the doctor, a little puzzled by the other's manner. "Why have you come to me?"

"One question at a time, doctor. It is not for myself that I want medical attention. But let me tell you in my own way. My name is—Causton. Yours, I believe, is Ephraim Manisty?"

The doctor bowed.

"Poor neighbourhood for your profession here—not an over-lucrative clientèle, eh?"

"Really," resented the doctor, trying to straighten himself, while a vestige of pride glimmered in his bleared eyes, "I don't see what this has to do with your visit."

"Pardon me," returned Mr. Causton, with a smile in which his mouth looked ugly, even under the protecting beard and moustache, "if I delay a few moments in making the connection clear. You haven't a very profitable lot of patients, have you now?" There was a strange mastery in his manner that compelled the other to curb his indignation.

"Well," replied the doctor, somewhat sullenly, "if it will satisfy you to know, I haven't."

"Thank you, doctor. Candour is as charming as it is rare. You haven't. And, therefore, if I offer you a thousand pounds as a fee——"

Dr. Manisty started.

"A thousand pounds!" he gasped.

"Kindly allow me to proceed. I repeat, if I offer you a thousand pounds as a fee, you will be ready to attend a friend of mine?"

"A thousand pounds!" the doctor said—and there was a strange light in his eye—"why, it would mean my salvation, and my wife's and children's. I haven't five pounds in the world. I would do anything for a thousand pounds—that is, almost anything."

"Even to certifying a man with heart disease as a 'first-class life' for a British Oak Insurance policy, eh?" Mr. Causton's eyes held a peculiar smile.

The other leapt to his feet.

"What do you mean?" he cried vehemently. "Have you come here to insult me? Who are you? Are you from Scotland Yard?" He looked half-scared, half-threatening.

"Calm yourself, doctor," the visitor remarked imperturbably. "You need not fear me. I am in no way connected with the police. Nor do I wish to insult you—unless the offer of a thousand pounds is likely to hurt your feelings. No, Dr. Manisty, I'm here in the best of good faith, only as we are to do business together, I wish you to know that I am acquainted with your antecedents."

The doctor groaned.

"Is it necessary to go into that?" he asked.

"Not at all—at any length," Mr. Causton answered, with a species of sardonic cheerfulness. "The mere mention of the fact that five years in Portland Prison doesn't seem to have improved your worldly prospects is sufficient."

"It is magnanimous of you to omit the details," retorted Dr. Manisty, bitterly. "But I suppose it is the penalty of crime to always have one's past recalled."

"Not at all, not at all. I am merely making sure that you are the man I want. We can now, I think, forget the past, and talk of the present and the future. A thousand pounds is a good fee?"

"A very good fee."

"Even for a Harley Street surgeon?"

"That is so."

"You will do what I want for that sum?"

"What do you want?"

"An operation performed on a friend of mine."

"An operation? Of what nature?"

"The amputation of an arm."

"What is wrong with the arm?"

"That you will see."

"But who is the patient—and where is he—and when is it to be done? You will give me some particulars?"

"The patient is, as I have said, a friend of mine. He is at present at Streatham. The operation must be performed at once—you must come with me now."

"But I want to know——" Dr. Manisty began.

"The other particulars are here," grimly rejoined Mr. Causton, pulling a bundle of crisp bank-notes from his breast-pocket; and he rustled them temptingly under the doctor's sight.

The latter's eyes glinted greedily. He paced the room.

"You won't give me further information?" he said, facing round.

"Is not the eloquence of these sufficient?" giving the notes another rustling shake. "I will give you one note for a hundred now, as a guarantee, and the remainder after the job is done. Will you come with me?"

"I don't know what to say," hesitated Dr. Manisty. "Yours is a peculiar request made in a peculiar way. I don't know what to think. In view of my past experiences, I don't want to run any risks."

"There are no risks. Come—you are poor—you have said so—you have a wife and children—and here's a chance of making a thousand pounds. You'll come with me?"

Dr. Manisty was pacing the room, his fuddled brain trying to think things out clearly. His visitor eyed him carefully as he poured out a glass of raw whisky and drank it off at a gulp.

"Yes!" the doctor exclaimed, with sudden determination. "I'll come with you! One hundred pounds down, you said?"

"Here it is—and now let us lose no more time."

Quickly Dr. Manisty collected a few drugs, bandages, and instruments, locked the bank-notes safely away in a drawer, and turned down the light.

"I'm ready now!" he said.

The doctor led the way to the door. As he opened it, a soft sound as of someone moving away fell on their ears—a sound as of rustling skirts.

"What was that?" asked Mr. Causton.

"I don't know—probably some poor outcast resting on the step," replied Dr. Manisty.

They got into the cab, which had been waiting near a coffee-stall at the corner of the street. But neither noticed a tall, gaunt figure, clothed in a faded dark-blue cloak, hiding in the shadows of the houses. Nor did they know, as they rattled quickly back towards the City, that fifty yards behind them was another cab, with the same weird figure for its occupant. Yet there it was, the woman reclining in the vehicle, but with her head thrust eagerly forward, and a pair of strange-coloured eyes that seemed to gleam in the dark like a tigress', riveted on the rear-lights of the cab in front—steadfast and unblinking.

"Come, you are poor, you have said so, you have a wife and children, and here's a chance of making a thousand pounds."

On through the almost deserted streets of the City, where the echoing hoofs cleft the silence of the night; over London Bridge, beneath which the murky water lapped its doleful dirge and reflected a myriad lights like swords of living flame; through the dark, depressing Borough, into the comparative light and freshness of Kennington and Brixton. On, on; up Brixton Hill towards Streatham, and then, suddenly, the first cab turns sharply to the left, along a houseless road, flanked on one side with old elms and a long wall.

"Pull up!" The deep tones of Mr. Causton convey the order, and the vehicle stops.

The two men alight, and dismiss the cabman. Mr. Causton takes from his pocket a bunch of keys that jingle softly, fits one into the keyhole of a little gate in the wall, which he pushes open quickly. They pass through, and the gate is silently closed behind them. Before them rise the frowning walls of an old house, standing dark and silent as a forest pool, in its own extensive grounds. They walk on beneath the black shadows of the giant elms, which softly moan like lost spirits as the breeze stirs their boughs. Then, without a word, the two men pass into the house by a back door. Their journey is over.

And all through that journey, the rearmost cab has followed in their wake. The woman in the dark cloak has sat immovable throughout, her eyes for ever fixed on the cab ahead. When the latter stops, she stops too, and dismisses her driver. From a distance she watches the two men pass through the gate in the wall; and then, drawing her cloak tightly round her, she flits like a spectre towards the spot where they have disappeared.

CHAPTER III.

Dr. Manisty Performs his Task.

The house into which the two men had passed was a rambling, grey structure. Although of only one storey, its lofty rooms and sloping roofs prevented any suggestion of squatness, while its ample doors and windows, and its solid walls, gave it an appearance of dignity that could not fail to impress the casual observer.

To the nostrils of Dr. Manisty and his guide, there rose, as they entered the broad stone passage that led to the kitchen, that strange, musty smell of nothingness which ever pervades a house lacking occupants. The bare appearance of the place, as displayed by the feeble light of wax matches which Mr. Causton struck on entering, bore out the suggestion of vacancy.

They reached the kitchen, a large, stone-paved place, and Mr. Causton lighted a lamp standing on the long dresser. An ordinary kitchen table and two or three chairs completed the furniture, but a bright log fire in the big, old-time grate sent out a grateful warmth, and prevented any feeling of desolation. But although suffering no physical discomfort, Dr. Manisty could not forbear glancing suspiciously round the almost empty apartment.

"Ah, doctor!" remarked Mr. Causton, at length breaking the silence, "you are wondering where you are. This place, as you doubtless gather, is the kitchen."

"I see—I see it is!" Ephraim Manisty responded huskily. His manner was that of a man engaged in a task about which he was uncertain. "Is the house empty?" he added with a quick, interrogatory glance round.

"Ordinarily—yes. At the moment—no. Besides ourselves my son is here, and—and your patient." Mr. Causton emphasised the last words strangely, and shot a keen glance at the doctor.

Ephraim Manisty shivered, in spite of the fire. His eyes roved round, and his hands twitched nervously as he replied:

"Ah, yes; my patient! Where is he?"

"You shall see him presently. Meantime you will have some refreshment."

Mr. Causton drew out from a cupboard a spirit tantalus, remarking as he did so:

"It's picnic style, I'm afraid, doctor. But we have no womenkind here, and you must excuse it. What will you take?"

Dr. Manisty indicated the whisky, and Mr. Causton poured him out half-a-tumbler. He himself took a little plain soda-water.

"And now, doctor," observed Mr. Causton, after Ephraim Manisty had taken two glasses of neat spirit, "you will be anxious to begin work."

Dr. Manisty rose unsteadily.

"I am ready!" he replied huskily.

"Good! then please come with me."

Out of the kitchen they passed, and along a short corridor. Then up four steps into what apparently was the hall. The carpetless oak floor echoed dully to their tread. At the sound, a door on the left opened. A head peered cautiously out.

"All right, Stephen!" Mr. Causton said in an undertone. "I have returned." Then a trifle louder, "My son, this is Dr. Ephraim Manisty."

The latter gazed unsteadily at the young man to whom he had been thus introduced, and bowed. Stephen Causton, with a suspicious glance, returned the bow.

"How is the patient, Stephen?" inquired Mr. Causton.

"Asleep!" returned the other. "He has been sleeping for the past hour."

"That's all the better. Come, doctor!"

Mr. Causton led the way into the room. There was a carpet here and a couple of comfortable armchairs drawn up close to the fire. Upon a table in the middle of the room was a lamp, turned low, and with a large red shade. Against the further wall stood an ancient four-post bed, hidden by curtains closely drawn. In the silence the regular breathing of a sleeping man could be heard.

Beckoning the doctor, Mr. Causton tip-toed to the bedside and drew back the curtains cautiously. Upon the bed, in a sound sleep, lay an old man. His hair was grey, and his face deeply lined. His arms lay outside the coverlet.

"This is your patient," Mr. Causton whispered.

Ephraim Manisty nodded.

"What do you want me to do?" he inquired.

Mr. Causton's eyes gleamed angrily.

"I have already told you," he said testily. "I want you to amputate his left arm."

"But there is nothing the matter with it," retorted the doctor, "It is quite sound—see!" He rolled back the sleeper's sleeve as he spoke. The sleeper half-turned and moaned.

"Hush!" said the elder Causton, "you will wake him and spoil all. Come away; I will talk to you in the kitchen."

He signalled with his eyes to his son, and once more led the way to the kitchen. Upon his face was a look of grim determination.

"Dr. Manisty!" he demanded, facing round. "Am I to infer that you are going to raise obstacles?"

"There is nothing the matter with the man's arm," Manisty said doggedly. "Why do you wish me to amputate it?"

"I am not going to discuss the matter further than to say because I do."

"Somewhat of a woman's reason, isn't it?"

"No; a determined man's." Causton looked at the other in a way that made the doctor quail. But, low as Manisty had sunk, he had still a minute spark of manhood in him. He pulled himself together, passing a hand over his throbbing head.

"Supposing I refuse to do what you wish?" he retorted.

"Then," said Causton, his eyes flashing, "you will never do anything else!"

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that you will never leave this house alive."

"What? You threaten me? I care nothing for your idle threats. You have tricked me into coming to this house." There was defiance now in the hitherto spiritless doctor. Causton regarded him coolly for a moment. Then, without the slightest perturbation, he drew from his pocket a revolver, and said calmly:

"That my threats are not idle this little weapon will prove. As regards tricking you, your contention is false. I made a specific bargain with you in your own house."

"But you didn't tell me that the man was quite well."

Mr. Causton waved his hand impatiently.

"I am not going to discuss the matter further," he said, and in his strange calmness there was sterner argument than any outburst of passion could have conveyed. "Let me state your position clearly. You undertook a task for which I offered to pay you one thousand pounds, and clinched the bargain by accepting a hundred on account. Complete the task, and you leave this house richer by nine hundred pounds. On the other hand, if you refuse, the circumstances of the case leave me no alternative but to kill you. No, no," he went on, observing the convulsive clenching of the doctor's fists, "it won't be of the slightest use your resisting. We are two to one," indicating his son, who stood in the background, "and we are armed. This house, as you have probably observed, is a secluded one, and any cries you may utter will have no chance of reaching the outer world. Now, what are you going to do?"

Dr. Manisty hesitated. He readily saw now that he was in grievous peril. If he refused to do this man's bidding, death stared him in the face. On the other hand, if he carried out the arrangement, he would gain a thousand pounds. Eyeing him carefully, Causton observed his wavering.

"Come, come," he encouraged. "You weren't so scrupulous about that British Oak insurance policy in the old days, you know. And in this case the risk is infinitesimal; besides, there's the thousand——"

"I'll do it!" Ephraim Manisty blurted the words out.

The man with the revolver said drily:

"I thought you would."

They returned to the bedroom. Dr. Manisty opened his case of instruments, keenly watched by the other two. A faint, sweet odour as of apples wafted through the room, and even while the man in the bed remained sleeping, the doctor administered chloroform. Its effects speedily became apparent. The breathing of the man in bed became slow, laboured, and stertorous; his pulse quickened. His face went pale and cold, and the whole muscular system relaxed.

A sound as of scratching on the curtained window caused the doctor to swerve round.

"What was that?" he asked. His manner and speech betokened a state of high nervous tension.

"It was merely the brushing of a branch against the window outside," replied the elder Causton. "Go on!"

There were no more interruptions. The doctor completed his task, and put away his instruments. As he snapped the case to, there came once more upon his ears that strange sound on the window.

"Someone is there!" the doctor cried hoarsely. "A spy, perhaps!" He dashed towards the window, snatched back the heavy red curtains, and pressed his face against the pane. But nothing met his sight except the drowsy movement of skeleton trees as they waved and moaned in the breeze.

"It was your fancy, doctor!" remarked Causton. "You are excited, and need sleep. Will you stay here till daylight? We can put you up."

"No, no," replied Ephraim Manisty, "I won't stay here. I will go now. I have been here long enough." He shuddered as he spoke. Causton had taken out his pocket-book, and the rustling of bank-notes was heard from his hand.

Miss Penhurst found herself suddenly confronted by Gerald Mortimer.

"Very well, as you will!" he rejoined. "Here, Dr. Manisty, is the conclusion of our bargain—nine notes of a hundred pounds each."

He passed the notes to the doctor as he spoke. The latter clutched them quickly, and thrust them into his pocket without even counting them. In a low voice he gave instructions as to the treatment of the sleeping man.

Two minutes later he had left the house. His grim task was done. In his pocket was his reward. But there was still a dull weight upon his brain that made him cast his eyes to the ground. And through his fevered mind there ran in endless repetition the query: "Where will this end? Where will this end?"

CHAPTER IV.

The Discovery in the Castle Ruins.

Breakfast at Moulstone Manor was an early institution. Even in winter the household rose betimes, while yet the sun appeared as a red ball of mist upon the eastern horizon, and the air was at its purest.

Thus it happened that, at eight o'clock on a morning divided from the memorable escape from the neighbouring asylum by about a week, Nina Penhurst, the governess, invited the younger Mortimer children who were her charges, to go for a walk.

"The day is so fine," she remarked to Mrs. Mortimer, "that I think it would be far better for the children to be in the air than shut up in the schoolroom."

"I'm quite sure it would, my dear," responded Mrs. Mortimer. "And better for you too. You are quite pale still. Indeed, since that fainting fit of yours the other day, you have not looked yourself at all."

"Oh, but I'm feeling very well now," Nina rejoined. "And to faint as I did was a stupid thing to do when there was no reason for doing it."

"Oh, but there was a reason, my dear child. Gerald was to blame entirely for talking to you about that unfortunate man who escaped from the asylum. Men are so brutal in speaking about these things. However, it's past now, and it's no use talking. Which way are you going to walk?"

"To the ruins, I think," Nina returned. "Gladys is so fond of them."

"Yes mamma," chimed in Gladys, a pretty little maid of ten. "Miss Penhurst knows everything about the ruins, and tells us such lovely tales of the knights and barons who used to live there."

"Well, Gladys, mind you profit by them, and you, Harold, be sure and not get into the moat; the water's very deep there, you know, at this time of year."

The road to Moulstone Castle, of which the mouldering ruins alone stood now as a rambling, grey memorial to the old Norman fortress, lay for a distance in the direction of the asylum. By mere coincidence was it that Nina Penhurst and the two children turned off at the very path by which the strange woman in the blue cloak had sped away from Gerald Mortimer on that eventful night recently. Across the hard, frost-bound land they walked, skirting the wood and emerging on the bank of the little river Kel, which flowed lazily in summer, but blithely enough now that the rains of winter had swollen it, along the bottom of the sloping wood.

Before them as they turned to the right rose the old ruins a quarter of a mile away. They had stood originally upon an eminence in one connected and symmetrical pile, but landslip after landslip had wrenched the foundations out of place till its appearance had become what it was now—a central tower surrounded by rough, grey, moss-grown walls, tilted at all imaginable angles, and looking for all the world like up-rooted trees.

It was among these crumbling walls, which, with undergrowth and creepers hanging from their sloping summits, formed innumerable caverns, that the Penhurst children loved to play. It was their delight to run from the side of their governess and hide from her, and she, entering into the spirit of juvenility, indulged them in their harmless pastime.

No sooner had they come within fifty yards of the outer walls than Master Harold and Miss Gladys set off at a great pace, shouting behind them as they ran, a request to their governess to try and find them.

Miss Penhurst, walking slowly on to give them time to conceal themselves, turned presently round the angle of a wall, and found herself suddenly confronted by—Gerald Mortimer.

Nina flushed a little as she bowed, and he raised his hat. Then a moment later she went pale again.

"Are you sorry to see me?" he asked gently.

She looked up quickly with a faint smile.

"Sorry," she repeated, "why of course not—why should I be?"

He fixed his eyes upon her face for one moment, then averted them.

"Why should you be?" he echoed, swinging the end of his stick against the hard ground. He himself was a trifle pale now, as he continued: "Of course there's no reason why you should be sorry to see me, is there?"

She looked up wonderingly. The words he had spoken puzzled her, not in themselves, but in the way he uttered them. But she only answered again:

"Of course not."

"And there's no reason why you should be glad either, is there?" He hazarded a quick glance at her again. She dropped her eyes and flushed once more. For a moment she knew not how to answer, but then she said:

"Really, Mr. Mortimer, I—but there, I'm forgetting all about the children. I promised to play hide and seek with them," And she made as though to move away.

But a restraining hand laid tenderly on her arm by Gerald held her back.

"No, don't go yet. Ni—Miss Penhurst. You can play with the children any time, and I want to speak to you now."

The softness of his touch upon her arm, the tenderness of his tone, and the earnestness of his face kept her motionless and silent. Her heart fluttered as she stood there, not daring to look up at him, or, indeed, anywhere, save on the ground.

"I have something to say to you," he went on, and there was a suspicion of a quaver in his deep voice which betrayed a great effort to control his emotion, "which is of more importance to me than anything else in the whole world. Miss Penhurst—Nina, I want to tell you that I love you, that——"

"Mr. Mortimer! you must not!"

"I loved you when I first saw you," he went on vehemently, unheeding her gasped interruption, "and since then my love has grown and grown till my whole heart and being is dominated by this one desire, that you will be my wife. Nina, say you will; don't keep me in——"

"Mr. Mortimer!"—she was trembling violently now—"you must not ask me. I ought not to have listened so long to you, but now that it is said, I can only beg of you never to revert to the subject again."

"But, Nina," he burst out again, unmindful of her disapproving look when he again used her Christian name, "you cannot mean what you say. I love you as man never loved a woman before, and I have thought that you— But no, you cannot mean what you say."

Nina turned her head away, incapable of witnessing his distress. But within her was a stern sense of duty which no compassion, no inclination to spare his feelings, must oppose. She brushed away hastily the tears that would bedew her eyes, forced back the lump that rose persistently in her throat, and spoke again.

"You must not—must not talk to me of—of these things."

"But why? Are you already——?"

"No, no," she broke in, divining what he would say, "there is no other man——"

"Then perhaps some day—you will let me hope?"

He looked eagerly at her, right into her eyes. Mournfully she shook her head.

"I must not deceive you," she said, in slow, sorrowful accents. "We are friends now; we can never be more. Ah! do not ask me to explain. There are reasons, good and sufficient, why, whatever my feelings may be towards you, I should never marry you."

"Whatever your feelings may be towards me!" he repeated. Then, unable to withstand further the great impulse of his heart, he stepped forward and took her in his arms. "Nina, Nina, my darling! Then you do love me. Say that you do!" and he kissed her passionately as he held her.

Whatever reply Nina Penhurst might have given at that moment was destined never to be uttered. For even as Gerald Mortimer held her in his arms, and bent down, waiting for her answering words, there suddenly broke upon their ears a cry.

A startled cry; the cry of a boy who shrank before some fearsome thing, and yet was spell-bound by it.

"What was that?" Nina released herself and listened for its repetition. Gerald was listening too. "It was Harold's voice. Ah! there it is again. It comes from the other side of the ruins. He is hurt, or in danger. We must go to him!"

But Gerald has dashed off already, and is nearing the source of the repeated cry. From the top of a knoll, he catches sight of his young brother, deep down in a grass-grown pit which an old landslip has formed. Little Harold is running to and fro, wringing his hands in terror, shrieking for Miss Penhurst, and ever and anon casting fearful glances into an ivy-grown hole, over which a section of wall hangs and forms a sort of cave.

In less time than it takes to write, Gerald is with him.

"What is it, Harold? What is the matter?"

"In there, see, in there. Oh! horrible!"

The boy's eyes and trembling hands point the way, and fearlessly Gerald steps forward, kicking the ivy aside as he advances. But he suddenly checks himself, and almost totters back, an affrighted cry upon his lips smothered with difficulty, as soon as instinct sends it there.

Irresolute he stands for a moment, with horror in his eyes. Then a questioning call comes to him from Nina, who is approaching, and stirs him to immediate action. He snatches at the ivy which grew all around, and piles it over the affrighting something. Then he steps out of the cave, seizes Harold in his arms, and hastens to meet Nina Penhurst.

"You mustn't tell Miss Penhurst what you have seen," he whispers hoarsely to the boy. "You mustn't tell her, do you hear, Harold?" And Harold hears, and is obedient.

Nina herself is too agitated by the memory of Gerald's recent words to put questions, and a specious reason is given by Gerald to account for Harold's cries. There is no suggestion to remain any longer, and Gladys approaching from the other side of the ruins at that moment, a start is made for home.

It is a silent little party as they return, and whatever talk there is, is by little Gladys, who alone has encountered no experience to numb her tongue. At the junction of the field path with the road, Gerald halts, and at length breaks the silence. He addresses Nina:

"I am going up to the asylum," he says, with an effort to be calm; "I want to see Dr. Branksome. Don't wait lunch. Possibly I may not be back." He lowers his tone and adds: "I will speak to you again to-night." Then he turns to his young brother with a whispered injunction:

"Mind, Harold, not a word about what you saw—not a word till I return home, you understand."

A second later and he is gone. For fifty yards he walks at his normal pace, for for that distance they whom he has just left can see him. But a bend of the lane hides him from sight, and he starts to run as though for dear life. Breathless, he reaches the asylum gates, and the porter, who knows him, admits him without question, but with wonder in his eyes at Gerald's haste. His intimacy with Dr. Branksome is close enough to render announcement unnecessary, and in a short space of time he bursts into the doctor's room.

"Branksome!" he gasps.

"Why, what's up, Mortimer? You look as if you had seen a ghost."

"Perhaps I have. I have just found a dead man!"

"Good Heavens, man! Where?"

"Under a wall in the ruins of Moulstone Castle. It is an old man dressed in asylum clothes."

"Asylum clothes—then it's Cordelvin, who escaped last week."

"Yes; that is what I thought. His face is somewhat disfigured, and he has only one arm!"

"One arm—but Cordelvin had two—I don't understand."

"There is evidently some mystery here. I didn't examine him closely. I had no time, as I will explain to you later, but his left arm seemed to have been amputated."

The doctor looked on with breathless interest. He turned to the wall and rang a bell.

"There is a mystery—a strange mystery," he said to Gerald. Then to the servant who appeared he added:

"Tell Beasley to get a stretcher party ready immediately to accompany me to the Castle ruins."

A little later Beasley and three other warders, bearing a stretcher between them, were on their way with Gerald Mortimer and Dr. Branksome to the fateful spot.

WOOING BY COMPACT.

How Francis Carleton Saved his Honour.

FRANCIS CARLETON woke with a headache; he turned from the glare of the midday sun, which had filtered through the lace draperies at his window, and rang the bell for his valet.

"Williams, what time it it?"

"'Alf after twelve, Mr. Francis, sir; breakfast will be ready in five minutes, sir."

"Hang breakfast! I was drunk last night wasn't I?" Williams coughed diffidently, behind a deprecating hand. Carleton sat up in bed and seized his pillow.

"Give me a straight answer or I'll chuck it," he threatened.

"Well, sir, per'aps as 'ow it wasn't last night, as one might say." He caught the flying pillow dexterously, without a change of countenance, and placed it upon a far-distant chair. Carelton had no more pillows; Williams had decidedly the advantage.

"Was I, or was I not, drunk at three of the clock this morning?" persisted Carleton.

"You was, sir," said Williams, driven to the wall.

"Williams," said his master, knitting his brows, "you are dismissed."

Williams bowed. "Will you get up, sir, or 'ave your coffee 'ere?" Williams had often been dismissed under like conditions.

"I mean what I say," said Francis Carleton, thrusting his feet into his slippers and his form into the costly dressing gown that Williams handed him. "I'm broke, Williams, utterly broke, and you're out of a job." Williams smiled. He had often heard that cant, and went on methodically laying out Carleton's immaculate morning toilet. An electric tinkle rent the air. Carleton started, it was so loud and peremptory. Williams answered it and brought back a card.

"Philippe Durano, ahem! we must dress at once; give him the morning papers, and make him comfortable in the library. He may join me at breakfast—or stay—we will call it luncheon, Williams. I have breakfasted long ago—years ago, I think," and Carleton plunged his handsome fair head into a basin of cold water. A quarter of an hour later he was shaking hands with a round-faced, chubby little man, while Williams brought in a small table as a preliminary to luncheon.

"You'll join me of course, Durano," said Carleton, "and we'll talk business over a bottle of your own old Burgundy, for I presume you've come to talk business."

"Yes—partly—I may say quite on business," said Durano, evidently ill at ease.

"Oh, well—well—we can settle all difficulties, I dare say; have a cigar while you wait," and Carleton dashed into bright and chatty talk of himself and his special circle—items in which he knew his visitor took an absorbing interest. The two men ate heartily, and when Williams had retreated Carleton passed the Burgundy and demanded:

"Now, Durano."

"I've come to the end of my tether; I cannot supply you any longer, Mr. Carleton."

"Indeed! What is the matter? Has your establishment gone to smash? Too bad! Is there anything I can do, old man?" Durano smiled; the situation was superbly ironical. Carleton smiled, too, somewhat lamely.

"Of course, I understand," he said, "you want some sort of a settlement, and I don't blame you in the least; but, I say, Durano, you are too much of a gentleman to press me now. I'm pledged for at least half a dozen more entertainments this season, and you surely won't forsake me."

"Not if you will allow me to receipt this," and Durano pushed a bill of large dimensions across the table; Carleton stared at it like one fascinated.

"I can't do it. I am living up to every penny of my income, and the governor has positively refused to advance another farthing. Have pity, my dear fellow you see before you the heir to millions—and a bankrupt." Durano shrugged his shoulders—the last trace left of his French extraction; in all else he was thoroughly English.

"I cannot be put off any longer—I have been very lenient."

"A regular brick," declared Carleton, hiding his quaking heart beneath a genial smile.

"I know what young fellows are; I sowed my own wild oats before I became a gentleman caterer." Carleton groaned in spirit—if only Durano would cut that!

"I didn't rise from head cook, I can tell you; I'd lowered my social standing when I began to make money."

"It doesn't raise one socially to lose it," sighed Carleton; "it's one of those instances where extremes meet; I like to shake hands and cry quits."

"So would I—perhaps we may—but I want you to understand that I don't bank on your prospects."

"Heaven forbid!"

"As I said," pursued Durano, sipping his Burgundy reflectively, "my business has hurt me socially, but I've made a great fortune—I could retire to-morrow if I chose, but I must be sure of regaining my old position—at least for Adrienne's sake."

"Adrienne—your daughter?"

"Yes—all that is left me besides my money."

"I did not know——" began Carleton.

"No, assuredly not, my Adrienne is far too fine a jewel to be flashed before all eyes. She has been educated abroad. This is her first winter at home."

"By Jove!" laughed Carleton. "Durano with a pretty daughter! I'll tell the fellows the next time we meet what a sly old boy you are!"

Durano pushed back his chair and faced his host threateningly. "I had a motive, Francis Carleton, in mentioning my daughter's name to you; that name is above reproach and must be held as sacred in your midst as the names of your sisters and sweethearts."

The little man looked several inches taller as he stood over Carleton, with flashing eyes, but he cooled down the next moment and took his seat again.

"I beg your pardon," said Carleton meekly.

Durano accepted the apology graciously. "There is a way out of your dilemma," he began after a pause. "I have but one proposition—you may accept or decline; it seems to me however that you should consider it seriously."

"Well——" said Carleton, leaning forward eagerly.

"My daughter is very handsome," pursued Durano, "She is cultured and refined, she has been accustomed always to the very best." He paused again.

"She has a good father," put in Carleton, to fill up the gap.

"I have great ambitions for her, she must marry among the best."

"Ah!" Carleton straightened up suddenly, but he could not afford to be angry just at that moment.

"I see," he remarked quietly. Durano breathed a sigh of relief.

"I'm glad I make my meaning clear, but I must speak even more plainly. I do not think, as you now stand, that you are an eligible parti."

"Hardly." Carleton smiled in spite of himself.

"You've been leading a gay life and are fathoms in debt, principally to me."

"Exactly."

"Suppers, dinners, luncheons, even breakfasts of the most elaborate description."

"Which you have itemised, no doubt."

"Assuredly, at the same time, you are on the social plane where I would like to place my Adrienne, stretch out your hand to her—and you owe me nothing."

Carleton broke into a nervous laugh. "My dear fellow, do you really mean what you say?"

"I do—see, I give you both sides of the picture—a continuation of this easy bachelor life, in these luxurious rooms, with every comfort about you, capped by a marriage, in every way a worldly triumph, or——"

Carleton put up both hands. "Don't give me the other side," he implored. "Look here, Durano, I'll be frank with you, I'm perfectly heart whole, I have yet to love a woman better than a horse—I'm not speaking of family ties, naturally they are born in one—but the love that leads to the altar and all that sort of thing, you know, has never gripped me. Now, as you are aware, my tastes are democratic, still I've never thought of looking for a mate out of my own sphere—I don't know if your sphere or mine is on top—that's neither here nor there. I'm not bragging about mine, but it's a ticklish business going out of doors when you're sought after at home."

"How if they knew about the debts?" suggested Durano.

"'All would be up with poor little Robin'—no papa-in law would have me, I seriously doubt if I'd have more than a bowing acquaintance with my own respected parent."

"Then consider——"

"Oh, I do—I'm considering past consideration—why, if you do not think me an eligible parti, do you thrust me on your daughter?"

"For reasons it is needless to state again. I do not wish to thrust you on my daughter, or her on you, I wish you to visit her as you visit young women of your own set—judge her by your own standards, as she will judge you by hers—the only difference will be, that you will come as a suitor— she being untrammelled."

"She is a woman; therefore to be wooed—
She is a woman, therefore to be won."

quoted Carleton softly. "Well, old man, it's a novel sort of scheme, if I go in seriously for this, you'll set me free, if I propose matrimony in due form, of course, how if she refuses me?"

"You will have done what you could—it would be your misfortune, and I can be generous, money is not my object. You are practically free from the day you ask Adrienne to marry you."

"It's a compact, then," said Carleton. "How long do you give me?"

"Six months."

"She'll never have me," was the young fellow's confident thought, "she's one of those beautiful creatures with high ideals." Aloud he asked:

"When shall we meet?"

"Dine with me on Monday," said Durano.

The Duranos lived at Richmond, and the house—built on a high elevation—faced a broad bend in the beautiful river.

The door was opened by a man in livery, who took his coat in quite the ordinary way, and Carleton was ushered into a beautiful drawing-room. His quick eye had scarcely time to take in the priceless simplicity and beauty of the whole when his host joined him, and presently there was a soft sound—which could scarcely be called a rustle—of trailing skirts, and a vision paused for a moment on the threshold.

A tall girl dressed in some soft, silky fabric of a deep yellow hue, came gracefully forward, in acknowledgment of her father's introduction. Carleton stared at her almost stupidly at first. Durano's daughter was certainly not what his fancy had painted; this queenly young woman with her olive complexion, her finely-chiselled features, her glorious eyes, her heavy coils of glossy black hair—was something to strike awe into his soul, she looked as if she had stepped from the frame of some old Venetian portrait, for her gown was somewhat mediæval in style, and the yellow rose worn in the low coiffure might have been a love token.

She seemed to fill the room with a rich, warm presence. Carleton forgot where he was—and how he came to be there—and he watched her admiringly as she presided at the perfectly appointed dinner, while Durano watched him, well satisfied at the way the affair was progressing.

Adrienne must have thought their guest unusually silent and hard to entertain—in reality, Carleton was enjoying a recreation not common among the men of his set, he was castle building, and having mentally ejected Monsieur Durano from his seat at this festive board, he and his hostess were dining alone, as a newly married pair should dine; she wore the yellow gown because he had first seen her in yellow, and the rose—why, he had given it to her, and she had gently kissed it before putting it in her hair; and those hands, moving so daintily, had he not kissed them over and over—were they not his to kiss whenever he wished?

"Are you fond of horses, Mr. Carleton?" she asked for the second time, her eyes full of suppressed laughter. Carleton roused himself, and his castle tumbled down like a house of cards.

"Horses? Ah, you've touched my weakest spot. And I've lost enough money in that quarter to buy a couple of racers."

"I don't wonder!" she exclaimed, sympathetically. "I went once to the Grand Prix at Paris, and I lost m head as well as a fat little capital I'd taken with me to use discreetly. Since then I've not been tempted to go to a race, but I love to ride and my own horse is a beauty, a black, slim creature, and swift as a bird."

"Perhaps you'll let me join you occasionally, I can always get a mount, and I know the roads so well I would certainly prove an excellent guide."

She accepted his offer with evident pleasure.

"You cannot tell what a boon you are bestowing," she said gratefully, "one cannot enjoy and discuss nature with one's groom, and the out-of-door life tempts me so often, to the exclusion of other duties. I'm afraid," with a smile, "I will never make a conventional society woman, I'm too fond of my freedom."

Carleton nodded approvingly. "That's right, stay where you are, Miss Durano, the society woman would not be your sort—too much striving and straining."

"For what?" asked Adrienne, turning to him.

"For one thing—position; they all want to be first."

"And then?"

"Well, there's a grave problem which always confronts them—how to satisfy 'a champagne appetite on a beer income'—to use a trite phrase—very serious, I assure you. I've tried such mental arithmetic myself—it's—it's dispiriting—it sinks one's ideals—it brings one face to face with such depressing reality."

Adrienne looked at him critically. "You don't bear any scars," she said.

"Because I've been keeping up the champagne diet, regardless of consequences; sometimes consequences come home to roost."

He threw just a little pathos into his tone, and his handsome face looked so grave, that Adrienne smiled with added friendliness and Durano almost chuckled over his wine. Carleton was moving things quickly.

On the young man's part he tried not to think of the odious compact to which he owed the birth of this new friendship; this girl with the wonderful eyes, her sweet voice, her indescribable grace, had all unconsciously cast a spell about him. He had meant to go a-courting in a calm, deliberate manner, to propose in due form, accept his inevitable rejection stoically, and Monsieur Durano's receipted bill with well-concealed triumph.

But now what a difference! He only remembered that he was young, and that she was young and beautiful and that life and love were for such as they; and she saw the love in his eyes and liked the numberless unspoken tokens which marked his intercourse with her.

Williams' position became somewhat of a sinecure; regular hours marked his master's rising and retiring, the days were spent in active, healthful exercise, and Williams grew sleek and fat from regular living. No more champagne suppers, no more carousals at the club, all of which signs Williams accepted with the stolid indifference of his order. But when it came to rising betimes of a Sunday, and making devout preparation for church, and tenderly nursing a great bunch of violets, which was certainly not intended for a boutonnière—then, as Williams stood at the window and watched the athletic young figure go swinging down the street, he put up a discreet hand—and smiled behind it.

As for Adrienne, she was woman enough to see that something beyond a mere desire to be agreeable brought the young man so often to her father's house, and, womanlike, she could not help rejoicing over the power she had to draw him away from the great world, about which her father talked so constantly.

The allotted time was fast approaching and Carleton had not yet spoken.

Once he came dangerously near it when they were riding together in a narrow bridle path, the groom far behind and she close to him—so temptingly close, but he was man enough to stifle the longing, perhaps he was not so sure of himself and of her as he had been when Durano and he had hatched their little scheme. At any rate, he looked far from happy, on a certain morning, when he was admitted into Durano's private office. Durano eyed him keenly, but said nothing beyond the usual greeting—he well knew the cause of this visit; the period of probation was over, but he was willing to allow for the hesitation of the real lover, which Francis Carleton had proved himself to be.

"You noticed, perhaps," remarked Carleton, plunging characteristically into the midst of things, "that I have failed to fulfil my part of that very remarkable treaty we made six months ago."

"Oh, yes—yes—but I'm in no hurry — take your time—a few days, more or less, will make no difference—I can see you are in earnest."

"In such deadly earnest that I altogether refuse to make the deal. No—hear me first—I will not so insult the woman I love as to buy her at any price, and I will owe her father no debt when I ask Adrienne to marry me. I must look once into those clear eyes without feeling like a cur, and there is but one way."

"And what will you do, my friend?" Durano asked

"Work."

"So? You can break stones then?" sarcastically.

"No, but I can read law. I am to enter an office next week."

"Good, you have energy."

"I needed the incentive. See here, Durano, I've not kept the compact. I must pay the forfeit, but I won't go to my father. Can you wait for me?"

Durano stretched out his hand.

"I'd cancel the whole affair if I did not know my man so well. It is not the money I want, Carleton. I've told you that before."

"It is your daughter I want, and I'm going to have her, Heaven helping me," and Carleton gripped the proffered hand, and strode to the door.

"Amen," said Durano, when he found himself alone.

Carleton went home and wrote to his father a short non-committal letter, as he thought, telling of his plans and his desire to settle down and give his life a practical aim. By return post he received the following note:

> My Dear Boy—Send me her photo—for, of course, there's a woman in the case—there always is. You forgot to ask for a cheque. I herewith inclose it. Have you been ill? The law pays well. Stick to it. Ever your loving father,
> Francis Carleton.

P.S.—Provided she be good and beautiful I forgive and bless you.

Francis Jr. gasped at the amount of the cheque, it was more than enough to satisfy Durano and other creditors—and left him free to—to——

Society raised its twenty eyebrows, when close upon the news of Francis Carleton's serious turn towards business came the cards announcing his quiet marriage. Society also raised twenty hands and ten voices in vigorous protest. But what was done was done, and as no one could serve like Durano it was well not to push him too far. Of course there were ways of letting the newly-married couple see—but this resolution had nothing to do with the crush at young Mrs. Carleton's first "at home."

The Story of a Jealous Girl.

A YOUNG couple, very recently engaged, were discussing a question of grave importance.

The young lady held in her hand an invitation to spend the month of September at Meadow View, a friend's beautiful home in the Welsh mountains.

The young man said earnestly:

"You know, Gertrude, that I'm going there next week to fish and hunt. The other guests—quite a house party—will come the first week in September. You must give me your promise to accept Mrs. Black's invitation."

The young lady thoroughly understood the charm of girlish caprice, and the mingled fascination and annoyance her lover experienced in never knowing what she would do, think, or say. She answered with composure:

"I think I shall spend the month at Mont Eagle. I have heard that Mrs. Black is a charming hostess. I am sure that you will find her guests congenial and enjoy your outing."

She expected a violent protest, and felt assured that her decision would regulate the duration of his visit.

"We have reached the parting of our ways very soon, haven't we, Gertrude? Well, I give in, and hope you may have at Mont Eagle as much fun as I intend to have at Meadow View."

Two weeks later he wrote:

"Do you remember Miss Drumgoole's book, 'The Valley Path?' I have found the people of whom she writes. They are the aborigines of the hills. They fascinate me. I feel that I am continually discovering new types of humanity; and, Gertrude, I have found Lissie of 'The Valley Path.' Strange to say she is wonderfully like you. I often look at the flower-like face of this child-woman and wonder if a cruel fate will blight its beauty, or love some day wake her sleeping soul to a consciousness of happiness now unknown. I am at her cottage quite often, for her father is a great hunter and fisherman, to whom I have attached myself. He is a quaint old codger, whom Miss Drumgoole would immortalise.

"Nance often goes with us on our expeditions. She is quite familiar with the lore of the forest, knows the nature of all wild things, from the gulls which build their nests in the cliffs to the sparrows which answer her call. You would be amused at the 'curious' questions she often 'axes' me. I am her pupil and her teacher. She unfolds for me the mysteries of stream and woods, and I tell her of the life beyond the hills.

"She is a psychological study to me. Her mind unfolds like the petals of a white flower. Of course, her charm for me is because she is you, sweetheart, before you were touched with the wand of accomplishment and culture. You cannot realise how beautiful, how free life seems to me here among the everlasting hills. The very atmosphere seems saturated with dreamy romance. The haze on the hills, the rhythm of the river, the blended fragrance of tangled creepers and wild mountain flowers awaken me to a new experience of existence.

"Yesterday we went fishing, had a picnic in the woods. Doctor and Mrs. Black, old Fred Brown, Nance, and I composed the party. I caught one trout which weighed—but, excuse me, dear, I forgot that you feel no interest in such sport.

"The guests for September come next week. I think it a desecration that Mrs. Black's 'lodge in the wilderness' should be brought in touch with the outer world. You wounded me just a little when you preferred Mont Eagle to Meadow View, but I see that you were right. You always are. The hill country here would be unbearable to you when contrasted with that ultra-fashionable resort."

It was a coincidence that with this letter came one from Mrs. Black asking her to exercise a woman's prerogative, change her mind, and come to the wilds.

* * * * *

They were standing upon the heights looking down upon the river. He was pointing out the beauties of the scene. Her manner had lost its piquancy. She was listless and depressed. For an hour and a half she had waited for him to speak of Nance. For exactly that length of time he had waited for her to do the same thing. At last she casually remarked:

"Where is your wood nymph? Shall I not have the pleasure of meeting her?"

"No; she is dead."

"Dead!"

"I mean she has never been born; has never walked the earth in mortal form. Lissie was the creation of Miss Drumgoole's fancy, Nance of mine."

Then this utterly depraved young man threw himself upon the ground and laughed until the birds hushed their songs.

The girl became the impersonation of wrath and indignation. She turned to leave the spot, but he caught her hand and said:

"Gertrude, sweetheart, don't be too hard on me. I wanted you. I could not stay here and you at Mont Eagle, so I just baited a little trap with jeal—curiosity, I mean, and in you walked like the unsuspecting darling which you are. You would not come to oblige me but Nance Brown——"

"You are the most perfectly horrible——"

"Speak out, Gertrude, call me anything you wish—a beast, a reprobate, anything—I'll bear it all!"

Ripples of mirth and gurgles of laughter broke up the mock penitence, as he added:

"That Nance business was an inspiration."

EDWARD FARRELL CHEMIST

By Philip Moon.

IV.—THE HIDDEN MESSAGE.

EDWARD FARRELL had finished his breakfast, and was leisurely looking over his correspondence for the morning.

His letters were usually of a very varied and miscellaneous character, and this morning they were apparently no exception to the rule. There were book circulars, letters from students seeking his help, bills for chemicals and apparatus, notes from fellow scientists, and, in fact, all the varied collection of circulars and letters that usually welcomes the average scientific man at his matutinal letter opening.

Most of Farrell's letters were easily and quickly dealt with, but one seemed to greatly puzzle him. It was from his very old friend, Professor Sheyne, and had the appearance of having been hurriedly written. Farrell read it over once again.

"Dalton House, Woodford.

"Dear Farrell,—I inclose you the list of formulæ you asked me for, I think if you write them out according to their common names, study them well, and act as they suggest, you will find them all you need—but you will have to hurry with your investigation.

"Fe, NH_3, Hg, F, C_2H_4, As_2S_2, KOH, C_2H_6, $C_6H_{10}O_5$, NH_3, H_2O, Sb, Y, CH_2O_2, O, Pb, CaO, C_2H_4, H_2O, $CaCO_3$, H, Pb_3O_4, As_2S_3, Hg, C_2H_6, HCL, C_2H_6, Pb, KCL.

"Yours truly,

"RICHARD SHEYNE."

"What on earth does he mean?" Farrell ejaculated, after a puzzled pause; "the list of formulæ that I asked him for? He must be dreaming, or else I asked him in my sleep.

"Then what does he mean; to act as they suggest? What on earth should they suggest to any sane man? They appear to be only a list of the formulæ of some very common substances."

Farrell mused a little longer.

"I can't make head or tail of it," he said to himself, at length, "they are no earthly use to any investigation I am making."

"Perhaps," continued he, "it's only a joke of Sheyne's. Let's see what it looks like when they are written out as he suggests, with their common names."

He took a sheet of paper lying on his desk, and scribbled out the names of the substances represented by the symbols in the letter.

This is the record the paper held.

Iron, ammonia, mercury, flourine, olefiant gas, realgar, caustic potash, ethane, dextrin, ammonia, water, antimony, yttrium, formic acid, oxygen, lead, lime, olefiant gas, water, chalk, hydrogen, redlead, orpiment, mercury, ethane, hydrochloric acid, ethane, lead, potassium chloride.

Farrell stared long and fixedly at the paper, but with apparently no result.

"It's a mystery," he said, "or, if it's a joke, I fail to see the point."

Then, as he continued to pore over the paper, he suddenly drew a sharp breath, and uttered an exclamation of surprise.

"I see it," he cried, "the first letters of the common names are a hidden message to me," and he snatched up another piece of paper, and hurriedly wrote out the first letter of each substance in the order it stood on his list. This time the paper read like this I.A.M.F.O. R.C.E.D. A.W.A.Y. F.O.L.L.O.W. C.H.R.O.M.E.H.E. L.P.

Farrel gave a low whistle of astonishment. "This appears to be anything but a joke," he said. "'I am forced away follow chrome help'—whatever does it mean? It is evident that Sheyne is in trouble of some sort, and wants me to go to him; but what he means by 'following chrome,' I can't make out. The first thing to do is evidently to get to Woodford as quickly as I can, then I can, perhaps, find out more about it."

He hastily ran through the remaining letter or two of his morning correspondence, and then rushed off as fast as train and cab could take him to Woodford.

Sheyne's residence, Dalton House, stood on the outskirts of the delightful suburb of Woodford, near to the fringe of Hainault, or Epping Forest.

It was a pretty and a comfortable house, standing in small grounds of its own, and not inconveniently crowded by its neighbours. Professor Sheyne was a fortunate man in more senses than one.

Possessed of good means and a great love of scientific pursuits, he was able to indulge the one at the expense of the other.

He had built himself a spacious laboratory at the far end of his grounds, and there, when not lecturing to his Cambridge students, he spent most of his time. His sister, Amy, kept his comfortable bachelor's home for him, and tended him with the indulgent love of an only sister. Yes, Richard Sheyne was a fortunate man; of that there could be no doubt.

He had lately been engaged upon the absorbing problem of gold extraction, and it was widely rumoured among his scientific friends that he had succeeded in perfecting a process that would probably revolutionise the whole of the gold extraction industry. Rumour even went so far as to say that a powerful South African Syndicate had approached him with the object of acquiring his secret in return for which they offered him an altogether fabulous sum of money. How far rumour was correct, Farrell had never tried to discover, except that he knew with certainty that Sheyne's researches had, of late, led him into the region of gold extraction.

As soon as Farrell's cab came to a standstill before the door of Dalton House, he sprang out, and hurried into the house. Amy Sheyne came into the drawing-room almost immediately, with a smile of welcome on her face.

"Good morning, Mr. Farrell. To what fortunate chance do I owe this pleasure? I hope you have not called to see my brother, because he was called away unexpectedly last night, and has not yet returned."

Farrell was rather astonished at his welcome. Evidently Richard Sheyne's sister had no suspicion that all was not well with her brother.

What could it mean? For a moment the suspicion crossed Farrell's mind that he had been hoaxed, but he dismissed the thought as soon as it had formed, he knew Richard Sheyne too well to entertain such a notion long.

He debated with himself as to whether he had better disturb Amy Sheyne's peace of mind with his vague misgivings. He knew her to be a brave little lady, however, and quickly decided that it would be best to be quite open with her.

"Did you see your brother before he left?" he asked. "Was anyone with him, or did he go alone? I am anxious because I received this letter this morning, and to my mind it points to your brother's absence as enforced rather than voluntary." And Farrell produced Sheyne's letter, and his own paper containing the solution of the cipher message.

Amy Sheyne's face went a shade whiter as she listened to Farrell's explanation, but she showed no other sign of weakness.

"It is very certain," she said when Farrell had finished, "that my brother has been forced away against his will. He did not come to the house himself, but sent a message by a man, who called himself a friend of his, to say he was called away suddenly, and might not be home for a night or two, and adding that I was not to worry.

"I know how eccentric Richard is, and how often he rushes off without a moment's warning, so I was perfectly satisfied, and should have rested perfectly content for a week yet, if it had not been for your letter.

"What can we do Mr. Farrell? That is the question. Shall we inform the police, or telegraph for a detective?" And her pretty face looked towards him for help. Then, after a short pause, she asked, "Whatever does Dick mean by 'follow chrome?' Can you understand it? You must help me," she said, with a pathetic look. "What shall we do?"

Farrell listened to her appeal very quietly, but the serious look on his face had deepened.

"You may depend, Miss Sheyne," he said "that all that is within my power shall be done for the sake of my friend and your brother. No! I don't think we will trouble anyone yet. I will look round first myself, and see if I can find any clue to work upon.

"I can't make out what your brother means by 'follow chrome,' but, perhaps, when I see the laboratory I may find some explanation of the matter there. Let us go to the laboratory first of all."

Amy Sheyne assented, and they went out through the open casement, across the lawn, and under the green trees to the low, one-storey building at the end of the garden.

It was Richard Sheyne's laboratory. The door was closed, but not locked. Farrell opened it, and they both entered.

The blinds were down, and a solitary Bunsen was still burning on the bench.

Farrell raised the blinds, and then started a careful survey of the whole place. Windows, bench, bottles, floor—all came in for a share of his keen observation. The bottles especially he examined most carefully. One standing on the bench near the Bunsen was empty, but it, nevertheless, claimed most of his attention.

It was labelled "Potassium Chromate." On the bench near by stood a beaker, in the bottom of which a few drops of a yellow solution still remained.

This he also examined most carefully, and tested a drop of it with another solution, which he took from the bench of reagents at his side.

It turned blood red under the test.

Then, for a long time, he remained standing, lost in deep thought, with Amy Sheyne waiting patiently at his side. He roused himself at length, and again turned his attention to the floor. Just at the foot of the bench was a tiny patch of faint yellow, and from it, leading towards the laboratory door, a faint row of splashes. Farrell opened the door and examined the path outside.

On the step were undoubtedly two splashes similar to those inside, but beyond the step nothing could be seen.

Anything that had fallen there had apparently been soaked up by the gravel.

Farrell returned to the laboratory, and emptied the reagent he had already used for testing the potassium chromate into a wash-bottle. Armed with this he again examined the path outside.

The spots on the step turned a deep blood red as soon as the solution touched them, and down the gravel path at fairly regular intervals little blobs of dark red appeared as if by magic, under the influence of Edward Farrell's wash-bottle. He apparently had found all he sought, and he returned to Amy Sheyne in the laboratory with that look of eager but suppressed excitement on his face that always characterised him when some carefully followed out line of thought had been brought to a successful issue, and presented fresh and important possibilities. There was a questioning look on Amy Sheyne's face, and he hastened to comfort her.

"I think we are on the track, now," he said, "but you must leave the rest to me. Return to the house, and be as patient as you can. I will explain afterwards, and will let you know at once if anything important transpires."

* * * * *

Left to himself, Edward Farrell made up a large beakerful of the reagent he had been using, found up a spraying-bottle from amongst Professor Sheyne's apparatus, and filled it from the beaker.

Then he carefully locked the laboratory door, and proceeded down the gravel path, examining it attentively all the way by means of the spray.

At one point the blood-red spots failed to appear, and Farrell found that they there turned to the right in the direction of a small garden gate that opened on to a quiet by-road.

He did not wait to examine all the space between the main path and the garden gate, but went direct to the pavement outside.

There, to his joy, he could distinctly see on the clean York flagging a succession of faint yellow splashes.

He followed them easily to the corner, only calling his spray into requisition when in doubt, and never did he appeal to it in vain.

Always with unerring certainty it brought up in one direction or another the dark blood-red stains.

Once Farrell had to return to the laboratory for a fresh supply of reagent from the large bottle, and, at another time, he had to wait at a rather busier street than usual for at least a quarter of an hour before he could push on unobserved.

Comparatively slow though his progress was, however, it was nevertheless sure. After traversing nearly half a mile, and working for about an hour and a half, he was at last rewarded. The splashes led him to the entrance of a rather secluded house, right on the border of the forest.

The house stood well back from the road, and was approached by a neglected grass-grown gravel path, down the first foot or two of which Farrell had no difficulty in tracing the tell-tale splashes.

When he was assured that the splashes really did lead to the house, he quietly and quickly withdrew to the corner of the street. He was convinced now that his friend, Professor Sheyne, was a prisoner in that lonely house, and that he had with a brilliant forethought managed to plan this means of tracing his prison, trusting to Farrell's own shrewdness to discover the plan.

There were many things about it Farrell could not understand; but the main thing just then was how to communicate with and rescue his friend.

He would have dearly liked to tackle the task single-handed, but for his friend's sake he wanted to make no mistake.

So, with all dispatch, he made his way to the high road, and the police-station, and told his tale to the inspector in charge. That worthy was much impressed with Farrell's story, the more so, when he became aware of his visitor's identity, and he speedily promised to do all that Farrell asked.

Two men were found up, and told off to accompany Farrell.

They each took a revolver from the police stores, and, thus armed, departed with Farrell for the suspected house. Farrell was pleased to see that they were intelligent men, and could be trusted to act promptly if occasion demanded it.

Arrived at the house, Farrell marched boldly down the gravel path with one officer, and rang a loud peal on the door-bell, the other officer, in the meantime, making his way to the back of the house as best he could, with orders to prepare for any eventualities in that direction.

The peal had hardly died away ere steps were heard inside, and someone came whistling along the hall towards the door.

The door opened, and a hasty vision was had of a well-dressed, well-set up man of about forty years of age.

No sooner did the door open enough for him to catch sight of the policeman's uniform behind Farrell, however, than he hastily endeavoured to close the door again.

But Edward Farrell was too quick for him. With a quick bound he was inside, and wrestling for all he was worth with his opponent.

The policeman followed him, and together they soon had the man helpless at their feet.

At the noise of the scuffle a door upstairs opened, and another man came hurriedly down the stairs with a pistol in his hand to see what all the noise was about. He was also well-dressed, like his fellow, but apparently somewhat younger.

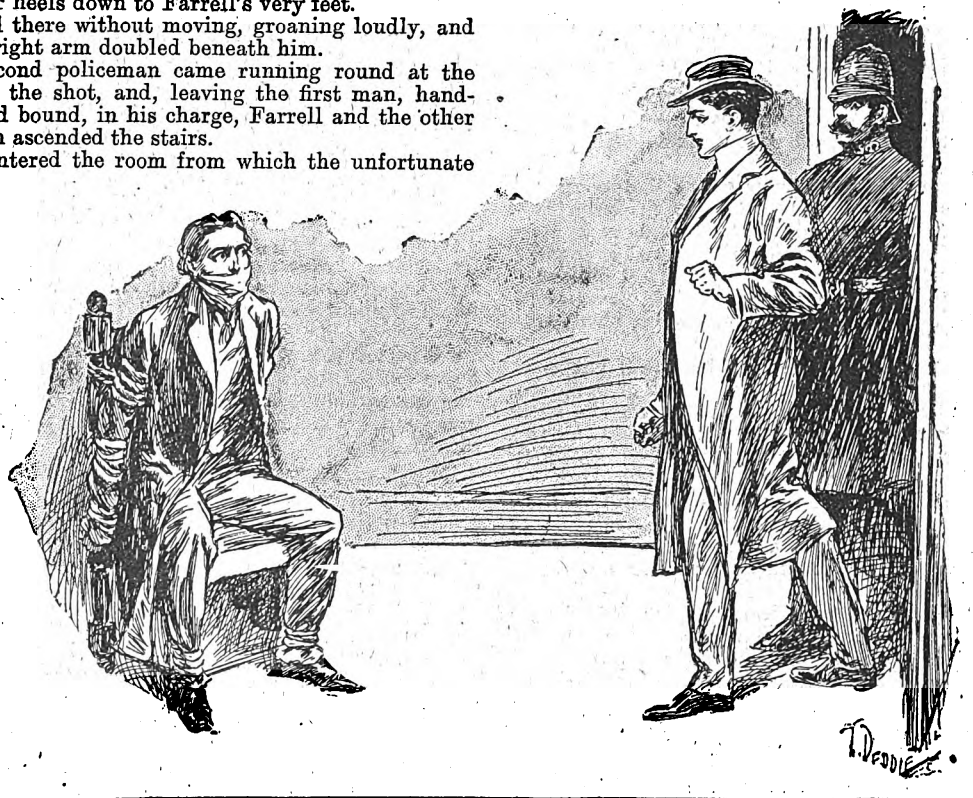
At the sight of Farrell and the policeman in the hall below, he tried to stay his hasty downward rush, with the evident intention of seeking safety above.

As he turned he hastily fired his pistol in their direction, fortunately without hurting either Farrell or the policeman, but, in the act of turning, his feet tripped in the loose carpet on the stairs, and he came head over heels down to Farrell's very feet.

He laid there without moving, groaning loudly, and with his right arm doubled beneath him.

The second policeman came running round at the sound of the shot, and, leaving the first man, handcuffed and bound, in his charge, Farrell and the other policeman ascended the stairs.

They entered the room from which the unfortunate man downstairs had emerged; and there, sitting bound and gagged against the wall, Edward Farrell beheld his friend, Richard Sheyne.



There, sitting bound and gagged, Edward Farrell beheld his friend Richard Sheyne.

Quickly they released him from his bonds, though it was some time before he could move with comfort.

"I am not surprised to see you," he said to Farrell, when the gag was removed, adding, with a smile, "that's a good compliment to you, eh?"

Then, pointing to a brown bag that stood in a partly-dried pool of yellow in the corner of the room, he asked: "Is that the clue that helped you to get here so soon? Not a bad idea was it?"

"There are several things I can't make out," said Farrell, "although most of it is pretty clear; but your sister is very anxious, and if you feel able we will return to Dalton House at once, and you can tell me your tale then." Then, to the constable at his side, "You had better fetch a doctor at once for the man downstairs, and then you and your comrade can arrange for the removal of both prisoners. I will call in at the police-station later."

* * * * *

When they were all sitting round the dining-room table at Dalton House later, and the thankful greetings of Amy Sheyne were over, Farrell turned to Sheyne, and said:

"Now, Richard, old fellow, if you feel quite equal to it I am anxious to hear your story."

"Not more anxious than I am to tell it," replied Sheyne, with a smile, "for it's one of the prettiest pieces of scientific collusion I have come across for a long while. Rogues must beware of the wiles of the scientist—eh? But to my story. You know, of course, that I have been investigating a new method of gold extraction lately. You don't know, perhaps, how eminently successful that new method is. Others do, however. How they found out I know not, but certain it is that more than one knows of its success.

"A well-known South African syndicate have already approached me for the purpose of acquiring my secret, but up to the present with no definite result.

"Well, last night, I was writing in my laboratory, when the door suddenly opened, and the two gentlemen you have captured to-day entered.

"After a certain amount of beating about the bush they came to the object of their visit, and that was my secret.

Digitized by Google

"Naturally I refused to listen to them in any way, whereupon the younger man drew a pistol from his hip pocket, and politely informed me that to have my secret they were determined, but had anticipated opposition, and arranged accordingly.

"They further explained that they had temporarily rented a house in the neighbourhood, and suggested that it would be well for me to accompany them thither, when I could discuss their terms, and give them a practical demonstration of my process. All this, mind you, with frequent and suggestive glances at the pistol.

"I could see I was trapped. No one was likely to disturb them, as my laboratory," with a sly glance at his sister, "is regarded as sacred by all my household, and any call for help would only have meant speedy violence. Suddenly, it flashed upon me that I might trick them, if only I could communicate with you in some way.

"So as to put them off their guard, I appeared to agree entirely with their suggestion as the only thing possible for me. I then said that I was about to write to a scientific friend when they entered, and as it was a most important letter for him I should feel obliged if they would allow me to write and send it, casually remarking at the same time that, of course, they could read it to see that all was fair.

"They did not like the delay a little bit, but eventually agreed to let me have my way, and gave me five minutes in which to prepare. I dashed off the letter you, no doubt, received, and easily interpreted, for to a sceintific man it was absurdly clear, eh? and then gathered together a few chemicals to take with me. They read the letter and were quite satisfied with its genuineness, and watched me prepare a solution of chromate of potash without any suspicion, imagining, of course, that it was intended for their edification later on.

"I packed all the chemicals in the old, brown leather bag you saw in the corner of the room, but in putting in the chromate solution purposely managed to let the stopper fall out.

"Naturally, the solution flooded the bag, and came slowly drip, drip, drip, through the stitches at the bottom—supplying the track that was to enable you to trace my whereabouts.

"They suspected nothing, and imagined that I should reveal all when I reached their house.

"That, to their discomfiture, I absolutely refused to do, and they have since tried by all the means in their power to wring my secret from me by force. They were just about to try again to-day, when your opportune arrival successfully frustrated all their plans. But," turning to his sister, "did you not feel alarmed at my absence last night?"

"No," replied Amy, with a smile, "they did their work thoroughly; one of them came with a message from you, so he said, to say that you were called away suddenly for a day or two. So you see I was quite unsuspicious. I know how unaccountable you are, you know," she added, coyly.

"You haven't asked me yet," said Farrell to Sheyne, "how I managed to track the chromate so easily."

"I don't need to," rejoined Sheyne, with a laugh, "the silver stains are still on your fingers. Silver nitrate makes a fine red with a chromate doesn't it?"

Then then both laughed merrily together.

"I saw where your tracks passed a pillar box," began Farrell again, "I suppose that's where you posted my letter. But, what on earth kept you from shouting out or breaking away from those fellows when you were in the public streets?"

"Well, you see," explained Sheyne, "they were altogether too friendly and considerate. They insisted it was cold enough for a cape, and, as it might be tiring for me to walk alone, one of them took my arm. Their kindness was deceitful, however, for under the cape I could feel a pistol pressed close to my side. No, old fellow, I walked very steadily, I can assure you, I don't believe in tempting Providence."

"Well," replied Farrell, "thank Heaven you are safely through it." Then, raising his glass to his lips, he said, with a smile:

"Let us pledge our loved science, by whose aid alone we triumphed!"

[Next Week: THE RARE MINERAL.]

A Method in His Madness.

"You must be very fond of me," she murmured. "What makes you think so?" he asked in tones of tenderness. "Because you have only known me a week, and yet my little brother says that he has seen you hanging about our house every day since we became acquainted. Such ardour, I am afraid, will not last." "Shall I tell you why I have been hanging about your house during the day?" he asked, as he pressed the tiny hand which rested so lovingly and so confidingly in his own. "Tell me." "I am trying to get acquainted with the dog."

A Sudden Change.

At a drapery sale recently, two ladies got hold of what they thought to be the last pair of cheap gloves at the same moment. Each gave a pull—a long pull and a pull together. The gloves did not part, and one lady tartly remarked: "I got hold of them first." "I beg your pardon, madam, I was the first one." Then each gave another pull at the gloves. "Ladies," said the assistant, who had observed them, "we have six dozen of those same gloves." "I'm sure I don't want them," snapped one of the ladies, as she released her hold of the gloves. "They're miles too big for me," retorted the other, as she dropped them on the counter.

Can a Woman Educate Her Husband?

CAN a woman educate her husband? "Wato" puts me a question to this effect, which so reminds me of a case of a girl I know who succeeded in doing so that I think I will tell you about it. She was a very pretty girl and well bred, and positively hated anything like vulgarity. But, somehow, when her destined husband came along, he had the one fatal defect of dropping his "h's" and speaking ungrammatically. Otherwise, he was the best fellow in the world, and was well fitted by position and character to make her thoroughly happy. But to have an ungrammatical husband! The thought haunted her every time he spoke, but she was afraid to tell him of it for a long time. But at last she plucked up courage, and every time he made a mistake she would laughingly tell him of it.

She was so very good-humoured over it, that he did not take offence at all, but still he could not bear being laughed at, and bit by bit he grew out of the habit until now he never on any account drops his "h's." I think "Wato" might try the same course, taking care to treat his little defect as a joke, and making him see his failing in much the same way as when one is told one has a smut on the nose.

The Stage-struck Girl Turns up Again.

I VERY much sympathise with "Wallflower," who is in love with a girl who seems to be very flighty and to have little common sense. Among other things, including extravagance, she wants to go on to the stage, and nothing seems to convince her otherwise. She has spent her youth in Africa, and has only just come to England. How should "Wallflower" act? Well, I do not know of any more difficult thing than to convince a person against going on to the stage. Reasoning seems very little use in such cases, and I have seen so many friends, male and female, who drift into the lower theatrical ranks, and finally lose all touch with ordinary life, that I have almost given up the idea of ever trying to reason with them.

The best thing would be for "Wallflower" to take his sweetheart to some of the theatrical quarters of London, and let her see just what the condition of the average out-at-elbow actor or actress is, and to tell her that these people, too, at one time thought themselves embryo Irvings and Bernhardts. If she is a vain girl, perhaps this would awaken her to common sense. At the same time, while she has stage fever, my correspondent would do well not to think of marriage.

Be Gentle when Telling a Man you do not Love him.

MANY correspondents this week, including "S. A. L.," "Tom," and others, write to me of complications which result from their discovering, after having gone a certain distance with a friend of the opposite sex, that there is someone else they like better, and ask me how they should act. For instance, "S. A. L." finds that she loves her existing fiancé's brother better than himself, and Tom has fallen in love with the friend of his fiancé, but the former is a girl of sensitive feeling, and does not want to appear to be drawing her friend's lover from her, and matters are at a standstill.

I am reminded of a girl acquaintance of mine who, for a long time, was on the most intimate terms with a man, but shortly after actually fell in love with someone else. She did a thing that brought on herself a great deal of abuse, but I think, on the whole, she was right. That was to write to the first man and tell him perfectly candidly that she was not in love with him, and that he was not the man she could marry. It was a terrible blow to his vanity, but the result was an extremely happy marriage between herself and the second man, which has scarcely been clouded by one quarrel. Now, had this girl been less candid, and, instead of telling the real truth about her affections, made a lot of false pretensions, instead of two beings being made permanently happy at the cost of the injured vanity of a third, all three would to this day have been, perhaps, broken lives.

A Good Word for the "Wild" Young Man.

I AM very glad to be able to put in a word for that kind of young man who is reputed to be "wild," and "not a gentleman," and all sorts of other dreadful things. "Troubled Heart" is very fond of a young man with this kind of reputation, but, of course, if he really deserved all that was said about him she thinks she ought not to continue being friendly with him. In her company she finds him only too quiet.

Well, "Troubled Heart," I think the kind of stories that go about concerning most of the so-called "wild" young men are often based on nothing at all. The young men of those reputations are more often than not very good fellows at heart. And as to the idea of their being "not gentlemen," that, too, is said by some about every man who breathes. The meaning of the word "gentleman" is scarcely agreed upon by any two people. If you find him a gentleman yourself, that is all you have to bother about.

And as to his being wild, of course I can't say unless you tell me what evidence you have. But believe me that more good young men are suspected of "wildness" than one can count, and more often than not, many a wild young man is suspected of goodness. So don't let these suspicions interfere with your friendship if you really are fond of him.

John Holloway.

JOHN HOLLOWAY and Kate Warburton had been married just over a year, but, unfortunately, it could not be said that their married life was an unqualified success.

Mrs. Holloway had from the first proceeded to "lay down the law," with the result that unhappiness gradually crept in, causing them to drift further apart, instead of striving to "jog along through life together."

Mr., or Jack Holloway, as he was familiarly called, was a real good fellow, and a man, who, given a chance, would have made one of the best of husbands, and, though he adored his wife, he was beginning to see that she was taking advantage of the fact, but he was determined he would not submit to play the part of the hen-pecked husband.

The cause of all the trouble was Mrs. Holloway's self-willed and dogmatic behaviour. She loved her husband undoubtedly, but, in return, she expected so much homage and unchallenged right of action, that it made it impossible for peace to be the reigning factor in her life.

One morning at breakfast, one of the many "tiffs" over some trifle or other, was proceeding in the usual manner, and doubtful compliments were banded about, Mrs. Holloway, saying in the most decided manner, "that if she was not to be mistress in her own house she would leave," and, as Jack did not contradict her, but rather hinted that he had no particular objection to such a course, "as he was getting tired of this mode of living," this only added fuel to the fire. The outraged woman blazed forth, the language used on such occasions was freely indulged in, and the once happy courting couple were transformed into miniature demons, who looked at each other with frenzied glare.

"I tell you what it is," said Jack, "I am heartily tired of those frequent bickerings, and something will have to be done, for as far as I can see, our position is getting more painful every day."

"It is your own fault," replied his wife, looking at Jack with a withering eye, though Jack did not wither, "you are so exacting and disagreeable, there is not a thing I do, but you are ready to find a fault. You are always grumbling, and——"

"Now, look here, Kate," interrupted Jack, who was controlling himself wonderfully well, "are you speaking the truth when you make such a statement? Have I not allowed you sufficient money, and implored you to pay more attention to your domestic duties, and yet you——"

"Oh, of course, have it all your own way," cried his wife, "you always argue from your own point of view, but I tell you distinctly, I will not be bullied by a man, and you may argue till you are blue in the face, but you will never convince me that I am in the wrong."

"Will you tell me exactly what you want," asked Jack, "and I will try my best to meet you half-way, and if we could patch up matters, we might get on all right after all. Don't you think so, Kate?"

"You need not try to get over me with your soft words; if there is to be any arrangement come to, I will see to it, so don't you worry about that. Do you think for one moment that I am going to give in to everything that you say or do? Not likely, you will find that I have a spirit in me that will not be crushed by any man, far less you."

"What do you mean by that contemptuous remark?" cried Jack, whose temper was now at boiling point. "When you can stoop to using such language to your husband, it is high time there was something done in the matter, and I tell you, madam," striking the table with his clenched fist to hammer home the argument, "I tell you, madam, this will and must cease, from now, do you hear, from now, and for ever, I——"

"You——"

"Silence, woman, you have drained the last drop of patience and toleration that a man could possess. I have now done with you," and going towards the door, he cast a look at his wife, and, though he had been working at high pressure, the steam had now evaporated, and he was himself again.

"Kate." No answer.

"Would you prefer me to leave you?"

"Leave me?" she replied, with an irritating laugh, "where would you go?"

"Of course, I have not decided yet, but you know, Kate, things cannot go on in this way."

"It is your own fault."

"Thanks! I deny it."

"Oh! Just like a selfish man, always in the right, of course."

"Will you listen to reason, Kate?"

No answer.

"Well, if the worst comes to the worst," as a sudden idea had come into Jack's head to test her love, "as I am a member of the Yeomanry I am thinking seriously of going out to the Front, and ridding you of my apparently hateful presence."

"You go to the Front?" with a look of disdain which she suddenly checked when she saw the expression on her husband's face.

"I suppose," Jack said, "you think I have not pluck enough to carry me through?" and he smiled, bitterly.

"I have nothing to do with whether you have or have not," she replied, "but please learn to talk sense, and in the meantime," going towards the door, "I have to call on Mrs. Scott as I promised to go shopping with her, and I ask you if you consider yourself a gentleman after your brut—your—the way you have spoken to me?"

"Very well, Kate, make your own arrangements, and I will make mine."

Little did each know what was to be the end of this morning's work.

When Jack first spoke about the Yeomanry, he had no intention of putting his suggestion into force, which his wife was quick to see, and, of course, at once resolved "not to give in."

After his wife had gone, Jack began to ponder over matters. He was sure she loved him, but could not overcome the stubborn nature that had been reared in her. If he could only drag out a spark of her better nature, all might be well, but so far as he could see, it would be a difficult task.

Now, a scheme had slowly taken hold of his mind, and he resolved to put it to the test. He wrote an application to his commanding officer, volunteering for the Front, and then leaving it lying carelessly about, as though he had forgotten it, he went out to business, in anything but a pleasant frame of mind. When he returned in the evening, he glanced almost guiltily about to see if his note were still there. No, it was not.

"Ah!" he thought, "she has read it, destroyed it, and gone to weep the matter over. It will do her good, she will now see the folly of her conduct, and all will be well. My trick has done it this time," he told himself, as he smiled in the mirror, "bygones will be bygones, and all might yet end happily," then ringing the bell for the servant, he asked her if her mistress were in.

"Yes, sir, she is upstairs."

"I thought so," Jack mentally told himself. "You might please tell you mistress I will be glad to see her if she is able to come down."

"Yes, sir."

Jack stood before the fire with a happy and contented look on his face, and when his wife entered the room, smilingly, his heart beat with joy, and he stepped forward to embrace her, but to his surprise she avoided him, and the sun went out of his soul. There she stood with the old mocking expression.

"What is the matter, Kate?" asked Jack, with a look which showed his keen disappointment.

"Nothing, beyond my surprise at seeing you," she smilingly replied.

Jack's anger was rapidly beginning to rise, but he controlled himself sufficiently to say, "will you please explain?"

"I thought you were away," she said, in a manner that Jack did not know whether to laugh or not.

"Away; where to?" he asked in astonishment.

"To the Front, of course!"

Jack saw the joke at once, and laughed good-naturedly, explaining that it could not be expected he should get away in a few hours.

"Oh, indeed! How long will it take you?"

"A week or two, I should say," smiled Jack, who was beginning to enjoy his wife's manner of wheedling round him before she made the final plunge.

"Oh, you needn't smile," she said, "you wrote that letter, and purposely left it lying about, just to frighten me, but I am not so easily frightened, so I thought I would just give you a fright in return."

Jack began to feel somewhat uneasy.

"Where is the letter, Kate, or have you destroyed it?" he asked.

"No; I—I posted it to your commanding officer, as you call him. I hope he has more command over you than I have, but you need not look so dreadfully scared like, you need not have any fear of your offer being accepted, as it is men they want," and turning her back on him, she went out of the room.

Here was a pretty pickle to be in. Jack was no coward, though, at first, he had no intention of going to the Front, yet if he were accepted he would never dream of drawing back; besides, taking it all round, it was probably just the best thing to happen under the circumstances, so he told himself, yet he could not but admit that his scheme had failed, and he was in a tight corner. Then it suddenly dawned upon him, has Kate really sent off this letter, or is she only trying to frighten him, and see who was to win the game. Distracted between the two ideas, he was getting a little confused, and finally adopted the notion of going to the Club, and having a game of billiards to see if it would clear his brain.

Next day, he had occasion to again visit the Club when, as he entered the smoking-room, he was greeted with a shout of welcome. "Glad to meet you, old chap," cried Captain Drecas, of the Yeomanry, as he rose and shook Jack heartily by the hand. "I have seen your application, it is accepted, my boy, and you are all right, now we will have a good time of it. There's Teddy Laurie, Jack Hilston, Tom Bowers, and any amount of our fellows going out, and you, as a good shot and a good soldier, I am more than proud that you will be under my command. Now then, you fellows," he cried, "drink to Trooper Holloway of ours, and success to our venture."

The news was so sudden, that Jack did not feel quite such a hero as he would like to have felt, the fact was when he heard the first words his thoughts flew to his home and future possibilities.

When he arrived at his home that night, he was terribly distracted, so much so that his wife noticed there was something very far wrong.

"You are very quiet, to-night, Jack," said his wife, in a half-curious tone, "can you take me into your confidence, or are you going to treat me in your usual fashion?"

"Confidence, did you say, Kate? Confidence? What confidence has there been between us since we were married? I will tell you this, that I am going to the Front. I got the news to-day, and expect orders to-morrow to report myself for duty, that is the first and the last of it."

His wife turned pale and seemed like to faint, but she controlled herself, and merely remarked "we shall see."

Jack did not know that the next day his wife had gone to the commanding officer, and begged and prayed him to let Jack off.

"We do not use force, madam," was that officer's reply; "we volunteer, and your husband would be quite within his rights to withdraw his application, but I question very much if he will dream of doing such a thing, and I need not point out to you that—well, in my opinion—frankly I would not advise him to do so. He is a good member of the corps, and it is men we want."

"But couldn't you persuade him, as a married man, to give up this wild scheme?"

"It is no wild scheme, madam, I am a married man with a family, and I, like many others, when called upon, have responded to the call. We have a duty to perform, and we are going to do it. I sympathise with you, madam, and I admire your husband for his pluck."

When Jack Holloway received his notice to join headquarters to undergo drills and get knocked into shape before going to the seat of war, he felt glad and yet sorry. Had he got a kind word from his wife, even so far as things had gone, he would have faced matters with a lighter heart; but no, time passed on and it would soon be farewell; perhaps for ever.

At last the day arrived when the separation had to take place, but the farewell on both sides was, outwardly, quite formal, though each at the slightest sign from the other might have given way to their thoughts. With a light kiss on his wife's cheek, Jack Holloway turned from his door and walked jauntily away towards headquarters, but though his step appeared light, his heart was heavy as lead, while his wife, if he only could have seen her, immediately his back was turned, rushed upstairs and screamed out in her agony.

When, in a few hours, the troops were formed up to take the route, headed by the band, they were marched to the station followed by an immense crowd, as a great number in the ranks were known as prominent citizens, and they did get a send off. The sound of music came to Mrs. Holloway's ears as she sat in her room crying over the past, and what might have been, and as the sounds drew nearer, and cheers rent the air, she thought what it meant for her. "If they had not parted in anger—she must have been mad to have acted as she has done."

Every note of music she heard seemed to pierce her brain. Good Heavens! they are coming this way, and will pass the house, she dare not trust herself to look out, yet she can picture his face to herself; will she ever see him again? "Oh, Jack! Jack, come to me, I have wronged you so!" Afterwards the servant found her mistress in a dead faint; but the soldiers had gone past, and one who had looked up eagerly at his own window, in the hope of seeing her whom he loved, turned his face away with a look of disappointment and misery—his last hope shattered.

Time passed heavily with Mrs. Holloway since her husband had gone, and she reviewed all that had transpired during her short married life. If she had not been so stubborn, how different things might have been. She scanned the daily papers eagerly for news of the war, and one day fainted when she saw her husband's name among the wounded, but oh, what a relief when, afterwards, she saw the word "slightly." Oh, if he only knew the agony she was suffering from her own folly. "Oh, Jack! if you are spared to come back to me, how different I will be." But why not write to him? Strange she had not thought of that, "Yes, I will do so at once, I will confess all, and we may be happy yet," so suiting the action to the thought, she sat down and begun a long letter with "My darling husband," and ending with "Your loving wife, Kate."

It was a great load off her mind, and she felt sure she had done right, but where would she address it to, and make sure he would get it. The newspaper was the only thing that she could think of for the moment, and, hearing a boy shouting "paper" in the street, she went to the door, and hailed him. "'Ere you are, mem, latest edition, great battle fought, mem, heavy losses." What was it seemed to creep over her heart. Scanning the paper eagerly, her eye fell on the casualty list, and suddenly a piercing scream rang through the house.

The servant rushed into the room, and found her mistress in a heap on the floor. She tried to rouse her, but without effect, and, nearly scared out of her senses, ran for a doctor. When the doctor entered the house, and saw the silent form, he at once pronounced life to be extinct. "Failure of the heart through sudden fright, poor girl. She is gone. She must have got a terrible shock. Ah! We may find the cause here," said the doctor, lifting the paper. "Yes, here it is."

"Killed in action."

MAN OR BEAST?

How a Coroner Got Confused over a Horse's Bones.

"What are the facts of this case, doctor?" asked the magistrate, as Dr. Busby entered the witness-box.

"Why, you see," said the doctor, "Mr. Jones, the coroner here, yesterday discovered a lot of old bones in the cellar of a stable which was torn down. Being a little hungry for fees, he determined to hold an inquest, and he sent for me to get a professional opinion. They were the bones of a horse, you know; and when I got there Mr. Jones had them laid out on the ground in something like the form of a man; and when I remonstrated with him, he said they were certainly the bones of a man, and he was under a solemn obligation to hold an inquest."

"You say," asked the magistrate, "that they did not resemble the bones of a human being?"

"Well, you know, he had one leg made out pretty well, but when I called his attention to the fact that the bone of the other leg ran up through the body and stuck out eight inches beyond the top of the skull, he said the man may have been peculiar, he may have been deformed. He said he had an aunt whose leg bone projected so far from her head that she had to make a hole in the top of her bonnet."

"Did he produce the said aunt?"

"No. And when I showed him that the right arm had three elbows, while the left contained no joint of any kind, and looked like the breastbone of a chicken, he said that there was a man in Peru who had eight elbows, and that his oath as coroner did not oblige him to account for all the phenomenal freaks of Nature."

"Had the remains any other elbows about it anywhere?" asked the magistrate.

"Not unless you count the joints in the middle of the back. When I pointed out that the man had a row of teeth in his shinbone, and that some of them were as big as a walnut, and showed him that for him to attempt to eat his meals with his loins, or for him to have a toothache near to his toes was in violent antagonism to all precedent, as well as to the ascertained facts about human physiology, he said the man's teeth may have been shifted by disease or something, and, perhaps, that was what killed him. He said his grandmother knew a man whose teeth slid down and began to grow upon his ribs with fatal results."

"Had he his grandmother's affidavit to that effect?"

"He neglected to produce it if he had. The skeleton's left foot was composed of the horse's breastbone. It looked as much like a foot as a clothes-pin looks like the Venus de Milo, and as the other foot was made up of about three feet of the animal's spinal column, while the neck was formed of the horse's upper jaw, I remonstrated strenuously with the coroner."

"What did he say?"

"He hit me with the horse's fibula. I retaliated with the tibula, and in about two seconds he had heaved all the skeleton at me that I hadn't heaved at him. Then he winked at the jury, and it suddenly brought in a verdict of death from cause or causes unknown; and then I had him arrested for assault and battery."

The magistrate bound the coroner over to appear at the assizes; and when that functionary had given the bond, he moved off to collect his fees for the inquest.

THE KING AGAINST DEANE.

CHAPTER I.

The Parting of Deane Brothers.

"And you think, Harvey, that this Paris journey is necessary? I mean, that I should make it?"

"Yes," said the senior partner, a trifle irritably. "I have already fully explained why I consider a personal interview with the officials of the Crédit Lyonnais to be more than desirable, in view of the crisis which threatens our firm in the near future; and why you, as its junior representative, and as such, more easily to be spared, are the fitter of the two to undertake the duty."

"Harvey," said Caworth Deane, curiously, "what is this crisis you talk about? It is the first I have heard of it. I think I know the books pretty well, and I am conscious of no impending financial disaster as being even possible."

"How about that last big lot of Crédit Lyonnais bonds?"

"Oh, yes! that American man—Cleeve's deposit! Well, what about it? The bonds are all right, aren't they?"

"That's just what I want to be sure about. The bonds are right enough in the way of being genuine; but I'm suspicious of Cleeve's claim to the undisputed ownership of them."

"Why didn't you tell me of this before?"

"Because I didn't think it necessary; and again, because the suspicion was only born in my own mind some half-a-dozen hours ago."

"Is that all that you fear?"

"No. This American has, within the last four days, as you are aware, drawn by arrangement with us, against the bonds to the extent of a hundred thousand pounds. From something I have heard to-day I am beginning to fear that we are in danger of losing the money; which, for Deane Brothers, would simply mean—ruin!"

"I don't quite understand," said the junior partner gravely. "If the bonds are genuine, we are guaranteed against loss, we having them in our possession as security."

"Nonsense, man! Can't you see that, if the Crédit Lyonnais succeed in making good their right to the bonds we shall be compelled to surrender them. The result of that will be that Deane Brothers, unable to stand the loss of the hundred thousand pounds, will have to suspend payment."

"Well, I certainly thought," retorted Caworth Deane, "that the securities we held would amply cover our credit, and to a far greater amount than that. What has become of the money? the money, I mean, which should form overwhelming assets for us?"

"Become of it! How should I know?"

"But you ought to know! Well, I am driven to an unpleasant conclusion, Harvey! and to say that I believe your luxurious, almost princely, style of living, to be at the bottom of the mischief."

"What do you mean?"

"What I say! More, I also consider your persistent endeavour to draw Eva Sheraton (against her will, I verily believe) into what you well know to be the coming muddle, is, in the highest degree, mean and contemptible."

Harvey and Caworth Deane were half-brothers; the latter—in his thirtieth year—being nearly ten years younger than the late Capel Deane's first-born. There was not a shadow of anything in common between them — physically, mentally, or morally, a fact that accounted in no small measure for all that afterwards happened.

Apparently the very pink of prosperity, the three-hundred-year-old bank of Deane Brothers, now that old Capel's hand had dropped from the helm, had, through wild and reckless speculation and extravagant living on the part of the senior partner, drifted into troubled waters.

Not a breath of this had, as yet, reached the public ear (even Caworth Deane was only suspicious of the truth, knowing nothing surely); so that the event, a month or two previously of a brand new customer, highly recommended by the firm's New York correspondent, was in no way remarkable.

Anyway, Silas Cleeve, of Chicago, duly deposited his hundred-and-fifty-thousand-pounds'-worth of Crédit Lyonnais bonds; ultimately, a few days before the brothers' talk, drawing against them to the tune of a hundred thousand.

The allusion by the younger brother to Eva Sheraton seemed to strangely agitate Harvey Deane. He rose hurriedly from his chair, and paced the little old-world bank parlour to and fro without speaking.

Suddenly, he stopped before where the other still sat, and placed both his hands upon his brother's shoulders.

"Caworth," he said huskily, and with an effort, "let us be open with one another. Do you love Eva Sheraton? Stop! don't resent the question—do you?"

"Why do you, of all men, ask me, Harvey? It isn't fair to Eva!"

"That is no answer. Yes or no?"

"I will not tell you!"

"I am satisfied!" and Harvey Deane resumed his seat at the table and commenced writing a letter.

"You will need money and credentials," he said, glancing up quickly, and ignoring altogether the subject last in dispute. "Here are both."

"It is settled that I am to go, then. Well! I will of course take the firm's credentials, but money? No—I have sufficient of my own for the purpose."

"Do as you will; perhaps it is better so."

At this moment there came a gentle knock at the door communicating with the chief cashier's room.

"Come in!" cried the senior partner.

Stephen Rutter had been in the service of Deane Brothers, man and boy, for over thirty years. He was not a particularly pleasant-looking individual. He had a trick of half-closing his eyes when he spoke, and screwing up one corner of his slit-like mouth.

Lean as a rake, and never without a pen in his hand, he was a long way from being an attractive man.

"Well, Rutter, what is it? I'm busy with Mr. Caworth."

"I beg your pardon, sir, but I should like you to you to look at that entry again I spoke about this morning."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, yes! I know! I'll come presently—when Mr. Caworth is gone; don't worry me now."

"Very good, sir!" said the cashier deferentially, backing out into his own domain.

The door shut, however, an ugly smile spread itself over his face.

"They're concocting flight, I'm certain, for I caught a glimpse of a circular letter in front of Harvey on the table."

Voices sounded again in the inner room. The cashier moved steathily to the door, and put his ear against it.

Then, the door leading into the private passage opened, and the spy heard Caworth Deane bid his brother "good-bye."

But Harvey Deane did not reply, at least, the listener could detect nothing.

The younger man's firm tread along the passage, the banging of the private door, his voice in the street shouting "hansom!" and Stephen Rutter climbed on to his stool again and resumed his work, with a satisfied nod of the head in the direction of the partners' room.

* * * * *

"Peters! Halliday! quick! Come here!"

Stephen Rutter was on his knees in the bank parlour beside the body of the senior partner, which lay, half turned on its side, extended on the hearth-rug.

By the dead man's side (for there was no doubt that life was extinct) lay a peculiar-looking knife, of the sort that fixes the open blade with a spring. The blade itself was smeared half its length with blood; on the handle also showing two dark crimson spots.

Peters, the second cashier, had now joined Rutter; behind him crowding the whole staff of the bank.

It was to the former that Rutter addressed himself.

"Peters," he said, laying his hand on the dead man's breast, "send at once for the police! Not a moment must be lost! This is more than murder! It is fratricide! Mr. Caworth has killed his brother!"

CHAPTER II.

"It is a Hideous Lie! I Loved My Brother!"

Caworth Deane's direction to the cabman was Upper Seymour Street, Hyde Park.

Arrived at Mr. Sheraton's he asked for Eva, and in a few seconds was standing face-to-face with her in the drawing-room.

Loving her passionately as he had done ever since he had come to know love's real meaning, he had yet never indicated by word or sign his feeling for her.

But women need no ordinary word or sign by which to read a man's devotion. So Eva.

"Caworth! Whatever are you doing in our idle part of the town at this time of the day. I warrant Harvey is hard at work!"

Her merry laugh, sparkling eyes, and dainty teasing, were so many irresistible temptations to the young man.

"I bring a message from Harvey, that's all, to say that he will be unable to go with you to the Lyceum to-night."

She, somehow, did not seem to be vastly troubled at the prospect; at least he thought so.

"Are you sure, Caworth, that that is all? He could have wired!"

"Well, Eva! I am just off to Paris on firm business, and—and—I thought I should like to—to come and say good-bye."

"Are you going for long, then?"

She certainly spoke as if she had more than a passing interest in his answer. Her colour heightened, too; and she fidgeted with her hands.

And something he saw in her eyes told Caworth Deane all he longed to know.

"Eva! Eva!" he whispered, taking both her hands in his. "Do you really care whether my absence is long or short? I believe—I am sure you do!"

She could not deny it, but though she was under no promise to Harvey Deane, she knew that he loved her, and she grieved to hurt him, as would she any human being.

As for Caworth, his triumph was embittered by a feeling of shame, in that he had supplanted his brother; and when, half an hour later, he drove away to his own rooms to get his travelling traps, it was as one who had done, if unconsciously, a great wrong.

It did not take him long to gather his impedimenta, and when he arrived at Charing Cross it was to find the Continental Express within five minutes of departure.

Arrived in due course at Dover, he just had time for a hurried "snack" before boarding the Calais boat.

A porter carrying his luggage in front of him, he was himself about to step upon the gangway, when a heavy hand was laid upon his shoulder from behind.

"Mr. Caworth Deane, I believe?" said a man's voice quietly.

He turned his head sharply, to see a couple of men with the unmistakable cut about them of Scotland Yard.

"Yes—that's my name!"

"Well," said his interrogator, advancing a couple of steps, and putting his hand on the junior partner's shoulder, "Mr. Caworth Deane, I arrest you in the King's name on suspicion of having stabbed to death your brother, Harvey Deane, before mid-day to-day in the bank-parlour in Austin Friars."

"Good Heavens!" You can't mean it! You must be a madman! I kill my brother!"

"I regret the necessity, Mr. Deane, but here is my warrant!"

"I will not look at it! I tell you man, it is a hideous lie! I loved my brother!"

CHAPTER III.

A Creature of Circumstance.

The case of Caworth Deane, the banker, taking his trial upon a charge of murder—the murder of his brother, Harvey Deane—was more than a nine-days' wonder.

Ever since the prisoner's committal City men talked of nothing else; and it was curious that the majority were in the accused's favour.

A portion of the Press, as usual, pre-judged the case, and, on the facts, proclaimed Caworth Deane a criminal of the very worst type.

Those, however, who had charge of him, bore witness to his marvellous calmness and quiet determination to trust in the ultimate triumph of his innocence.

"Why," said he to his solicitor, the morning before the trial, "Harvey and I were one. Disagreements we may have had on business matters—but serious quarrels—never! Of one blood, by our father, we never let the fact that we were not of one mother come between us for an instant."

At the outset of the trial it transpired that the day after Harvey Deane's death Stephen Rutter disappeared.

This, however, did not affect the issue, as the prisoner acknowledged that the knife found by the body was his, though he distinctly averred that he remembered lending it to Stephen Rutter the day before at the latter's request. That he did not return it, he would swear.

Digitized by Google

Peters, the second cashier, gave evidence, which went to prove that Rutter, immediately after the lunch hour, had summoned himself and the rest to the partners' room, and that the chief cashier had thereupon denounced Mr. Caworth Deane as the murderer of his brother.

The younger's contemplated hasty journey to Paris was insisted upon by the prosecution as unanswerable evidence of guilty flight.

The lending of the knife to Rutter was commented upon as being nothing else than an attempt to shift the guilt on to the absent cashier.

Then the prisoner's counsel made a remarkable request.

"Would the court adjourn the case till the next morning at ten o'clock, as he believed that by that time he would be in possession of facts which would establish Caworth Deane's innocence.

The judge was not one over-given to dock favour, and would probably have refused to grant the appeal for delay, but for that which he read on a slip of paper, passed up to him by the counsel for the defence.

"Adjourned till to-morrow morning at ten."

* * * * *

Before Caworth Deane was brought into court his counsel made a statement which fell upon everybody as a "bolt from the blue."

This was nothing less than that Stephen Rutter, the ex-chief cashier of Deane Brothers had confessed, before his death, the day before in Paris, in a street omnibus collision, that it was he who had, in the lunch hour, stabbed Harvey Deane, leaving by his victim Caworth Deane's knife, as a damning witness against the latter.

For years he had been robbing the bank, manipulating the books in such a way as to deceive the senior partner, who, to a large extent, was innocent of criminal waste and speculation. Whatever of the latter had been unwisely entered into had been done upon Rutter's advice; he, Harvey, being entirely in the cashier's hands, so far as technical business knowledge was concerned.

His plunder conveyed out of the country, Rutter sought, in the greedy spirit so common among men of his sort, to get the Crédit Lyonnais bonds into his hands. Hence his visit to Paris, en route to the West.

"The one to get this confession," said counsel, "was Miss Eva Sheraton, a young lady deeply interested, he might say, in the prisoner's welfare; and if his lordship would now order Caworth Deane's presence in court, he would put Miss Sheraton into the box, and let her tell her own tale."

This she did to the satisfaction both of judge and jury.

She told how her suspicions were aroused by Rutter's disappearance, and how, from a suggestion dropped by the second cashier, Peters, she decided to go to Paris, in company with her father, and to watch the offices of the Crédit Lyonnais.

Two omnibuses came into collision opposite the Crédit Lyonnais building, and in an injured passenger she recognised Stephen Rutter.

Having him conveyed to a hospital she, through the British Embassy, gained permission to nurse the man, whom the doctors from the first decreed would die.

Die he did, but not before she had succeeded in persuading him to confess both to Harvey Deane's murder, and to the mal-appropriation of the bank's funds.

"A very clever and courageous young lady!" conceded his lordship; "but an undesirable precedent, for all that."

"Deane Brothers" is only a City tradition now, although when the bank's affairs were wound up, everybody received twenty shillings in the pound.

Mr. and Mrs. Caworth Deane live with the latter's father somewhere in the North, where the echoes of feverish City life are seldom heard, though the terrible experiences of those few days last year will never be quite forgotten by either of them. Ralph Enderby.

CHAPTER XXVI.
Reparation.

PRESENTLY as I recalled what talks we had had, and one in particular from which it now appeared to me that her coldness had sprung, a light seemed suddenly to break upon my mind, as perchance it hath long ago broken upon the minds of those who may happen upon these pages, and whose wits in matters amorous are of a keener temper than were mine.

I who in all things had been arrogant, presumptuous, and self-satisfied had, methought, erred for once through over-humility.

And indeed, even as I sat and pondered on that June day, it seemed to me a thing incredible that she whom I accounted the most queenly and superb of women should have deigned to grant a tender thought to one so mean, so far beneath her as I had ever held myself to be.

Things came to pass that night as I had planned, and the Fates which of late had smiled upon me were kind unto the end.

Soon after ten, and before the moon had risen, a silent procession wended its way from the Château to the river. First went Montrésor and two of his men; next came the Chevalier with Mademoiselle, and on either side of them a trooper; whilst I, in head-piece and back and breast of steel, went last with Mathurin, the sergeant, who warmly praised the plan I had devised for the conveyance of M. de Canaples to Paris without further loss of time.

Two boats which I had caused to be secretly procured were in readiness, and by these a couple of soldiers awaited us, holding the bridles of eight horses, one of which was equipped with a lady's saddle. Five of these belonged, or had belonged, to the Chevalier, whilst the others were three of those that had brought the troop from Paris, and which I, in the teeth of all protestations, had adjudged sufficiently recovered for the return journey.

The embarkation was safely effected, M. de Canaples and Mademoiselle in one boat with Montrésor, Mathurin and myself; the sergeant took the oars; Montrésor and I kept watch over our prisoner. In the other boat came the four troopers who were to accompany us, and one other who was to take the boats, and Montrésor in them, back to Canaples. For the lieutenant was returning, so that he might, with the remainder of the troop, follow us to Paris so soon as the condition of the horses would permit it.

The beasts we took with us were swimming the stream, guided and upheld by those in the other boat.

Just as the moon began to show her face our bow grated on the shore at the very point where I had intended that we should land. I sprang out, and turned to assist Mademoiselle. But disdaining my proffered hand, she stepped ashore unaided. The Chevalier came next, and after him Montrésor and Mathurin.

Awhile we waited until the troopers brought their boat to land, then when they had got the snorting animals safely ashore, I bade them look to the prisoner, and requested Montrésor and Mathurin to step aside with me, as I had something to communicate to them.

Walking between the pair, I drew them some twenty paces away from the group by the water, towards a certain thicket in which I had bidden Michelot await me.

"It has occurred to me, Messieurs," I began, speaking slowly and deliberately as we paced along, "it has occurred to me that, despite all the precautions taken to carry out my Lord Cardinal's wishes—a work at least in which you yourselves have evinced a degree of zeal that I cannot too highly commend you to His Eminence—the possibility yet remains of some mistake of trivial appearance, of some slight flaw that might yet cause the miscarriage of those wishes."

They turned towards me, and although I could not make out the expressions of their faces in the gloom, yet I doubted not but that they were puzzled ones at that lengthy and apparently meaningless harangue.

The sergeant was the first to speak, albeit I am certain that he understood the less.

"I venture, M. le Capitaine, to think that your fears, though very natural, are groundless."

"Say you so?" quoth I, with a backward glance to assure myself that we were screened by the trees from the eyes of those behind us. "Say you so? Well, well, mayhap you are right, though you speak of my fears being groundless. I alluded to some possible mistake of yours—yours and M. de Montrésor's—not of mine. And, by Heaven, a monstrous flaw there is in this business, for if either of you so much as whisper I'll blow your brains out!"

And to emphasise these words, as sinister as they were unlooked-for, I raised both hands suddenly from beneath my cloak, and clapped the cold nose of a pistol to the head of each of them.

I was obeyed as men are obeyed who thus uncompromisingly prove the force of their commands. Seeing them resigned, I whispered softly, and in answer there was a rustle from among the neighbouring trees, and presently two shadows emerged from the thicket. In less time than it takes me to relate it, Montrésor and his servant found themselves gagged, and each securely bound to a tree.

Then with Michelot and Abdon following a short distance behind me, I made my way back to the troopers, and feigning to stumble as I approached, I hurtled so violently against two of them that I knocked the pair headlong into the stream.

Scarce was it done, and almost before the remaining three had realised it, there was a pistol at the head of each of them, and sweet promises of an eternal hereafter being whispered in their ears. They bore themselves with charming discretion, and like lambs we led them each to a tree, and dealt with them as we had dealt with their officers, whilst the Chevalier and his daughter watched us, bewildered and dumfounded at what they saw.

So soon as the other two had crawled, all unconscious of the fate of their comrades, out of the river, we served them also in a like manner.

Bidding Abdon and Michelot lead the horses, and still speaking in my assumed voice, I desired Mademoiselle and the Chevalier who had not yet sufficiently recovered from his bewilderment to have found his tongue, to follow me. I led the way up the gentle slope to the spot where our first victims were pinioned.

Montrésor's comely young face looked monstrous wicked in the moonlight, and his eyes rolled curiously as he beheld me. Stepping up to him I freed him of his gag, an act which I had almost regretted a moment later, for he cleared his throat with so lusty a torrent of profanity that methought the heavens must have fallen on us. At last, when he was done with that.

"Before you leave me in this plight, M. de St. Auban," quoth he, "perchance you will satisfy me with an explanation of your unfathomable deeds and of this violence."

"St. Auban!" exclaimed the Chevalier.

"St. Auban!" cried Yvonne.

And albeit wonder rang in both their voices, yet their minds, I knew, went different ways.

"No, not St. Auban," I answered with a laugh and putting aside all counterfeit of speech.

"Good Heavens! I know that voice," cried Montrésor.

"Mayhap, indeed! And know you not this face?" And as I spoke I whipped away my wig and mask, and thrust my countenance close up to his.

"Thunderation!" ejaculated the boy. Then, "By Gad," he added, "there is Michelot! How came I not to recognise him?"

"Since you would not assist me, Montrésor, you see I was forced to do without you."

"But St. Auban!" he gasped. "Where is he?"

"In Heaven I hope, but I doubt it sadly."

"You have killed him?"

There and then, as briefly as I might, I told him, while the others stood by to listen, how I had come upon the Marquis in the Château the night before, and what had passed thereafter.

"And now," I said, as I cut his bonds, "it grieves me to charge you with an impolite errand to His Eminence, but——"

"I'll not return to him," he burst out. "I dare not. Good Heavens, you have ruined me, Luynes!"

"Then come with me, and I'll build your fortunes anew and on a sounder foundation. I have an influential letter in my pocket that should procure us fortune in the service of the King of Spain."

He needed little pressing to fall in with my invitation, so we set the sergeant free, and him instead I charged with a message that must have given Mazarin endless pleasure when it was delivered to him.

The Chevalier de Canaples approached me timidly.

"Monsieur," quoth he, "I have wronged you very deeply, and this generous rescue of one who has so little merited your aid truly puts me to so much shame that I know not what thanks to offer you."

"Then offer none, Monsieur," I answered, taking his proffered hand. "Moreover, time presses, and we have a possible pursuit to baffle. So to horse, Monsieur."

I assisted Mademoiselle to mount, and she passively suffered me to do her this office, having no word for me, and keeping her face averted from my earnest gaze.

I sighed as I turned to mount the horse Michelot held for me, but methinks 'twas more a sigh of satisfaction than of pain.

Three days later we arrived at Nantes, and a week from the night of the Chevalier's rescue we took ship from that port to Santander.

That same evening, as I leant upon the taffrail, watching the distant coast line of my beloved France, whose soil it seemed I was not like to tread again for years, Yvonne came softly up behind me.

"Monsieur," she said in a voice that trembled somewhat, "I have indeed misjudged you. The shame of it has made me hold aloof from you since we left Blois. I cannot tell you, Monsieur, how deep that shame has been, or with what sorrow I have been beset for the words I uttered at Canaples. Had I but paused to think——"

"Nay, nay, Mademoiselle, 'twas all my fault, I swear. left you overlong the dupe of appearances."

"But I should not have believed them so easily. Say that I am forgiven, Monsieur," she pleaded; "tell me what reparation I can make."

"There is one reparation that you can make if you are so minded," I answered, "but 'tis a lifelong reparation."

They were bold words indeed, but my voice played the coward and shook so vilely that it bereft them of half their boldness. But, ah, Heaven, what joy, what ecstasy was mine to see how they were read by her; to remark the rich, warm blood dyeing her cheeks in a bewitching way; to behold the sparkle that brightened her matchless eyes as they met mine.

"Yvonne!"

"Gaston!"

She was in my arms at last, and the work of reparation was begun whilst together we gazed across the sun-gilt sea towards the fading shores of France.

If you be curious to learn how, guided by the gentle hand of her who plucked me from the vile ways that in my old life I had trodden, I have since achieved greatness, honour, and renown, history will tell you.

THE END.

When Should a Woman Do Her Shopping?

SHOULD a woman do her shopping in the morning, during the afternoon, or should it be delayed till the lamps are lighted, and the evening shadows have merged into the blackness of night? Sometimes the latter course is the only one available on account of illness, but Bile Beans for Biliousness will save women this inconvenience as they did for Mrs. W. Maiden, of Oakfield Avenue, New Street, Brierly Hill, Staffordshire. Here is Mrs. Maiden's experience as she told it to a Brierly Hill Advertiser reporter:—"From being a girl I have suffered from biliousness up to a few months back when I was cured by Bile Beans. At the age of fifteen, I was terribly bad; and up to less than a year ago I have many a time been in such a worn-out, ragged state on account of biliousness and headache, that I have had to go to bed completely done up. This has often occurred on a Saturday, and I have been unable to stir out to do my marketing until nine o'clock at night. Indeed I got so bad that I was nearly always in pain. The nasty bilious feeling, the headache, and the weakness were really fearful. My appetite left me altogether, and the very thought of food made me sick. Even being in bed only gave me temporary relief, and when I got up to try and do a little work I was soon as bad as ever. Nothing that I took seemed to do me good, until one day my nephew brought me a small book, saying 'Aunt! here is something which will do you good!' He read to me some of the cures which Bile Beans had worked, and after I had heard them I decided to try Bile Beans. I got some from the chemist, and the result of persevering with them has been marvellous. I am not like the same woman. I never feel bilious, and the headache which tortured me so has also disappeared. You may tell how healthy and well I am now when you hear that I can do my washing and housework with ease. Washing for our family is a heavy task, as there are seven of our own at home, and I took to three motherless children. Yet I can do the work with ease, and never have the languid, used-up feeling I always had before when not suffering actual pain. Bile Beans are alone responsible for this splendid change in me, and I have not only recommended them to several persons, but have given a number away." Not only for biliousness and headache, but for all female ailments, indigestion, liver and kidney disorders, constipation, piles, debility, nervousness, anæmia, colds, chill, rheumatism, skin eruptions, pimples, blotches, face disfigurements, blood impurities, and as a preventive of influenza, Bile Beans for Biliousness are unequalled. All chemists stock them, or you may obtain them direct from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 and 120 London Wall, London, E.C., by sending price, one and three halfpence or two and nine. Their use will prevent ill-health, rendering such night shopping, as in the above case, altogether unnecessary.

Preparation.

Ethel (who thinks her country cousin nervous): "Can't you find anything better to squeeze than a felt hat?" Country Cousin: "Wait a bit. I'm only reducin' my energy, for fear I might hurt you."

She'd Tried the Other Way.

Mamma: "Gracious, child! don't carry the cat by the tail!" Little Edith: "But, mamma, if I carry her by one arm like you do me, she tries to bite me."

Hardly Necessary.

Auntie: "You should ask to be excused when you leave the table." Little Nephew: "Should I? I thought, from the way you acted about that third piece of pie, that you'd be glad to see me go."

What He Could Do.

"Now," said the warder to the forger who had just arrived at the prison, "we'll set you to work. What can you do best?" "Well, if you give me a week's practice on your signature I'll sign your official papers for you," said the prisoner.

A Good Reason.

"And what are you going to make of your son, Smithers?" asked the vicar. "A shoemaker, like yourself?" "Oh, no, sir," was the reply. "You see, he's uncommon fond of animals, and so we thinks of making him a butcher!"

She was in Demand.

Female Mendicant: "I'm a poor widdy woman with eight children. Can you give us some clothes?" Lady: "The only clothing I have to give away is one of my husband's coats." Female Mendicant: "Give it to me, lady; I might marry again. There are several gentlemen as have their eyes on me."

Those Bargains Again!

"But, my dear," protested Mr. Young when Mrs. Young showed him her purchases for the day, "why have you bought four dozen clothes pins when all the washing is done at the laundry?" "Oh, Harry, how can you be so horrid?" began Mrs. Young tearfully. "Why, they were bargains."

It Didn't Always Agree.

"This climate doesn't agree with me very well," remarked the passsenger with the cough. "Well, to tell the truth," responded the chance acquaintance in the next seat, "there are times when it disagrees with me, too, in the most provoking and ridiculous manner. I'm the man who makes the official weather predictions."

The Fall of Man.

Mr. Stebbings: "Statistics go to show that the male proportion of the world is fast falling off." Mrs. Stebbings: "Gracious me! Isn't there some way of tying them on?"

What Papa Said.

The Sister's Beau: "So, Johnnie, you're going to be a chemist like papa, eh? And did you know this diamond of mine was the same substance as charcoal?" Johnnie: "No." T. S. B.: "And hasn't papa told you that?" Johnnie: "No. He said it was paste."

Getting Out of Danger.

Nervous Passenger: "Why are you steaming along at such a fearful rate through this fog?" Ocean Captain (reassuringly): "Fogs are dangerous, madam, and I am always in a hurry to get out of them."

Very Distant.

"Let me see," said Brown to Jones, "isn't this Jones that we were talking about just now a relative of yours?" "A distant relative," said Jones. "Very distant?" "I should think so. He's the oldest of twelve children and I'm the youngest."

Never Again.

Mr. Pott: "I'll be cook myself, my dear, rather than I'll set foot in a servants' registry office again. I went there to-day, and picked out the most respectable-looking woman in the room, and stepping up to her said: 'Can you fill the position of cook?' 'Sir,' she replied, 'I'm trying to fill that of our coachman, and I think you would suit admirably.'"

A Silenced Girl.

"You need not deny it, I know that he kissed you while you were sitting on the steps last night." "Yes, mamma, eight or ten times, I fancy." "Eight or ten times! Why—I—you——" "Yes, mamma, dear, I told him the first time if he did it again I wouldn't speak to him, and after that I could not tell him to stop without breaking my word. And I knew you would not want your daughter to tell a fib."

He Wanted an Introduction.

Jack: "I have a chance to marry a poor girl whom I love, or a rich woman whom I do not love. What would you advise?" George: "Love is the salt of life, my friend. Without it all else is naught. Love, pure love, makes poverty wealth, pain a joy, earth a heaven." Jack: "Enough. I will marry the poor girl whom I love." George: "Bravely spoken. By the way, would you—er—mind introducing me to the rich woman whom you do not love?"

When Mr. J. Walton applied for the treatment he wrote: "I suffer from Asthma or Bronchitis. I cough and spit a lot of phlegm, and I am very weak. By any exertion I am out of breath, and puff and blow as if I had been running a race. Up to eight years ago I had been full of walk and strength, but I was attacked with influenza, and from then to now I have never been well. At night I am struck with cramp in my feet. I have lost about 30lbs. during the last seven or eight years." After the treatment he writes: "It is two months since I discontinued your treatment for Bronchial Asthma of the very worst sort, and now I am as well as ever I was in my life. AN END TO SKIN TROUBLES.

READ THIS LETTER

From a sufferer who has been cured by "ANTEXEMA," written entirely of his own part, out of gratitude for a happy release from suffering. Mr. Robert Dawson, of 89 Albert Street, Gateshead-on-Tyne, writes:

"I received your sample bottle of 'ANTEXEMA,' for which I do not know how to thank you. After suffering untold torture for three weeks, the first dressing that I put on relieved all the burning—which was like someone burning with a hot iron—and I had what I had not been used to, a good night's rest. After the sample bottle was used, I got a 1/1½ bottle, and thank God it is now cured. If ever there was a genuine article advertised for the benefit of the public—'ANTEXEMA' is one—and worth five times what you charge for it."

It is a story so simple, so uneventful, that it is hardly a story at all, and it all turned on a blot of ink.

At the age of twenty-five I was neither more foolish nor more sensible than most young men, and I was the victim of a violent passion for Laura Preval, a pretty actress. She was several years older than I, and, like most of her class, fond of admiration from those about her. I was one of a train of young men who sought her, obeying her slightest gestures as mandates from a queen.

One day, moved by some latent sense of independence, I revolted at a service I was asked to perform. We quarrelled; Laura had a violent temper, and in spite of the thousand follies I had committed for her she said she never wanted to set eyes on me again. Calling all my pride to hide my despair I pretended that such would indeed be my pleasure and I left her, determined to take myself and my wounded love away from London.

Then I thought of my grandmother's place in the country. It was many years since I had been there, and without sending any notice I packed my trunk and left London. I was not unhappy, for I counted on my absence doing for me what my presence could not. Laura would miss me, her self-love would be hurt at seeing how well I could live away from her, and in a few days I would receive a perfumed note bidding me "return."

How surprised they all were to see me when I came upon them in the beautiful drawing-room after dinner. There was grandmother, my aunts, and a houseful of young cousins, whom I had not seen since they were babies. I kissed them all, and found myself before a tall slim girl whom they told me was Natalie.

"What! This little Natalie!" I cried and kissed her, too. The next moment I felt a stinging slap on the side of my face and drew back.

"Natalie," said my grandmother, reproachfully, "Clarence is your cousin."

"I don't care if he is," said the girl, angrily, rubbing her cheek with her handkerchief; "I'm not going to be kissed by every impudent fellow who chooses to call himself my cousin."

"I shall never do so again from choice," I replied. "So far as I am concerned the relationship is dissolved."

"It is much better. I do not wish any ill-bred person for a cousin."

Grandmother interrupted and I walked away, thinking what an ill-tempered, disagreeable person I was to be in the same house with.

I had left my address in London. Letters and papers were sent to me, but not the letter I was looking for. The days passed and I grew restless and miserable, watching always for the arrival of the letters and suffering fresh disappointment each time.

My cousin Natalie interested me a little, but it was more curiosity than anything else. She seemed to be made up of so many different moods. To the others she was gentle; to grandmother she was sweet and considerate; to the children, gay and happy. Once I surprised her sitting in a great chair before the log fire, and the expression of her whole face and figure was one of sadness.

There was something charming in the mixture of childishness and womanliness in the face the firelight played upon, and I sighed to think of the friend she might have been to me if she had not taken such violent offence at my cousinly tribute.

My sigh aroused her. She looked round, saw me, and the expression vanished from her face to give place to the usual one when I was by—dislike and scorn.

All this time I was becoming so wretched over the silence of Laura that Natalie must have noticed it, for she began to treat me with a little kindness. I met her half-way and soon our feud was forgotten and we were, though not intimate, to an extent friendly.

Three weeks passed. I could endure it no longer. I would write to Laura, taking all the blame for what was her fault and asking her pardon. It was hard, but I could not be an exile any longer. I sat down at the library table, and wrote all my despair, my love, my hope, everything that youth puts into such letters was there: excuses, promises, vows. It would be a stony heart that would not melt at such an outpouring. I reached the end at last, and signed my name, when, terrible misfortune! my pen slipped and the page was decorated with a great blot of ink!

I uttered an exclamation. How could I write it over again? Copy those sentences that had been written in my heart's blood? I searched wildly for something to take out the spot, and at that moment Natalie entered.

"Natalie!" I cried, "haven't you got something to take out a blot of ink? An eraser, or a knife, or something?"

"Yes," she answered, hurrying to my relief. She opened a drawer and took out a little pearl-handled knife. "Let me do it for you. I can do it beautifully."

Her offer was made in kindness, and I willingly relinquished my place to her. She placed her hand over the writing with great care, so as to conceal it, and then went to work on the paper. I stood behind her. What little hands she had! The sun slanted in at the window and caught her hair in a ruddy gleam, lighting up little fine threads of pure red gold. How soft and fine it looked! I thought of another head, bleached and coarse. I felt a sudden desire to tell Natalie that she was all that a lovely girl should be, when she sprang up and faced me.

"If I had known it was that kind of letter I wouldn't have helped you!" she cried.

"If I had not trusted in your honour I wouldn't have accepted your help," I replied.

Her eyes blazed and she cried, in a voice which broke at the end:

"I—I couldn't help seeing. My hand slipped a little and then a little more—and I saw the end. I—I think you might have told us you loved somebody else——" She stopped, the anger faded away and she stood gazing at me with reproachful eyes. Then there was a quick little sob and she fled from the room.

In a conflict of feeling I had never before experienced I snatched the letter from the table and tore it across, and then again and again. Throwing the scraps in the fire, I spent the rest of the afternoon hunting the house for Natalie, and at last I found her.

The sight of a blot of ink always causes my heart to swell with thankfulness.

W. Werner.

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium, Nos. 61—66," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, March 17th, 1902.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

The Opening of the Story.

GERALD MORTIMER lives with his widowed mother and a small brother and sister at Moulstone Manor House. A great friend of his is Dr. Branksome, medical attendant at Moulstone Asylum. One night when Gerald is returning from a visit to the doctor, he is encountered by a wild looking woman, in a long blue cloak, who appears to be waiting about for someone. Gerald asks her if he can help her in any way.

"You cannot wait here," he says; "it is nearly midnight, and you are cold and weary. Come with me to my mother's house till morning."

"No, no, no! My place is here. I must wait."

"But you will be better for a rest," he urges. "Come with me!"

Her mood demands silence and solitude, and she does not reply. Instead she swings round with sudden quickness and passes through the gate on to the common beyond. Then, at a pace that surprises Gerald Mortimer, she speeds along the cart-track. He starts to follow, but loses all trace of her in a thick wood.

At breakfast the next morning, news reaches the Manor House that one of the asylum patients has escaped. Gerald at once thinks of the woman he met on the previous night, but learns that the missing person is a man.

Nina Penhurst, governess to the Mortimer children, meets Gerald in the garden, after he has been to the asylum to tell Dr. Branksome of his previous night's encounter, and learns further particulars of the missing patient from him. Gerald tells Nina that the man thought he had been cheated out of some property, and that his name was Anthony, not Felix.

"Felix—Anthony—he thinks his name is Anthony—Anthony what?" she asks.

"Cordelvin—Anthony Cordelvin."

Nina Penhurst looks up quickly as Gerald Mortimer uttered the name. Then she makes as though to step forward. Her lips form for speech, but she can utter no word. Her beautiful eyes change in a moment their look of clear intelligence for one of awesome vacancy. She sways where she stands—sways to the left and the right. A moment more and she would have fallen, but Gerald Mortimer steps to her side just in time to catch her, as her senses leaving her she falls forward in a dead swoon.

In a back street in Whitechapel lives a broken down doctor, Ephraim Manisty by name. The night after the escape from Moulstone Asylum, he is visited by a man giving the name of Causton, who offers him a fee of £1,000 to amputate the left arm of a friend of his at Streatham. Manisty consents.

As the doctor opens the door on his way out, a soft sound as of someone moving away falls on their ears—a sound as of rustling skirts.

"What was that?" asks Mr. Causton.

"I don't know—probably some poor outcast resting on the step," replied Dr. Manisty.

They get into the cab, which had been waiting near a coffee-stall at the corner of the street. But neither notice a tall, gaunt figure, clothed in a faded dark-blue cloak, hiding in the shadows of the houses. Nor do they know, as they rattle quickly back towards the city, that fifty yards behind them is another cab, bearing the same weird figure.

When Manisty sees his patient he finds that nothing is the matter with his left arm, but on Causton threatening to shoot him if he does not perform the operation, he consents to do it.

After the operation the doctor receives nine notes of one hundred pounds each. He clutches them quickly, and thrusts them into his pocket without even counting them and leaves the house.

A week later, Nina Penhurst and her two young charges, Harold and Gladys Mortimer, are out for a walk, during which they visit the ruins of Monkstone Castle. While the children are playing, Gerald comes on the scene, and declares his love for Nina. She says she cannot accept it, but gives no reason. Just at this moment a cry of distress is heard from Harold. Gerald rushes to the spot, and there finds that the boy has discovered the dead body of a man dressed in Asylum clothes, with his left arm missing, it having been clumsily amputated.

Telling Harold to say nothing about the discovery, he hurries Miss Penhurst and the children off home, and then rushes away to the asylum to see Dr. Branksome. His intimacy with Dr. Branksome is close enough to render announcement unnecessary, and in a short space of time he bursts into the doctor's room.

"Branksome!" he gasps, "I have just found a dead man!"

"Good Heavens, man! Where?"

"Under a wall in the ruins of Moulstone Castle. It is an old man dressed in asylum clothes."

"Asylum clothes—then it is Cordelvin, who escaped last week."

"Yes; that is what I thought. His face is somewhat disfigured, and he has only one arm!"

"One arm—but Cordelvin had two—I don't understand."

He turned to the wall and rang a bell.

"There is a mystery—a strange mystery," he said to Gerald. Then to the servant who appeared, he added:

"Tell Beasley to get a stretcher party ready immediately to accompany me to the Castle ruins."

A little later Beasley and three other warders, bearing a stretcher between them, were on their way with Gerald Mortimer and Dr. Branksome to the fateful spot.

CHAPTER V.
The Disappearance of Nina Penhurst.

"Well, Branksome, and what's the result of your examination?" queried Gerald Mortimer three or four hours later. They were once more in the doctor's room.

Dr. Branksome knocked out the ashes of his pipe and then answered slowly:

"This is a most extraordinary case!"

"In what particular way?"

"Well, in the first place, the amputation of his left arm. It isn't the result of a regular surgical operation at all. The arm has simply been roughly amputated by a layman."

"Good Heavens!"

"Yes; it is startling, isn't it? Furthermore, a mole which Cordelvin had upon his neck before he escaped has been branded off, branded by a hot iron. There has been foul play. Some enemy has been at this ghastly work."

"But a motive for an enemy? Who on earth could have sought to avenge himself on a poor madman in this diabolical fashion?"

The doctor puffed at his newly-filled pipe.

"You remember that woman whom you met?" he said.

"The woman in the blue cloak?" Gerald said quickly. "No, Branksome, that won't do. I think you're quite out there. She was eccentric, I admit; but she seemed so timid, so shrinking; her face was so full of suffering. No, no; she could never have done a thing like this."

Dr. Branksome shrugged his shoulders.

"You may be right," he remarked, "but in these cases personal appearances are the worst things of all to judge by. In any case, the woman told you she was waiting for somebody, and it's curious that Cordelvin disappeared the same night. A minor detail, but still a curious one is that the woman, when she left you, made off in the direction of the very place where the dead man was found."

They talked on for some time, and then Gerald rose to go. The morbid excitement of the day had had its effect upon his nerves, and his feelings as he walked homeward were of acute depression. Out of the chaos of gloomy thoughts regarding the tragedy, there arose in his mind the remembrance of his talk with Nina Penhurst that morning. The recollection even of that, though it lifted him out of the slough of tragic contemplation, brought with it its own peculiar sadness. Why had Nina refused to listen to his protestations of love? That she loved him in return he felt sure. Her eyes, her demeanour, her incautious and qualifying words, all had betrayed that. And yet if she loved him, why had she repelled him? Perhaps, after all, it was but her girlish coyness born of their too brief acquaintance, which had dictated her conduct. At all events, he would speak to her again; he must speak to her again—that very night.

Afternoon tea was brought in almost as soon as he arrived home. But Nina Penhurst was not present.

"She has gone to her room for an hour—she complained of a bad headache," Mrs. Mortimer explained in answer to Gerald's inquiry. "This dreadful discovery which she was so near sharing with you seems to have completely upset her. She suffers from headache a good deal, you know; but it always goes off in an hour or two. She'll be down to dinner."

But Miss Penhurst was not down to dinner. Seven o'clock arrived, and still she put in no appearance. A maid, sent promptly to her room, reported that Miss Penhurst was not there. A rapid search through the house and grounds revealed no sign of her presence. A strange, unfathomable feeling induced Gerald to put on his coat and hat.

"I'll go into the village," he remarked with unreal calmness; "perhaps she's gone shopping."

The village street produced no sign of Nina. Only Mr. Seddon the butcher gave him the slightest clue.

"I couldn't say for sure, sir," he told Gerald, "but I fancy I see the young lady pass two or three hours ago. She carried a small bag with her, sir, and might have been goin' to the station."

To the station went Gerald on the wings of the wind.

"Miss Penhurst, sir?" replied the station-master. "Yes, I saw her go by train this afternoon. Jim"—this to a porter—"what train did Miss Penhurst go by to-day?"

"Miss Penhurst," replied Jim, with a finger to his head; "she went by the 4.10 to Charing Cross, sir!"

The words of the railway porter startled Gerald as they fell upon his ears. In the sum total of Nina Penhurst's action there was, of course, nothing to be surprised at. It was easily conceivable that she might have received an urgent message to proceed to London, and, in any case, she was free to go if she chose.

But why had she departed so unceremoniously from Mrs. Mortimer's household? Why had she, as it were, stolen away, and caught the first train up to London? These were the thoughts that rose unbidden to Gerald's brain, only to be smothered as they framed themselves. For, to question the conduct of the girl to whom he had declared his love only that morning, seemed like sacrilege—seemed like introducing poisonous suspicion where he knew full well there was nothing but complete and sacred trust. Perhaps, he reasoned, there might be an explanatory telegram even now, awaiting his perusal when he arrived home. But there was not. Mrs. Mortimer had not heard a word. On the contrary, she looked up as her son entered, eager for information herself.

"Well," she asked gently, "any news?"

"Miss Penhurst has gone to London," Gerald replied, with a great effort at calmness; "she went by the 4.10."

"Gone to London?"

"Yes; why not, mother?" Gerald answered testily, annoyed that his mother's reception of the news should coincide with his own. "Surely she is entitled to go to London if she pleases."

"Yes, yes, Gerald, I know. But to go without a word; to steal away—to—why has she gone?"

"My dear mother, how on earth should I know?"

"No, of course not. But it's strange—very strange. I wonder if I made a mistake in not taking more trouble about her references when she came here?"

The last words were spoken in a low voice, almost to herself. But they did not fail to fall upon Gerald's alert ears. He looked up sharply.

"What do you mean, mother? Do you quite know what you are saying?"

Mrs. Mortimer glanced quickly at her son.

"You are very irritable and rude to-night, Gerald," she observed quietly.

"You make me! You are so suspicious. Simply because Nina Penhurst absents herself for a few hours, you begin 'wondering' about her references!"

"Well, you know I took her solely on the recommendation of a lady in London, who may possibly not——"

"Not exist!" finished Gerald, rising and pacing the room in his irritation; "say it, mother—say it right out! Say that she's a fraud! Good Heavens! how you women distrust one another."

Mrs. Mortimer did not reply for a moment. She disliked anything resembling a quarrel, and she could see that Gerald was angry and ill at ease.

"I am not suspicious of Miss Penhurst, and I certainly do not think her a fraud," she remarked quietly, after the pause; "I merely said that I thought her conduct in going to London very strange." With which bit of truly feminine casuistry, the discussion for the time ended.

CHAPTER VI.

In which Gerald Mortimer Steals and Destroys a Certain Letter.

Although Mrs. Mortimer's comments on the disappearance of Miss Penhurst were indicative of only mild suspicion, the same reticence was not observable among the inhabitants of Moulstone the next morning.

The news had got about as such things do, and the disappearance of the governess was made into a peg on which to hang some very serious suspicions indeed.

In an ordinary English village so few exciting incidents occur, that, when one does, it is seized upon with an eagerness rarely noticeable in towns. And when two strange things happen on the same day, it is almost inevitable that the gap dividing them will be bridged over, and a connection established between the two, if such a thing be at all possible.

Now the ghastly discovery of a dead man among the castle ruins had set the gossiping tongues of Moulstone wagging as they had not wagged for years; and when, on the top of that, came the report of Miss Penhurst's disappearance, all previous local records of gossiping went by the board. The inquest on the discovered body, held that particular morning, had divulged the fact that the dead and mutilated man had been a victim of strychnia poisoning, and a verdict of "Murder by a person or persons unknown" had been duly returned. Upon hearing which, the inhabitants of Moulstone, almost to a man, had construed Nina Penhurst's disappearance into a "flight," and with one accord had jumped to the conclusion that the "murder" and "flight" were a most obvious matter of cause and effect.

"I was one o' the last to see 'er," remarked old Asher Seddon, the butcher, to a few cronies in the bar-parlour of "The Plough," that morning; "p'raps the last, barrin' the railway folks. I see 'er a-'urryin' past, opposite my shop, fer all the world—as I told Mr. Gerald Mortimer last night—like a thief."

Asher Seddon had told Mr. Gerald Mortimer nothing of the sort, but subsequent events had quickened his imagination.

"Like a thief, eh, Asher?—you see 'er 'urryin' like a thief, did ye now—Ah!" observed William Loppidge, the landlord, with the keenest interest apparent in his manner. "And you told Mr. Gerald that?"

"Miss Penhurst," replied Jim, with a finger to his head; "she went by the 4.10 to Charing Cross, sir."

"I did, William. 'You don't 'appen to ev seen Miss Penhurst pass 'ere?' sez Mr. Gerald. 'But I do 'appen to ev seen 'er,' I sez; 'I see 'er in the dusk,' I sez, 'a-makin' fer the station fer all the world like a thief.' Them was my very words." And Asher Seddon drowned whatever qualms his unveracious statements may have caused in the pint pot before him.

"She was dressed quiet, and only carried a bit of a bag wi' 'er," the butcher continued, waxing eloquent as he observed how closely his audience followed his every word. "And she was a-'urryin' that quick, you know, that I sez to myself, 'There's summat wrong,' I sez, 'summat grievous wrong, as sure as my beef ain't mutton.' 'Ow true my words ev come you all know now, and if she don't know more about this murder than she'd care to tell—well, I'm done!"

He took another pull at his tankard as he concluded, buried his clenched fists deep in his pockets, pressed his lips together firmly, and shook his head sagely. His listeners in their turn took pulls at their tankards and shook their heads sagely. All except one, a sturdy, sandy-whiskered man of about forty, who sat smoking his clay pipe in dignified silence in the corner.

He was the village constable, at this moment off duty, and dressed in plain clothes.

"And what might be your opinion of it all, Mr. Gupsey?" inquired the landlord after a pause, turning to where the policeman sat.

The constable took a couple of dignified puffs at his pipe before replying.

"If so be as I was one of yourselves," he remarked a little severely, "I might have opinions. As a hofficer of the law I ask for facks. I'll allow as there's a certain amount of theory about Mr. Seddon's evidence, so to speak. She was dressed quiet, he sez, and that shows me she wished to escape observation. The bag, again, was small, which signified—what? That she was in an 'urry. Oh, yes, there's theory in what Mr. Seddon sez—that is, to a trained mind," and the constable cocked a thumb towards his head, as who should say that therein was contained a very highly-trained mind indeed. "But," continued the officer, and in the qualifying conjunction there was an infinity of significance—"theory ain't good enough, because it ain't facks. Howsomever, theory in this case may develop into facks, and then—why, we shall be under the painful necess'ty o' puttin' the 'andcuffs on 'er pretty wrists." And Police-constable Gupsey crossed his own hands in appropriate pantomime.

Such was the talk in Moulstone at this particular time, and it was little wonder that the long and mischievous tongue of gossip should penetrate to the home of the Mortimers. It did, sure enough, and to such purpose that, finding herself that afternoon once more alone with her son, and with Miss Penhurst's absence the sole theme of their talk, Mrs. Mortimer gave utterance to the significant query:

"Gerald, do you know what they are saying?"

The young man (his whole soul in agony with the dull ache of suspense regarding the absence of his loved one, and his temper attuned to that degree of irritability which is generally the accompaniment of blighted love) looked up quickly.

"What who are saying?" he demanded; "and about what?"

"What the people are saying about—about Miss Penhurst. I should have thought you would have heard."

"I have spoken scarcely a word to anybody to-day—what are they saying? How dare they say anything about—Miss Penhurst?"

Gerald's manner was one of fierce indignation. His mother hesitated a moment, then replied quietly:

"People will talk, you know—they are connecting Miss Penhurst's absence with——" She caught sight of her son's raised eyes, and stopped.

"Well," he demanded sternly, "out with it, mother! What are they connecting her absence with?"

There was no refusing his peremptory demand, no temporising with a son who looked as he looked then. She concluded her sentence.

"They are connecting her absence with the murder of the man at the asylum," she said.

Gerald leapt out of his chair.

"Then they are a lot of fools!" he fumed, "or worse; and they who give credence to such talk are encouraging the vilest of slanders. You, mother, surprise me to the utmost by repeating such a gross calumny."

"But I merely——"

He waved her interruption aside hastily.

"There is no excuse," he pursued; "no excuse whatever. However strange Miss Penhurst's absence may seem, it has nothing to do with—with the other affair. Do you hear, mother?" he cried fiercely; "nothing to do with it whatever. . . . Yes, come in!" The last words were in answer to a knock on the door. A servant entered, a trifle excitedly, with a letter.

"For Mrs. Mortimer," she explained, as Gerald darted eagerly forward and seized it. The maid moved to the fireplace, taking up the hearth-brush, and made as though to linger.

"Don't wait now, Mary," Mrs. Mortimer said, in answer to a quick sign from her son; "you can do that presently."

The door opened and shut behind the servant.

"It's for you, mother," Gerald whispered, passing the letter eagerly, "and it's from her—from Miss Penhurst!"

Mrs. Mortimer seized the missive, tore open the envelope, and unfolded the sheet of paper it contained. As she quickly scanned the writing, her brow contracted, and her eyes looked troubled. The letter fell to her side, and she looked towards the window.

"Mother, what is it? What does she say?" Gerald burst out. "Can't you see I am in suspense? May I look at the letter?"

He took it from her unresisting hand. It contained but a few lines. This is what he read:

> "Dear Mrs. Mortimer,—I can never hope you will forgive me for my ingratitude in going away as I have done, after all your great kindness to me. But believe me when I say that to go was my only course. Some day, when perchance you may know all, you will pity me. Meanwhile, I pray you and all at the Manor House, to think the best of me you can. If I give you no reasons and offer no excuses for my strange conduct, remember it is because circumstances are such that I cannot. For me silence seems the best—nay, the only course. Good-bye for ever. Let my prayer be that if you cannot forgive, you will try to forget
> "Nina Penhurst."

There was no date—no address. Only the postmark was there to show that it had been dispatched from "London, W.C."

Gerald read it through and through. As he read, the words of the letter seemed to dance before his sight; everything in the room whirled round and round. His mother spoke.

"What do you think of it, Gerald—isn't it a very strange letter?" she asked.

But Gerald did not answer. He had set down the letter with quavering hand, and had walked, or rather staggered, to the door. His face was white; his mouth rigid; his eyes fixed in a stony stare. He spoke without turning as he reached the door.

"I shall be back later," he said, and disappeared. He was out of the house in three or four seconds; out of the grounds a minute later, in the quiet and seclusion of a lane. Why he was here he did not realise. He realised nothing. Instinct alone had driven him outdoors; an inherent, unthought out desire for coolness to beat upon his fevered head—and to be alone. His mind was in a turmoil, his mental impressions in a mad, seething jumble. He walked on and on, at first with no end in view, yet wanting everything—comfort of soul. Then gradually, as the keen January air met his face, his mind grew cooler, his thoughts more coherent. The words of that letter recurred to him again and again. They seemed burnt into his brain.

"If I give no reasons and offer no excuses for my strange conduct, remember it is because circumstances are such that I cannot. For me silence seems the best—nay, the only course."

What did it all mean? Why did his own thoughts italicise those special phrases? Why did he instinctively conjure up a connection between them and his mother's account of the current village gossip? Even as he thought, he tried to strangle the vile suspicion that would come. He called himself and thought himself base, and yet by some strange freak of mental volition, suspicion came persistently, seemingly in opposition to the will.

"Why does foul suspicion arise when I know there is no ground for it? Oh, Nina, my love, my love, why have you gone, why have you gone from me?"

He had walked quite a distance by now, and was only recalled to himself by the sight of the asylum gates, at which he had unwittingly arrived. He passed in. Something new might have occurred since the morning. In any case a chat with his friend Dr. Branksome would afford him mental relief. By the time he had turned off from the broad gravel drive and traversed the side path leading to the doctor's apartments, he had recovered control of himself.

There was little sign of his recent agitation, as, for the second time that day, he met his friend.

"Well," he inquired, "any more developments?"

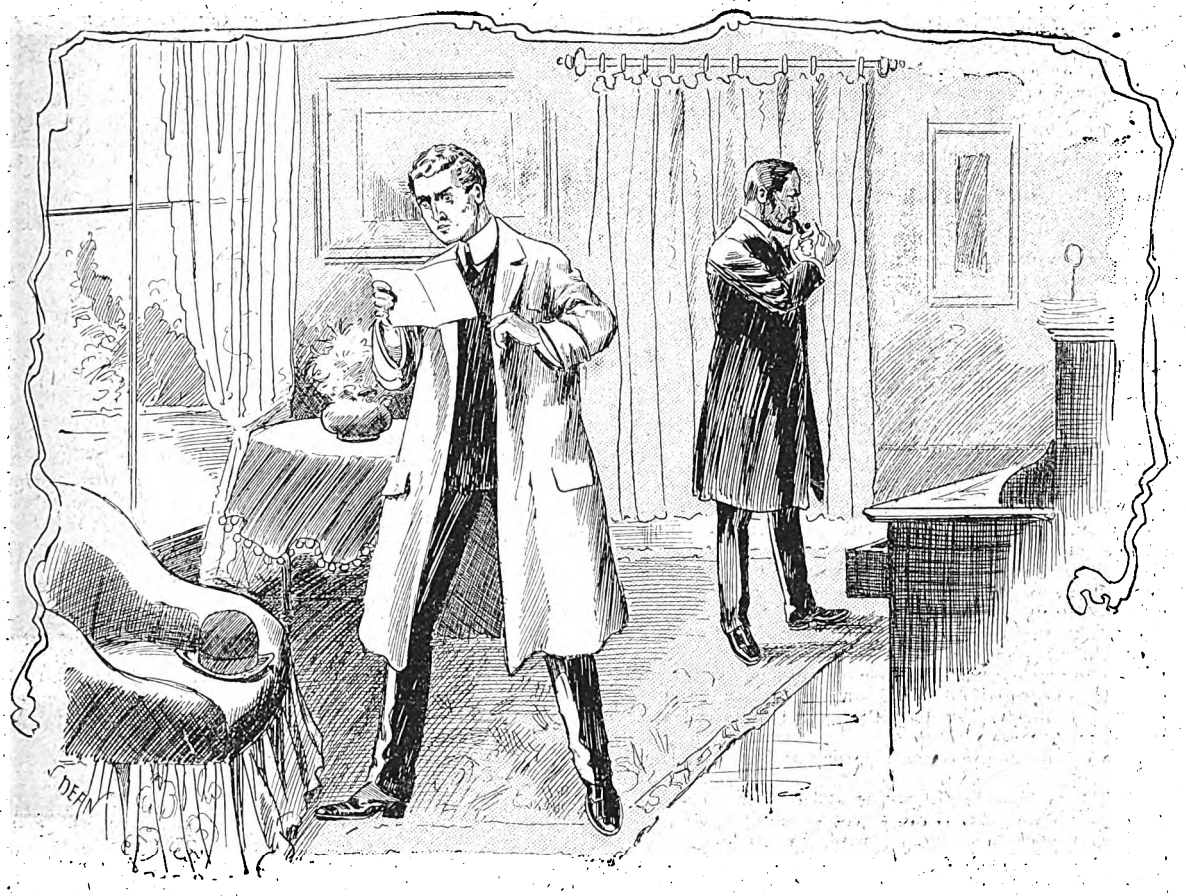
Dr. Branksome stepped across to a desk in a corner of the room. "Yes," he said, as he pulled open a drawer, "I've just received a letter!"

"A letter?"

"Yes; an anonymous letter which may afford a clue. It is addressed to me, and it comes from London. This is what it says:

"'The writer is unacquainted with the rules of Moulstone Asylum, but knowing of the discovery of the body of Felix Cordelvin, is anxious that no difficulty shall arise with regard to the burial. The writer, therefore, begs to inclose the sum of twenty pounds to defray expenses of the same, and to obviate the necessity of parish assistance.'

"There, what do you think of that?"



Perhaps it was well for Gerald that he was unobserved as he looked at the sheet of paper. For, as he did so he turned pale and his legs trembled under him.

"Who sends it?" asked Gerald.

"My dear chap, that's for the police to discover. I've already told you it's anonymous. There's no address, but there's twenty pounds—in bank-notes, observe—and, as the advertising pugilists say, money talks. But here's the note—see if you're detective enough to gather anything from it. I say it's a woman's writing."

He handed the letter to Gerald as he spoke, and turned away to light his pipe while the latter perused it. Perhaps it was well for Gerald that he was unobserved as he looked at the sheet of paper. For, as he did so, he turned pale, and his legs trembled under him. With a great effort he controlled himself.

"It's rather queer," was all he remarked, as he handed the letter back to the doctor.

Branksome replaced the letter in his desk.

"I have great hopes," he said, as he closed the drawer, "that it will afford a clue to the police. It's from a woman, don't you—— Oh! hullo?"

His words had been interrupted by the sudden opening of the door.

"Excuse me, Branksome," observed a young man in spectacles, pushing the door half open, "didn't know you were engaged; but that chap you were examining this morning has gone off in another fit, and I don't quite know what to make of him."

"All right, Myers, I'll come with you," Dr. Branksome replied. "Excuse me, Mortimer—I shall be back in a few minutes." And he departed with his medical colleague.

With eyes almost starting from his head Gerald gazed for a moment at the door as it closed behind the two doctors. Then his hands sought his throbbing temples.

"From her!" he gasped; "from Nina! Heavens, and Branksome is going to hand the letter over to the police. No, no, he must not! She is innocent—I swear she is innocent; but this anonymous letter in the hands of the police! No, they must not have it."

He stepped to the desk as he spoke, pulled out the drawer with trembling hand, and once more held the letter.

"Nina's handwriting!" he whispered hoarsely to himself, "there's no doubt of that. Fortunately, Branksome is unable to recognise it. Nobody else must see it!" He sprang towards the bright fire, and, bending down, thrust the letter among the living coals.

Then as he watched the greedy flames swallow the incriminating sheet of paper, he rose erect, and murmured:

"Thank Heaven!"

But directly he had completed the destruction, the full significance of the act rushed upon him. Branksome would be back presently, and then—what would happen? His friend would miss the letter, would question him about it! What could he say? He could not admit his guilt. To do so would be to strengthen the doctor's suspicion against the writer of the letter. And he could not face his friend Branksome at this moment with a lie on his lips. He must have time to think out a course of conduct. He must go before Branksome returned. Merely waiting to leave a brief message of regret with a servant, he left the room, and a minute or two later was striding towards the Manor House.

CHAPTER VII.

"Alive and Well, and Good for Another Twenty Years."

In the library of Sycamore House, the old mansion on Streatham Hill, to which we have been already introduced, sat two men. One was a tall, broadly-built, and well-preserved man of about fifty, whose clean-shaven face might have been handsome but for the unusual thinness of drooping lips, which gave to it a hard and somewhat sinister appearance.

"Well, Stephen," he remarked to his younger companion, "everything has turned out very well, my son."

The younger man fidgeted in his chair, while his dark, shifty eyes roved around the room apprehensively.

"At present," he replied, "but the thing isn't complete, is it?"

"Why, what more would you have?" inquired the older man. "Is not Anthony Cordelvin alive and well, and so long as he lives have I not the administration of his estate? What more would you have?"

The young man continued to gaze about him uneasily.

"I was thinking of the risk—" he began.

"Risk! Bah! From whom did you inherit that chicken heart of yours, Stephen? I've provided against all risk."

"But there's that doctor—that fellow Manisty. He might—"

"Oh, he won't talk, if that's what you're going to say. He has everything to lose by talking, and nothing whatever to gain. He saw me with a false beard on, and wouldn't recognise me now. And he doesn't know me except under the name of Causton. Moreover, my son, you ought to know by this time that Roderick Vanstone is no fool. I have arranged the whole of this business thoroughly." He paused a minute and puffed at the cigar he was smoking. Then he repeated, looking at his son:

"Yes, I have arranged this business with absolute thoroughness. It took me a long time to plan out the affair, and longer still to execute it. But it's done now. All the trouble might have been saved if you had married that girl."

"Now look here, guv'nor, why do you put it that way? You know I tried my hardest to persuade her."

"H'm, and the fair Nina Penhurst refused you, and rather than endure what she styled your 'persecutions,' bolted from this place and the protection of myself—her lawful guardian. Ah well! I can't help it. She's of age now, and I've no control over her."

"And some day she'll inherit the whole of the Cordelvin property?"

The elder man eyed his son quizzingly.

"Yes," he replied drily; "some day. But not during the life of her relative, Anthony Cordelvin. So long as he lives, I administer the estate on his behalf. That was so arranged by the testator because Anthony was mentally incapable of administering it himself."

"I wonder what Nina Penhurst, as next heir, would think if she knew the condition of the estate as administered by her estimable and high-principled guardian, Roderick Vanstone," remarked the younger man cynically.

Roderick Vanstone looked up quickly.

"No sarcasm, Stephen," he said severely; "it comes from you with a very ill grace. Remember, that whatever I have done has been for your sake; you've shared in—in——"

"The plunder!" finished Stephen. "Well, I suppose I have, and I oughtn't to complain. But what a bust-up there'll be some day when Anthony Cordelvin dies, and the solicitors of the next heir examine the estate. What a lot of money there will be unaccounted for."

"Hush, Stephen! Don't talk so loudly." He paused a moment, and then added with stern emphasis: "Anthony Cordelvin mustn't die—he's good for another twenty years."

"Thanks to the—" began Stephen; but the other raised a warning finger, and said:

"I know what you would say; but don't say it. Remember, it is a compact never to mention a certain incident, or rather chain of incidents, even between ourselves." A bead of perspiration was on Roderick Vanstone's forehead as he spoke, though his words were quietly uttered.

"All right, guv'nor, don't get excited. I'm only to remember that Anthony Cordelvin is alive—a poor, demented man, it is true—but alive and well, eh?"

"That's it, my son. Alive and well, and good for another twenty years. Ha! ha!"

And the two exchanged a smile in which there was a whole world of mystery and ghastly significance. Then, lapsing into silence, they puffed softly at their cigars, and fell, each in his own particular way, to thinking.

Roderick Vanstone's thoughts were of the long past—of a period twenty years before. In those old days he had been in practice as a solicitor, and among his clients he had numbered old Mark Cordelvin, a City merchant of vast wealth, and extreme eccentricity of character. Years before he had known the old merchant, the latter had married, and had had a son born to him, his wife dying shortly afterwards. In the son, whom he named Anthony, all his fondest hopes and aspirations were centred. Judge, then, of his intense sorrow and chagrin when he discovered that as young Anthony grew up, he gave unmistakable signs of mental decrepitude. With the years his limbs developed, but his brain gave but little indication of growth or increased capability.

Although mortified and bitterly disappointed, old Mark Cordelvin would not hear of having his imbecile son sent away to any institution. He kept him beneath his own roof, tending him with every care, and surrounding him with every comfort and luxury that money could buy.

Later on in his life, when his son was a grown man of thirty, there came into old Mark's care and guardianship the orphaned and infant daughter of one of his few surviving relatives. Eccentric as the old man was, little Nina Penhurst, as she grew to comprehend, had nothing but the tenderest affection for him, and the day on which he died was the bitterest she had ever realised in all her young life. When old Mark Cordelvin's will came to be read, it was found that, apart from a few comparatively unimportant legacies, the whole of his property had been bequeathed to his son Anthony for the remainder of his life, the whole passing, upon his death, into the sole possession of Nina Penhurst.

During Anthony's life, in consequence of his enfeebled mental condition, it was provided that old Mark's lawyer, Roderick Vanstone, should administer the estate and assume the guardianship of little Nina Penhurst. Which provision had been duly carried out, with the result that Roderick Vanstone had manipulated the accounts of the estate, entirely to his own advantage. During the period of his ward's sojourn with him, his son, and Anthony Cordelvin, a violent antipathy to her had been engendered in the breast of the imbecile, a feeling which, for purposes of his own, Roderick Vanstone had done his best to foster. At the same time, he had striven with might and main to bring about feelings of affection on the part of Nina for his son Stephen, his ultimate idea being a marriage between the two. The upshot of all which was that he had awoke one morning in the old house on Streatham Hill, to find that Nina Penhurst had gone, leaving a brief note behind her, to the effect that she would never return.

So ran Roderick Vanstone's train of thought as he sat silently smoking in company with his son—a train of thought that culminated with a further contemplation in detail to "a certain incident, or rather chain of incidents "of which he had so recently forbidden his son to expatiate.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Woman in the Blue Cloak Again.

The brain of Gerald Mortimer was in a whirl as he strode homeward from the asylum. The exciting events of the past few days—the discovery of the dead man, Nina's flight, his own strange encounter with the woman in the blue cloak, recurred to his mind with maddening reiteration. The gossip of the villagers came back to him, and with it the recollection of the strange letter from Nina Penhurst to his mother, which lent colour to brooding suspicion. And then that other—the anonymous letter, addressed to Dr. Branksome, which he had just stolen and destroyed—why, oh, why, had all these circumstances combined to make him doubt his beloved?

Gerald shivered as he mentally reviewed the whole affair, striving to do so deliberately and coolly. No, no; he could not doubt Nina! It was impossible, when he recalled her good and gentle nature.

But though he might not doubt, others would, and those letters were serious—he shivered again as he thought of the phrase—pieces of evidence against her. Well, thank goodness, one letter was out of the way, and he must manage to get possession of the other.

Meantime, in his present state of mind, he could not remain in Moulstone. He felt he must do something. To search for Nina Penhurst in London was hopeless. Besides, he had no right; she had refused to give him the right to be solicitous on her behalf. Yet, at any moment, danger might threaten her. The gathering suspicion might grow, and the authorities might "take steps." If danger threatened her he must be near to avert it if possible. Moreover, for a few days he must keep out of Branksome's way, to avoid awkward inquiries about that letter. He would go to London that night.

He announced his intention to his mother as soon as he arrived home.

"Going to London to-night, Gerald?" she said surprised, "but I thought you weren't going till next week."

"I find I've some business to do, mother," he rejoined; "business that will not wait."

His mother looked at him keenly, as he spoke with forced calmness, but she loved her son too well to provoke him by pressing the matter further.

"Mother," he said, as a few minutes later he stood ready to depart, "have you that letter from Miss Penhurst?"

Mrs. Mortimer, surprised at the abruptness of the question, replied: "Yes; it's in my desk."

"I want you to give it me," he said, and then, seeing her questioning hesitation, added: "No, mother, don't ask me why I want it, but give it me."

She crossed over to her desk, withdrew the letter, and handed it to him without a word.

"Now, my dear mother," he whispered, as he bent down and kissed her good-bye, "I have one more request to make. Don't mention anything about this letter to a soul! Do you hear, mother darling? Nobody must know that you ever received it! Promise!"

His earnestness filled her with wonderment and vague dread, but she did not question. She simply promised what he asked her. A moment later and he was gone.

The evening was well advanced when Gerald alighted from the train at Charing Cross. Outside the station he immediately chartered a cab and drove to his chambers, the Law Courts' clock striking nine just as the vehicle turned into Middle Temple Lane. Nobody having been apprised of his coming, he found his chambers dark and cold, and he merely waited a few minutes ere setting out for the Strand with the idea of getting supper.

That meal over, he lit a cigar and walked out into the street. His mind was too pre-occupied to allow him to take note of where he walked, and pure chance took him on to the Embankment. A fog was coming up from the river as he strolled slowly along, absently gazing over the parapet towards the murky waters. But neither fog nor cold affected him on this night. He was thinking—trying to fashion a plan of action upon which to embark on the morrow. He must find Nina Penhurst; that, at any rate, he was decided on. But how? In this mighty maze of London he might search for a year—for ten years—without result.

"Please excuse me, but could you tell me whereabouts the Temple Station is?"

Gerald swerved round at the words.

"I know it is close by," the voice pursued, "but owing to the fog I am not quite sure where it is."

Gerald did not reply. He tried to, but instead he gasped out an exclamation.

For the voice that addressed him was the voice of a woman. And the woman was the woman with the blue cloak!

At the Concert.

How the Troxtons were Reconciled.

"It has been a mistake," said Nathan Troxton. "It has been a bitter mistake. I cannot see how either of us ever made it. But the sooner we retrieve it the better. Perhaps, after all, I have not quite ruined your life, though you seem to think that I have. As for myself, I defy you to ruin my life. No woman shall do that, or man either!"

"Oh, no!" interposed his wife scornfully, "no one could ruin your life. You are too independent and too selfish. One could lavish one's best love on you and you would never know it. One could hate you and you would not care. I have been angry and out of sympathy with you for weeks at a time, and you did not even suspect it. I'm tired to the soul of living with a galvanised mummy."

"Of course," responded Troxton smilingly, "you naturally would be. Therefore, let us separate without further delay. A divorce is not necessary. I shall have no further use for matrimony, and as for you, I know your scruples much too well to think that you would ever be the wife of another man during my lifetime. Now, I have a proposition to make."

"Yes."

"Let one of us take the child and the other the home. You are to choose. If you take Claribel, then leave me the books and pictures and the other things we have cared for. If you choose the home I will take our daughter and go. The offer is, perhaps, not a generous one. It is not chivalrous. I ought to offer you the home and the child. But I see no reason for being more than just. I have been as unfortunate as you, and see no reason for despoiling myself of everything."

Mary Troxton looked about her at the familiar, beautiful room. The fire danced in the great fireplace; the pictures she and her husband had selected together looked at her from the walls; her chair stood in its accustomed place by the reading-table. Beyond, in the dining-room, she caught the gleam of the china and crystal she had enthusiastically selected in happier days. The beauty and the associations of these material things called to her with a thousand tempting voices. Her face grew white.

"I will take the child," she said. "I choose Claribel."

The next morning, leading her eight-year-old daughter by the hand, she opened the door of her house for the last time. At the ultimate moment she turned and looked back upon her land of lost delights.

"What a pity that we hate each other," she said to her husband. "It is so inconvenient!"

"Isn't it!" he assented. He bowed her out. The latch snapped behind her. She walked to the pavement, holding the little girl by the hand. One more look backward escaped her, and she gave a sharp cry.

"My home, my home!" she said.

"Mamma, you hurt my hand so," sobbed Claribel. "Why do you talk so? I don't want to go walking. I want to go back to the nursery and play with my dolls."

Inside the house a man flung himself, face downward, upon a couch and cried:

"My little girl! My little girl! How am I going to live without my little girl?"

* * * * *

Ten years later Mary Troxton and her daughter entered the Queen's Hall one Friday afternoon for the pleasure of listening to a concert by a celebrated orchestra. Mary Troxton walked with the independent step of one who is in the habit of walking alone. There was a clear and sad light in her grey eyes. Her brow had grown loftier than it had been in the days of her youth. Dignity and patience and kindliness spoke in her every feature. As she moved along in her violet-coloured garments, no woman in the audience that day, young or old, had a personality so appealing and so picturesque.

About her young daughter there appeared to be something unfulfilled. The face wore an expression of longing—not the vague and enchanting restlessness of a young girl, but something suggestive of more definite regret and deprivation. With the frank disregard of beauty which the young can afford to assume, the girl had costumed herself in black. Black plumes shaded her face; her little chin was hidden in her sombre furs, and the delicate hand with which she pressed down her chair was gloved in black.

This slender hand caught the casual glance of a gentleman occupying the next seat, and he followed it with his eyes till it rested on the owner's lap. Still its fragile contour held him, as if it awakened memories, and he sat staring at it idly, with no care, apparently, to lift his eyes higher.

He was a man of middle age, prematurely grey, with a serious and intellectual face, and the manner of one who is weary with too much work or responsibility.

It was not till after the music had begun and one of the too obvious descriptive symphonies of a certain modern composer began to make its insistent way into the comprehension of the audience, that he chose to lift his his eyes. When he beheld the face of the young girl next him a strange and comprehending light stole into his face, and his fixed regard caused the girl to return his look.

For a moment perplexity had its way with her. Then an expression of awe—almost fright—appeared in her eyes. Then, quietly and naturally, the two knew themselves for father and daughter, meeting after ten years.

There was no need for Claribel's soft pressure on her mother's arm to make her acquainted with the fact that Nathan Troxton sat there beside them. She had noticed him when she stood in the aisle waiting for her daughter to precede her. A mist clouded her sight, and it seemed to her for a moment as if death were actually knocking at her house of life. But she forced herself to calmness and seated herself.

It was fate, no doubt. From the day she had left her own home she had not lived in London. For a time she and her daughter had known peaceful English country life; for years she had lived in a quiet, beautiful Sussex village, where Claribel had attended school. For the first time she had returned to London. What likelihood, she had asked herself, was there of meeting Nathan Troxton in a city of five million souls? Yet here, on the first occasion on which she ventured into a public place, she met him! It was fate, without doubt.

The music had changed. The orchestra was giving to the people the most reverent thoughts of a master. True and sweet and comforting was the serene major harmony, and the dew of its beauty fell into the very cisterns of the heart. In the trembling young girl in the sable garments it awoke a world of tenderness. The longing and dissatisfaction from which she had suffered took concrete form in her elated imagination.

It was her father that she wanted—her father's love, her father's guidance, his authority! As the rivulets of spring dance down the hillside to find the river, so her soul sought that of her father. The music, "yearning like a god in pain," impelled her to indulge in an exquisite impulse.

She slipped the glove from her warm and quivering fingers and laid them softly—softly as a kiss—within the hand of the man beside her. On his part there was a second's hesitation as if the faithful nerves of his hand had not told his aching heart the truth. Then, with a grasp, such as a sinful one might take upon an angel's robe, he closed his hand upon that of the girl, and over the two spread a happiness like the balm of a starlit summer night.

The concert ended in time. The three rose. They faced each other. Each looked beautiful to the eyes of the rest. The crowd passed along the aisles. It would have been profane to have said anything commonplace. Yet it was no place for an extraordinary word. It was Claribel who first found courage to speak.

"It is strange that you knew me," she said to her father. "Tell me, was it your eyes or your heart that first informed you who I was?"

"I cannot tell. But now that we have met, are we to part?" His eyes asked the question of the elder woman, though it was the younger one he addressed.

"Nathan Troxton," said his wife, "let the girl have her rights. She wants you, and needs you. Take her home with you for a time."

"But you must come too, Mary. Come, life is going fast. Let us be at peace. What were the old feuds? I have forgotten what they were all about. I only remember how lonely I am."

"Who am I," said Mary Troxton, with those divine melodies of the master still ringing in her soul, "that I should refuse to walk the path appointed for my feet?"

So they went out together—those three—into the street, and so home.

DOMESTIC PAPER-HANGING.

How Mrs. Smith tried Papering a Room.

Mrs. Smith is very economical. So the other day when she and Mr. Smith were talking about house-cleaning, and the painting and papering that had to be done, a bright thought as usual occurred to Mrs. Smith, and says she:

"Now, what's the use of paper-hangers to put that paper on? I can do it myself, just as well as they, and we will thereby save the cost and all the bother of having them, and I'm going to do it."

Mr. Smith at first remonstrated, though in a feeble vein; but Mrs. Smith gave signs of bursting into tears, and he knew the consequences thereof, so he relapsed into silence and let her have her way. That afternoon Mrs. Smith set out to look for wall paper, and bought some.

Next morning she was up bright and early, and after breakfast prepared to hang the paper. Her first move was to make some paste, and then she took time to get the children off to school, after which she took time to consider. She knew she could do those three rooms before tea time easily enough.

So, after she had rested awhile, she unrolled the paper, and measured a length, and cut it off at the right place.

Then she spread it on the table, and looked round for something to put the paste on with, and suddenly bethought herself of her husband's hat-brush, which was a nice soft brush, and she took it out and commenced. She put on plenty of paste, so that it would be sure to stick, and then arose the query, how was she to get up to put it on the wall, a trifle over eight feet high?

Looking round a good idea struck her; she would take the wash-stand, and set a long-legged stool on that, and by dint of reaching she could do the thing nicely. So she struggled, and puffed, and pulled, and lifted the wash-stand, and set it down on her toes and pinched them, and tore her dress.

After a while she got the wash-stand where she wanted it, and set the stool upon it, and took the paper, first doubling the end over, and started to mount the extemporised pyramid. She got up all right, and balanced very well, and tried to stick the paper on.

But it wouldn't stick very well, having grown weak from long-endured soaking, and it suddenly parted at the corner and dropped with a "clish" on the floor. Then she got down and emphatically gathered it up and cast it out, and pasted another strip, and climbed her ladder of fame and stuck the paper on the wall. To be sure it was wrinkled, but she thought she could straighten it out all right by gentle pulling.

So she went to get down, and just as she was taking the last step the old stool gave a lurch, in consequence of one leg sliding off the corner of the stand, and she made a sudden ignominious descent, and landed with one foot in the pail of paste, and balanced there for a moment, somewhat as the ballet girl does, and then the pail overturned, and so did Mrs. Smith, and bumped her head on the floor, and then slowly and solemnly that strip of paper slid off the wall to the floor on top of her, and Mrs. Smith arose.

She just took off her paste-trimmed garments, and she laid her shoe away, and she cleaned the room up sooner than she ever did before in her life, and rolled up the paper and got all ready for the paper-hangers. Then she got dinner ready and when Mr. Smith came she told him to send them up. But that was all she told.

The Greatest Discovery of the Century.

For seven hours Dr. Bellingham has sat leaning slightly forward in his red morocco chair, his body absolutely rigid. His thin lips are pressed firmly together, his whole face is livid except for two burning spots below his cheek bones, and his knees occasionally jog against the laboratory table, making the oil in the reading-lamp swing, and the whole room tremble almost imperceptibly.

At last the little brass clock on the mantelpiece strikes five. His vigil is ended. At the sound, startling in that death-like stillness, the rabbit which the doctor has been holding in his moist hands wriggles. Instinctively Dr. Bellingham tightens his grasp, but as the last musical vibration dies away the terrified creature slips through his fingers and falls with a thud on the carpet.

The doctor's head drops forward on his arms, and the rabbit lies at his feet forgotten. Its great brown eyes are fixed on its tormentor with a look of fearful horror, and its long ears are pressed back until they are almost lost to sight in the fur.

Occasionally the animal starts up with a cry of pain, throws its head back, opens it eyes more widely, panting and wriggling, while its whole body is shaken with spasms and convulsions. Gradually, however, it grows weaker and weaker, its respiration becomes slower, and it falls into a kind of stupor.

At last the doctor raises his head and laughs softly to himself.

There is a faint smell of chloroform in the room, and the dark patches of blood on the table, the chisel and mallet, the electrical appliances, and the large cylindrical glass case containing iron pincers and claws with which the operator may grip at pleasure any part of the captive animal's body, and lacerate and crush it, indicates the nature of the sufferings from which death had not yet relieved the mangled victim of the vivisectionist.

The doctor pushes his chair back and rises slowly. The window is open and he walks towards it, reviving as the cold air plays on his burning forehead.

It is done at last. The great physiological secret on which he has staked fifteen years of his life and a fortune can baffle him no longer. He holds in his hand a new key to life. The enchanted paths of the garden of science which he has trod so faithfully have led him to the fountain of healing and knowledge, and it is in his power to relieve half the world of its most terrible and inevitable suffering.

He presses his hand against the icy glass and then puts his forehead to it. His brain is throbbing. The dazzling prospect of immortal fame multiplies the sweets of his reward until they overwhelm him. After all, it is for this that he has sacrificed so much, it is for this that he has morally divorced his wife that he may wed himself body and soul and strength to his laboratory.

He is so deep in his own thoughts that he does not hear the door open, nor notice the pale-faced woman who creeps in on tiptoe.

She has thrown a shawl hastily across her shoulders, and her long black hair is falling in luxurious waves down her back. For fifteen years she has never ventured across the threshold of that room, and she cannot resist one curious look at the table and the glass cupboards filled with scientific instruments, before she breathes her husband's name in a terrified whisper.

The doctor twists round with a little cry, and instinctively his guilty eyes are turned on the rabbit, which still crouches half-hidden beneath his chair. His white cheeks suddenly flush like a man discovered in the very commission of a crime, and he springs forward with a furious gesture.

"Maria!" he cries, "how dare you come in here against my orders—how dare you!"

His wife's eyes flash with indignation. She leans back against the table and stares at him defiantly.

"I came here to see what you were doing," she says at last, speaking slowly. "It will soon be morning now, and I am tired of waiting."

The doctor's one idea is to get her out of the room.

"Go back to bed," he says sternly. "I have finished now—finished for ever."

"What do you mean?"

She listens intently, her blue eyes wide open, her breath coming in quick, short gasps as he tells her of the great scientfic era which has dawned.

He grows eloquent as he speaks of the theme which fills his heart, and a great longing steals over him to find someone who will share his happiness. It is too much for him to bear alone. He forgets his caution and his anger at his wife's intrusion in that sacred room; he forgets everything except the great discovery and all it means to him, all it promises for suffering humanity.

He holds out his arms, but she shrinks back from him.

"It is all very well," she says scornfully, "you come to me now that your work is finished; but you never came before. Your hobby has brought you fame, and at last you have time to think of me, who have been standing aside for fifteen years, and paying for you. Have you no words of thanks for my fortune which you have squandered in paving your way to immortality? Have you no thought for my feelings which you have used as a pile on which to raise the monument of your ambition above the quagmire of poverty's inevitable failure?

"Do you know how my heart has been bleeding all these years for a token of your love? No! no! You are blind to everything but your own success in life, and I—I am a fool who trusted in a man."

The doctor stands with his hands still half outstretched, cowed by his wife's vehemence. He has never heard her speak like this before, although he has often feared that in her heart of hearts she must know that he married her for her money. And yet at this moment he feels that he could love her. In her anger she is more beautiful than she has ever seemed to him before, blinded with his absorbing interest in the cause of science.

She listens to all he has to say, at first with calm indifference tinged with scorn, but gradually her heart softens, and her love for the man who is pleading before her overcomes every other feeling.

She holds out her white hands to him, and in another moment he would have taken her in his arms, when a rustle behind them makes them both start.

"What was that?" Maria asks, holding her breath, and looking round the room in terror.

The doctor has forgotten the rabbit which is just awakening from its stupor. It raises its head, and then utters a plaintive cry.

"Maria!" he cries, "how dare you come in here against my orders—how dare you!"

In a moment his wife is down on her knees beside the little creature, and as she sees the blood which still clots its coat she realises for the first time the cruel experiments with a living creature by which her husband has made his great discovery.

"Put that rabbit down!" cries the doctor. His heart is beating fast, and he trembles to think what his wife may do now that she has discovered this secret which he has guarded from her so zealously for fifteen years.

"Is this how you have spent your time, in torturing animals? Is this how you have gratified your lust for cruelty?" she asks, her eyes blazing with fury, and her white hand tightly clenched.

"My dear child," he begins, "it was necessary for the sake of humanity. It is neither cruel nor unjustifiable when it is done in the interests of science. Would you have had me experiment on human beings? These dumb animals are invaluable auxiliaries in researches of the intricate and delicate nature which I have been making. I——"

He stops, for his wife has risen and is standing before him.

"And was it in the interests of science that you left the poor creature lying there in agony?" she asks breathlessly.

"The longer the creature lives the more certain are the results of the discovery which I have made. There is no need for all this excitement, Maria. If you take my advice you will go back to your bedroom and calm yourself."

His wife stoops down and examines the deep wounds in the little creature. Tears of infinite compassion fill her eyes as it wriggles at her touch.

Then turning her head slightly away she takes the rabbit up by its ears and gives it one quick decisive blow with the side of her hand which puts it out of its misery for ever.

"There," she says, as she lays it almost reverently on the carpet. "Have you got any more of them?"

Her husband groans. She looks up at him, and her whole frame suddenly shakes with a tremendous hysterical storm of passion.

"No, no! don't touch me," she cries, as the doctor springs to her side. "Go away. My abhorrence for a vivisector had almost made me hate my husband."

* * * * *

A direful purpose, born of a fixed idea, has taken hold of the doctor.

If his wife would only relent. If he could only persuade her to throw prejudice on one side in the cause of science, on behalf of her sex, having thought for his great ambition.

He has coaxed, he has stormed, he has raved, he has even stooped to flattery, but her mind is made up. Not another penny of hers shall ever be spent on developing the great discovery which is to make the whole world echo with praises of his name.

The doctor is perfectly aware that without his wife's consent he can never hope to reach the dazzling horizon which has opened before him—unless—yes, unless she dies.

Fate seems to be dealing very hardly with him. The scattered speculations of fifteen years' hard study have taken definite shapes at last only to mock his ambition. The theory with which he has wrestled has been revealed; vague surmises and wild hypotheses have become absolute certainties; a lifetime of patient labour and minute scientific investigation has led to the greatest discovery of the century.

His heaven is flushed with the dawn of a new epoch in medical science, but the shadow of his wife's resentment intervenes.

The doctor is sitting once more in the red morocco chair at his laboratory table. A newspaper is lying crumpled at his elbow, his head is thrown back, his eyes are closed. His thoughts are so inhuman that he has not the moral courage to face them, and his brain is working almost mechanically and under protest, so to speak.

At the first blush it would seem impossible that we could cheat ourselves, and yet there are times in the life of every man when he deliberately deceives his own conscience. It is easily done. Our thoughts and actions run away with us, and we stand by, as it were, and wash our hands of the whole business.

It is with something like a sigh of despair that Doctor Bellingham opens his eyes and suddenly catches sight of his wife sitting in the garden under the shade of a big acacia-tree, and evidently waiting for him before pouring out tea.

He gets up quickly, and taking a folding-chair under his arm he lets himself out through the open window on to the smooth, well-kept lawn.

"Maria," he says, as he settles himself down by her side and empties some strawberries on to his plate, "I'm thinking of going away for a few weeks."

"Going away?" in a voice of evident surprise. "Whatever for?"

"Something very much like virulent typhoid has broken out at a little place called Wentfield, about twenty miles from here, and——"

"But what in the world has that got to go with you? They have their own doctors surely?"

"That's just it. They haven't. The place is twenty miles from the nearest town. I'm going there to see what I can do."

His wife looks at him closely for a minute, and then she holds out her hand for his cup.

"When do you mean to start?" she says, with a little shrug.

"To-night."

"To-night! You might have given me a little longer notice. However, I will be ready."

"You!" with well feigned astonishment and a smile of ridicule.

"You don't mean to say that you acutally thought I was going to be left behind?"

"Certainly, my dear child," says the doctor.

At this moment the footman arrived with some hot water, and Dr. Bellingham's reply is evidently meant to reach his ears.

"Nothing would induce me to give my permission to your accompanying me. A doctor must run the risk of infection, and to a certain extent he grows hardened to it. He must not allow himself to think of danger; but a frail woman like you—no, Maria, you must stop at home, whatever happens."

"A wife's place is at her husband's side."

"You are very thoughtful for a woman who has ruined my life," says the doctor with sudden bitterness.

Mrs. Bellingham turns her head away.

"We will not reopen that discussion, if you please," she says firmly. "Will you have some more tea?"

The doctor seldoms takes more than two cups, but he makes an exception this afternoon. He dreads going back to his studies, to be alone with his conscience.

For a long time he sits there ridiculing his wife's intention of following him to Wentfield, and finally he gives in with apparent despair.

"If you will have your own way I suppose you must," he says brutally. "I cannot do more than warn you of the terrible danger you are running."

Then he gets up and walks towards the house, trying hard to make himself believe he really hopes she will not go.

"I've done all I can to dissuade her," he keeps on muttering to himself, and all the time he knows that were it not for his opposition she would never have wanted to go at all.

His breath has been fanning the flame his conscience bids him extinguish, and he says to himself it is not his fault if it won't go out.

* * * * *

For three weeks Dr. Bellingham has been working among the poor of Wentfield. The plague is still raging with unabated fury, and although another doctor and a Sister of Mercy have followed his noble example they can do little except to alleviate the suffering and institute precautions to prevent the germs spreading more rapidly than they do from house to house.

In the great work he is doing the doctor almost contrives to forget his shattered hopes and the sinful purpose which really prompted him to enlist his sympathies in the cause of these poor village people.

And yet from day to day he watches his wife with eager anxiety, and wonders how much longer it will be before she falls a victim to the disease in the midst of which she moves and lives unharmed.

At first he will not acknowledge even to himself that it is not her death but her escape which he dreads, although he sometimes goes so far as to say that if it were the other way round a man would be justified in sacrificing one life for the sake of thousands of human beings. The perfection of his great scientific discovery would reduce the mortality of the world nearly twenty per cent., and that perfection is simply waiting because of a woman's repugnance to vivisection.

Sometimes he says to himself that a man who would sacrifice his love for the sake of his duty would deserve to be canonised. He dwells upon these thoughts with a strange admixture of pleasure and loathing, and all the time he is working among the poor, who turn in the street to bless him as he moves among them like an angel of mercy.

Then the time comes when he is compelled to meet his own thoughts. He confesses to himself that it is his duty to sacrifice his wife upon the altar of physiology as he has sacrificed the lives of animals on his vivisecting table, but he will not admit that this same altar has been raised in the sanctuary of his ambition.

Upon a day he discovers that certain drugs taken internally produce the same deadly effect upon the human constitution as the microscopic germs of the disease which is decimating the people of Wentfield. Then he can no longer cloak his criminal intentions. Nature has failed to remove the thorn from his side, although he has tempted Death with a fragile bait; and when he confesses this he stands confessed a criminal in all but deed.

So cleverly has he deceived himself in the past, that the revelation of his direful purpose is almost a shock to him; but it is not long before he grows reconciled to the idea of destroying his wife.

Breakfast is on the table, and his wife is not down. The doctor places a chair against the door. If anyone should come in suddenly this would give him a moment's warning. Then he pours out two cups of coffee, and as he places one by his wife's plate he drops in a few grains of white powder, which float for a minute on the top and then slowly dissolve.

At this moment Mrs. Bellingham comes in. She suspects nothing, or the terrified look on her husband's face could not have escaped her attention. The morning greetings are hardly over when the door is thrown open and the landlady bursts into the room, her face white as death. She looks towards the doctor, and then turns significantly to Mrs. Bellingham.

"Can I speak to you for a minute, sir?"

The doctor rises with a perplexed look and follows the woman out into the passage.

Mrs. Bellingham half rises from her chair, then she sits down again, and raises her coffee to her lips. As she does so she notices a little island of bubbles floating on the top.

"Frank must have given me his coffee," she says to herself, fishing for what she supposed was sugar and finding it dissolved. Then she changed the cups and the doctor came in, his face haggard and his lips bloodless.

He gives one quick look at his wife's cup, and as she does so she raises it to her lips.

"Dr. Raymond is down with the plague," he says, in a voice which sounded strangly unnatural even to himself. "I must be off at once. No, I can't stay for any breakfast."

He snatches up his cup of coffee, drinks it eagerly, and then rushes out of the room, and his wife hears him going downstairs three steps at the time.

* * * * * *

Two hours later Dr. Bellingham is lying by the side of his fellow-worker, tossing from side to side on a bed of fever, and suffering all the terrible internal agonies of the plague.

The Sister of Mercy is watching by their bedsides with a look of infinite compassion, and she vaguely wonders how long it will be before her turn comes.

She sends a messenger off to the nearest town with an urgent letter to the doctor, and then she returns to watch over the sufferers in the long, dimly-lit barn which has been turned into a temporary hospital.

Terrible as Dr. Bellingham's physical sufferings are they seem nothing to him compared with his mental agony. Summoned to his death-bed in the very commission of a crime, repentance seems impossible.

If he had seen his wife lying dead repentance would have been easy enough, but to repent before the deed is done and not be able to stop it! It is impossible to realise the intensity of his despair. So far as he could guess the time his wife would still be in full possession of her health.

He had been prepared to see her die with his mortal eyes, but the thought of looking back from the other side of the shadow of death and watching his own condemnation is enough to make the boldest man a coward.

Nor is this all. Until this moment when he lies rolling from side to side, in terrible torture, he has never realised the awfulness of pain. In a few minutes more his sweet gentle wife will be on her deathbed, and he cannot send anyone to help her, to even moisten her lips as his are being moistened by the Sister of Mercy.

Horrible visions of hell made terrible with all the instruments of his vivisecting room float before him. Already he feels the hot iron on his brain, the sharp knives running this way and that, the pincers, the chisel and the stunning mallet.

Now his head is being plunged into mercury, now he is being scalded alive, now his limbs are being twisted into cramped and unnatural positions, and he shrieks in his mental agony as he feels himself being carried to a height and dropped upon bars and ridges of iron to test the effect of the wounds he has received. All the miscellaneous torments of his vivisecting room, which he has fancied justifiable, are crushing his happiness now, if happiness is in that tortured man tossing on his deathbed.

Despair is gnawing at his heart. What is the use of all those hours of study now that his life's purpose is wrecked and he can never pursue the grand scientific themes which he had brought almost to perfection?

Presently a sudden calm comes over him. He no longer feels the pains which had been racking him. His last hour has come. The doctor stirs fearfully, and raises himself on his elbow.

He calls to the Sister of Mercy, who has been holding her hands to her ears to shut out the sound of his cries, and asks for a sheet of paper and a pencil. His fingers are trembling so that he can hardly write. His strength is sinking fast, his breath is coming slower. At last it is finished. He signs his name with desperate eagerness, a merciful unconsciousness steals over him, and he falls back on his pillow, one white hand clutching the paper, and the other pressed to his eyes as if to shut out some horrible scene.

* * * * *

It is a cold December afternoon, and a tall, thin man, with hollow cheeks and sunken eyes, sits in one corner of a first-class carriage talking in a low voice to a companion whose eyes are fixed on the wintry landscape.

"Will you be at St. James's Hall to-night, Lovell?" he asks.

"Of course," the other answers. "Every doctor who can spare the time will be there. Besides, as a friend, I expect to share in your triumph. The world has waited since the beginning of time for this discovery."

An expression of pain flits across the invalid's face, and he presses his hand to his heart.

"Told me! What? For the love of Heaven tell me what you mean."

"It is nothing. Only a sudden spasm," he says, as Lovell notices the movement, and bends forward anxiously. "It has often been like that since my illness."

"Ah, that terrible plague. Do you know, Bellingham, I sometimes think your recovery must have been a miracle. No one else has ever recovered from that disease. Perhaps it was that you were reserved to bring your great discovery to perfection. The papers were filled with long accounts of your self-sacrifice, your name was in every mouth, you had already been placed on that pinnacle of fame which you occupy so worthily, when without a word of warning you recovered."

Once more the doctor presses his hand to his side. He is enthralled by the divinest sweetness of gratified ambition. This very night is to herald the epoch he has made in the science of medicine. This consuming delight is the very elixir of life, and he is able to forget all the miseries of the past if it were not for that terrible pain in his side. An illimitable universe is his at last.

He knows now the secret of his recovery from the very jaws of death. He drank his own poison, which was not strong enough to kill a man. It is only by a mistake that he is not the murderer of his wife.

It seems the very irony of Fate that the weapon with which he tried to kill her had been the very means of augmenting her love. He had used the poison to obtain possession of her money, and it had brought it to him, not through her death, but through his death, or what she thought was death. There is little one would not grant a husband who has been restored to life.

At last the storms of Dr. Bellingham's life seemed ended, and in the bright prospects of the future the dismal past is forgotten, thrown off like some terrible nightmare.

The doctor is already in the vanguard in his profession, and he never allows his thoughts to dwell on the crime he so nearly committed. He balances his good work among the poor of Wentfield, and the greatest discovery of all time against the moral murder which has stained his life.

Dr. Bellingham's name has become a by-word in the country. The noble example which he set in going to live among the plague-stricken people of the little hamlet has filled every heart with admiration.

* * * * *

Two hours later and the doctor stands on the platform of St. James' Hall. The vast room is filled with the members of the medical profession, and some of the leading lights are there waiting in breathless anxiety to have the discovery explained.

At this moment the ambition of his life is fulfilled. A smile parts his thin lips as his eyes run over the thousands of white faces upturned waiting to catch the first words which shall fall from his mouth.

He pours out a glass of water and raises it to his lips. A slight commotion behind makes him start, for his nerves are strung to the very highest pitch, and some of the water is spilt down his shirt-front.

A hand is laid on his shoulder, and he hears Lord Standard, who had promised to take the chair, say:

"Dr. Bellingham, you are wanted just for a minute, please."

He goes behind, and the next moment he is arrested for the attempted murder of his wife.

"On what grounds, may I ask, do you insult me in this way?" he says haughtily, to the detective, whose cold, immovable face drives him to desperation.

The man opens a small black bag in his hand, and draws out some crumpled sheets of note-paper.

Digitized by Google

"This was found last week in the corner of an old barn at Wentfield," he says. "I believe you wrote it."

The doctor half holds out his hands for his confession, and then falls back senseless into Lord Standard's arms.

* * * * *

Ten years of penal servitude is a worse punishment than death to a man of education and acute refinement.

At times during those long years of imprisonment Dr. Bellingham felt his mind was tottering to its fall.

As a doctor, he knew only too well that brooding and thinking would inevitably drive him to madness unless his thoughts took some definite shape. It is impossible to appreciate the depth of his absorbing despair, which threatened to cloud his intellect for ever. For the second time the cup of his ambition had been dashed from his lips as he essayed to drink. It was only by dwelling on the details of his discovery, and bringing them to greater perfection, that he managed all the time to keep his mind employed.

He was utterly cut off from any glimpse of the outer world, but the thought of his ultimate success made those years in a living tomb more bearable. Hope was strong within him, and buoyed him to the last. A sense of future power made life still worth living, and the rapid development of fresh knowledge made those grim walls less terrible.

* * * * *

At last the dreary years are ended. The doctor, a mere shadow of his former self, is free to climb again the ladder of fame from which he had fallen, and by virtue of his great discovery, to regain his place in the respect of the world.

"Lovell," he says, as he and his friend are in the train travelling homewards, "do you think there is any chance of the world listening to me now?"

All the colour fades out of Lovell's face and leaves him white as death. He looks closely at his friend and then lays one hand on his knee.

"Have you not heard?" he whispers. "Have they not told you?"

"Told me! What? For the love of Heaven tell me what you mean?"

It is some time before Lovell can answer. His heart is beating so fast that he cannot trust himself to speak.

"Can you bear a great shock?" he asks at last, as he makes up his mind it is best to let the doctor know the whole truth at once.

Dr. Bellingham does not answer. His head is thrown back on the cushion of the carriage and his lips are bloodless.

He has just read from his friend's face that his great discovery has been made by another, and has already been given to the world. The new era in medical science had dawned while he had been paying the penalty of his crime in prison.

Another moment and they arrive at their destination. The Doctor lays his hand on Lovell's arm.

"I don't think much of ambition," he says slowly, and with a little catch in his voice. Lovell lets down the window, and turns the handle of the door.

"Ambition. It is nothing to do with ambition," he answers. "It is your methods which have ruined you. First vivisection, and then—but why these gloomy thoughts? See, your wife is waiting on the platform for you. I'll see you again later."

A SWEET ROMANCE.

"This night," exclaimed Don John de Balladoux, "I shall know my fate from the beauteous lips of Eleanor. If—as I would fain believe—she returns my love, and answers me 'Yes,' then it is bliss unutterable, I shall be the happiest man on earth; if the answer is 'No,' then indeed I am undone. But she shall never know what a wound she has given me. I will school my features that they betray me not, and, going from her presence, I will, in some distant land, end a life that will be no longer worth living."

* * * * *

The shades of evening had fallen upon hill and dale. Lady Eleanor sat at the grand piano, gently caressing the keys, which, under the witchery of her touch, seemed to sob forth the accents of love. She was thinking of Don John, whose name was sweeter to her even than the caramel that was even now nestling within her lovely mouth.

Suddenly in the hall she heard the well-known step, and her heart gave a great bound. Then the voice of a menial at the door announced "Don John de Balladoux!"

A look of earnest purpose was in his eyes, and alternate lights and shades of hope and fear flitted over his features, as he advanced and greeted the fair lady. To his greeting she made no reply.

"Why thus silent, Lady Eleanor? Am I not welcome?" he asked, in a voice full of apprehension.

A troubled look in her eyes, and a sorry smile upon her lips was the enigmatical answer.

"I have come," said Don John, growing suddenly bold, "to ask you, Eleanor, to be my wife. I have long loved you; do not tell me I have misread your feelings towards me—you reciprocate my passion, you will be mine?"

Lady Eleanor looked confused, but remained silent.

"What! You answer me nothing? Ah, it is the overwhelming joy of the moment that forbids utterance. Is it not so?" and Don John advanced and grasped her white hand in his.

"Speak to me, dearest. Say something, I cannot endure this suspense!"

Her lips moved and again the troubled look came over her face, but she spoke no syllable. Don John dropped her hand.

"You do not love me or you would at least say one word to tell me so!"

Still she spoke not.

"Enough!" exclaimed he, for his Norman blood was up. "This is meant for silent contempt. I understand. It is enough. I leave you for ever. Farewell!"

So saying he strode from the castle and disappeared in the gloom. Lady Eleanor stood as one paralysed for a brief space, and seemed to be struggling with her emotions. Then with a shriek that rent the night air she flew to the door, and screamed—

"Come back, Don John de Balladoux! I do love you!"

Too late, alas! He had gone for ever. In a distant clime he died without knowing that it was a gummy caramel and not a false heart which held Lady Eleanor silent on that fateful night.

Chivalry versus Love.

A VERY large proportion of my weekly budget of correspondence comes from those who are stranded 'twixt chivalry and love, and I am asked on all hands to make the awards in such cases. Thus R. D. J. is perplexed as to whether it would be chivalrous in a man to marry a woman who was of late the lady-love of a friend. Now, I think, in this case, chivalry must take second place, on the grounds that the happiness of one is better than the misery of both.

If a man is deeply in love with a girl who was lately his friend's sweetheart, and his love is returned, it would be cruel to allow even such a thing as good fellowship to interfere with their mutual happiness. The friend must, of course, be very much piqued at seeing his late sweetheart pass into another's hands, and if that other is his own friend, we know the jealousy must be intensified. But I have an idea that the disappointment of jealousy is better than the disappointment of despair, and if you can substitute the one for the other, you are doing an unconscious service.

Here is a case which occurs to me. An old friend of a male cousin of mine had been disappointed over a girl, but remained on visiting terms with her people. At one of these visits he took my cousin, who fell desperately in love with the girl himself, and she returned the sentiment. Now this would seem very hard indeed on the original lover, but, as a matter of fact, it was the best thing that could happen. For a long time he had been one of the most miserable of men, pining over his disappointment. Directly he saw his friend's success, he became mad with jealousy.

Instead of moping about he suddenly left the country, scarcely exchanging a word with his friend and rival. Six months after, my cousin met a bronzed and jovial-looking man in the Strand, whom with some difficulty he recognised as this friend. He had, it turned out, gone abroad, and by the distractions of work and travel absolutely forgotten the whole affair, and told my cousin that he had done him the best turn a man could do—i.e., to make him mad with jealousy instead of gloomy with despair.

Why Not Friendship?

"PERPLEXED MIND" is one of those young ladies who combine a good deal of sense with capriciousness. She is sensible because she thinks she knows in her own mind that she does not, and never could, love a certain young man who persists in writing to her and asking her to meet him. She is capricious because, instead of telling him so, she, so to speak, plays "ping-pong" with her appointments with him, turning up whenever she feels inclined, which is not often. He never feels hurt about it, but goes on writing letters, which grow nicer every time. What can she do?

Does it very much matter, "Perplexed Mind," whether you feel you could love him or not? If you like him as a friend, and he has not openly made any proposal to you, there is no need for you to be unkind to him by trifling with his feelings. I know a girl who received just such attention from a young man, for whom she boasted that she did not care a straw; but he was nice and agreeable, and also wrote nice letters.

She often used to meet him, and for a long time looked on him simply as a friend. One day, after a year or more of this, he hinted by a little present that he loved her. She was astonished at the revelation, but made no reply. But as time went on, and the hints grew more pointed, she began to think of him as more than a mere friend and—well, it took a long time maturing, but they are now one of the happiest wedded couples I know. Try doing the same, "Perplexed Mind."

The Eternal Parent Question.

I AM surrounded by letters from readers putting forward new aspects of the great parent problem. From Spain, SEBASTIAN, a young Spaniard, sends me a pathetic letter beseeching me to help him. He is in love with a girl who returns it, but neither his parents nor hers will allow them to meet, saying they are too young. There appears nothing for them to do but deceive their parents by meeting in secret, by which there is risk of trouble. J. C. (Paddington) is in similar straits, and wants to approach a girl's father, but is fearful, and uncertain how to proceed.

Let SEBASTIAN and J. C. try, if they can, and get rid of the idea that fathers are a race of tyrants. They have been painted that by innumerable story writers, I know, but I know many fathers, one very intimately, and do not think they are really such black fiends. Fathers, after all, love their daughters, and if, after a lot of example, they see that they really are attached to any man, they must give way.

If SEBASTIAN is not allowed to meet his love in the moonlight, let him do so at noonday. Let him always walk in the same thoroughfares as she, go to the same places, and let those two parents see that there is no secret made of the glorious fact that they love each other. And let J. C., if he is afraid to face the fearful father, write to him telling him that he loves his daughter, stating what his means are, and if he is in a position now, or in the near future, to give her a good home. If he is, then I say he must be a unique father if he stands in the way. Courage, my good friends, is what you want.

EDWARD FARRELL CHEMIST

By Philip Moon.

V.—THE RARE MINERAL.

THE task seemed simple, and Edward Farrell failed to understand the difficulty that the Mint authorities had experienced.

He was examining a coin that was one of a number he had received from the Mint.

They were counterfeit, but so cleverly and skilfully had they been produced that it was a matter of extreme difficulty to distinguish them from the genuine coins of the realm.

There was some strange property about the alloy used by the counterfeiters that gave the coins—although undoubtedly of base metal—all the characteristics usually associated with "the king of metals" itself.

This fact, together with the skilfulness of the imitated design, had enabled the producers to pass with impunity an enormous quantity of the counterfeit coins upon an unwitting public.

The operations of the gang had become so extensive that the Mint authorities were really seriously alarmed. Do what they would the Scotland Yard people appeared absolutely unable to get upon the coiners' track.

The banks all over the country suffered largely and complained bitterly. First in London, then in Liverpool, and yet again in Newcastle, the spurious coinage appeared, and in no case could the anxious detectives find any trace of the criminals.

The coins upon examination at the Mint proved a fruitful source of mystery.

Apparently they were nothing but a carefully proportioned alloy of copper, lead, and tin—yet strangely enough none of the analyses would balance as they should do.

Neither could a similar alloy be formed from the estimated proportions of the several metals. No explanation of the mystery was forthcoming, and at the instigation of Inspector Roberts, of Scotland Yard, Edward Farrell was consulted.

As he stood in his laboratory and looked at the piece of metal in his hand, he wondered whence all the difficulty could arise.

The examination of an alloy should be one of the simplest operations in quantitative chemical analysis—yet all the experts at the Mint had acknowledged themselves baffled.

It was strange, certainly—and was eminently a task to Farrell's liking, though he half feared that the difficulty would survive even a casual examination.

He settled down to work upon the coin, however, and began, by the wonderful agents and schemes of present day chemistry to resolve his alloy into its simple elements.

The hours passed. Groups and sub-groups—black precipitates and white ones—vile smells and biting acids, followed each other in orthodox succession, and at last Farrell's labour was about to yield up its secret.

When the last washing was done, the last weight recorded, and the last calculation made, Farrell quickly totalled up his results.

Strange! His results no more balanced than did those of the Mint. He knew that most carefully had he separated and weighed each element, yet here was an unaccountable difference.

Whence could it arise?

He paced slowly up and down the room, then sank into his chair—lost in thought.

For at least half an hour he scarcely moved; then, all at once, as a sudden thought struck him, he sprang up, and hastily picked a volume from the book-shelf.

"That's the secret of it all—I'll wager," cried he. "We must remember that science may lend its aid even to counterfeiting nowadays."

He eagerly hunted up some information in the book he had selected, and then turned to his alloy once more.

Again the hours passed, with their succession of precipitates, smells and acids, but an observant spectator would have noticed that this time one more weight was recorded—one estimation more was made than in the previous examination.

In short—another element had been separated.

Again Farrell totalled his results, and this time they balanced exactly.

"Just as I thought," said he, with a gleam of satisfaction, "but it's pretty smart, whoever they are, and, by Jove!" continued he with a start, as an idea flashed upon him. "Their smartness may lead to their detection.

"Yes," concluded he, after a thoughtful pause, "it's worth trying."

His examination had taken him until well in the night, and in the morning he called on Inspector Roberts, of Scotland Yard.

"I have examined the coin you sent me from the Mint," Farrell began after the usual greetings, "and it has yielded a somewhat remarkable result. In fact, the very source of the difficulty experienced by those at the Mint, appears, to me likely to lead to the detection of the coiners."

"Indeed!" said the inspector, with surprise, he had expected Farrell would overcome the difficulty that the others had experienced, but that he should be able to trace the coiners themselves seemed never to have entered his mind. "Indeed! And may I ask ——?"

"No!" interrupted Farrell, with a quiet laugh, "You may not just now. I will see what my inquiries of to-day result in before I offer any explanations. What I really called for was to ask if you will send me some men, if I get on the track of the coiners and find I need help. I will wire, or contrive in some way to let you know particulars."

"Certainly!" replied the half incredulous and still curious inspector. "As many as you like, and let's hope you need them—although it seems too good to be possible—this gang has eluded our sharpest men."

"Well, well! we'll see," said Farrell, still with his quiet, confident smile. "In the meantime I should be obliged if you will let me see a directory."

The inspector brought the directory, and Farrell pored for a few minutes over its pages. He wrote down two or three addresses in his pocket-book and then, bidding the inspector adieu, departed.

Inspector Roberts was a smart man in his way, and he noticed that Farrell looked at that portion of the directory that gave the names of the different mineralogists in London. This, however, only added to his wonder, instead of satisfying his curiosity.

Edward Farrell, as soon as he left Scotland Yard, hailed a cab, and gave the driver an address near Holborn.

This proved to be a small, unpretentious-looking shop which bore the legend of "Anthony Carr, dealer in rare minerals" on its facia board.

As Farrell entered, the proprietor rose from a small table, at which he was engaged in sorting specimens, and came forward.

"I want to know," said Farrell, "if you can supply me with a quantity of the rare mineral called ariumite?"

"Ariumit! I am afraid not," replied Carr, with something of surprise in his tone, and then, as a half apology, he continued, "It is strange what a demand there has been for the last few months for a rare mineral that was scarcely ever heard of before."

"A demand for ariumite?" asked Farrell, in apparent astonishment. "Whoever would want that in any quantity? It isn't used for anything is it?"

"I don't know about that," said Carr, "but Greyson and Co., of Aldgate, have bought up all my supply for the last month or so for a customer of theirs, and are constantly worrying me for more. You see the total available supply is very small at present. It is only found in one or two isolated places in Norway, and only then in small quantities. Perhaps," continued he, "if you could see Greyson, you might get him to arrange with his customer to let you have some of his supply. He is sending a small lot to-morrow, I know, for I have promised him all I have to hand by that time to make it up, so this would be a favourable opportunity."

Farrell had listened to Anthony Carr with scarcely suppressed excitement.

"Thank you for your information," he said, "I will certainly call on Greyson and see what I can arrange with him."

Farrell bade Anthony Carr adieu and went direct from Holborn to the more pretentious premises of Greyson and Co., of Aldgate.

Farrell noticed with a smile of satisfaction that this firm was one whose address he had also extracted from the directory.

He found Greyson to be a genial business man of about forty, and to him he explained what he wanted, and how he had been recommended to him by Anthony Carr. Greyson listened in silence.

"I am afraid it is hopeless," he said, when Farrell had finished. "My customers are so extremely anxious to get all the ariumite they can, that I am certain they will never consent to part with any."

"Do you know for what they are using it?" Farrell asked.

"No!" said Greyson, "they are very secret and mysterious about it—some trade process I should imagine—but as they pay me well, I am not at all anxious to find out. I only know they are a small firm of brass founders or something of that sort, and have small works at Stratford."

"You are sending a small lot to them to-morrow, I believe?" said Farrell.

"Yes; about a hundredweight. It represents the total quantity in England at the present time," added Greyson, "so rare is it."

"How do you propose sending it?" Farrell asked.

"By van."

"Well, I want to ask you a great favour. I have reason to suspect that foul play is being carried on by this quiet little firm of brass founders, and I want you to let me take the place of your carter to-morrow, so that I may carry the box of ariumite to them myself. I am investigating the case on behalf of Scotland Yard," added Farrell, suggestively.

That decided it. Greyson had at first seemed to look upon Farrell's request with suspicion, but the mention of Scotland Yard quickly put a different complexion on the matter, and he agreed for him to go readily enough.

"I suppose if anything really is wrong, it will stop my sale of ariumite," Greyson said rather ruefully, "I was getting such a good price for it too. Well, I suppose it can't be helped."

"What time shall I be here to-morrow?" asked Farrell, without appearing to notice Greyson's regrets.

"Well, if you are ready by five o'clock in the afternoon that will be plenty soon enough," said Greyson, "for they want the ariumite delivered about seven, and that will allow you ample time. They always arrange for the mineral to be delivered rather late."

"All right!" said Farrell. "I will be here by five. Thank you for your information. Of course you will keep this conversation quite secret, and now—till to-morrow—good-bye!"

* * * * *

Punctually at five o'clock Farrell presented himself at Greyson's warehouse, arrayed in the humble garb of an ordinary London carman.

After he had received his instructions and seen the box of precious mineral safely stowed on his van, he mounted the box, and started on his mission.

The experience was a novel one, and more than once he called forth the good-natured banter of his passing brother vansmen by his awkwardness.

He did not take long, however, to grow more used to his position, and eventually, after a few inquiries, he reached the works of "John Smith and Co., brass-founders," as they called themselves on the entrance-gate. The works were small, and stood upon the edge of the bleak Stratford Marshes, near to the main line of the Great Eastern Railway. They were approached by a narrow, winding, and very muddy lane, at the extreme end of which they stood. As the pseudo carman drove slowly along, his keen eyes took in most carefully all the details, although an onlooker would have thought him too intent on guiding his horse to have eyes for anything else.

It was just beginning to grow dusk as he rang the yard bell at the closed gates, and no one came for some time in answer to his summons. Presently, however, after another ring, and a further pause, a little wicket was shot back, and a sullen-looking man asked impatiently what Farrell wanted.

"Got a box for yer, guvnor—from Greyson's," Farrell replied, in a gruff and typical carman's voice.

"Oh, that's it, is it?" said the man behind the wicket, in a smoother tone. "All right, drive in here and plank it down," and he opened the gates for the van. Farrell drove his van in and started to walk the horse down the short road towards the building at the other end of the yard. He was soon stopped by a man at the gate, however, who shouted out suspiciously—

"Here! Hold on there, mate—I want the box at this end of the yard—not that."

So Farrell obediently stopped his horse, and helped the man off with the box.

"Rather precious sort of stuff, ain't it, guvnor?" he hazarded. "They take a sight o' care on it up at our place."

The man again looked suspiciously at Farrell, but replied tentatively, "Yes, it is rather, I suppose."

"Where do yer want it taken to? Can I give yer a lift?" asked Farrell, "it's pretty weighty fer one."

"No, you can't," snapped out the other, losing his patience, "I've got a couple more to help me, so you can just back your horse out and get home to your tea. Here's the price of a pint for you."

"Thank yer, guvnor. Good-night," said Farrell, with gruff cheeriness, and he departed with his horse and van.

Although he had been fully occupied with his van and the box, he had, nevertheless, made a most careful scrutiny of the yard and its surroundings. Whatever he had gathered from his hasty survey seemed to have impressed him considerably.

When he reached the High Street, at Stratford, he found a quiet stable-yard at which he left his horse and van, and went to a telegraph office and dispatched a telegram to Scotland Yard.

"Send six men by 8.10 train Liverpool Street to Stratford—armed.—Farrell."

His next visit was to the district Police Station, and from there he went to the nearest restaurant and enjoyed a hearty tea.

After tea he went to the station to meet the men he had telegraphed for. When they arrived he found that Inspector Roberts had himself accompanied them. He was not so incredulous now, but was most hopelessly mystified, and wanted to see for himself Farrell's coup. Farrell rapidly explained what he wanted them to do, and led the way through the streets towards the marshes.

He had noticed that the premises of John Smith and Co. could be approached from the marshes on one side without the chance of being seen or heard by anyone within, and it was towards that side that Farrell was leading. It was dark and bewildering on that dreary old marsh, but Farrell never faltered or strayed. He brought them up to the works wall with unerring precision. He gave them all most careful instructions, posted one man on each side of the works with orders to shoot down anyone attempting to escape, and then with the rest noiselessly scaled the low wall, and crept down the yard towards the building at the end.

Evidently someone was at work in the building, for lines of light could be seen through the cracks and crannies of the shutters—while from the chimneys a series of bright sparks were ascending as from a foundry fire.

At a signal the man stationed on the gate side of the works rang the yard bell loudly, according to special instructions Farrell had given him.

As its clanging note rang out, a hurried scuffling of feet could be heard within, whilst a voice Farrell recognised as belonging to his friend of earlier in the evening, could be heard exclaiming:

"Who on earth's that, I wonder? Cover the dibs up and I'll go down and see. It's someone come to the wrong show I should think."

Then two other voices were heard, and after that the sound of bolts being withdrawn.

As the door slowly opened, Farrell and the others burst in, and before the astonished inmates knew where they were, they found a revolver at each of their heads, and Edward Farrell, in his carter's disguise, surveying them exultantly.

The men were completely trapped and had no chance of resistance. Farrell's carefully arranged plan had worked without a hitch.

Farrell gave a shrill whistle which brought up all his men from their posts, and about a dozen policemen who had been hiding a little lower down the lane, in accordance with Farrell's arrangements at the District Police Station.

Into their hands Farrell resigned the bitterly reviling prisoners.

A search revealed a large number of counterfeit gold coins in all stages of their production, together with dies, metal, and a complete counterfeiting plant, while the ariumite that Farrell had delivered in the afternoon had already been partly used.

It was indeed a splendid capture—one man proved to be a chemist of some considerable skill, another a clever mechanician, and the third a man whose name had been heard more than once in financial circles—the three forming a formidable and most unscrupulous combination.

Inspector Roberts was elated, but still mystified—and at last, on the way home, he said—

"I see you have really captured these fellows, but I can't for the life of me see what connection there is between your laboratory and these out-of-the-way works."

Farrell smiled softly. "I will explain," said he.

"When I first analysed the alloy I had the same difficulty as our friends of the mint; the results would not balance.

"This could only come from the presence of some element that I had not separated by my method of analysis—a rare metal of some sort.

"This upon examination I found to be the case.

"The alloy from which the coins are produced contains a small but appreciable percentage of arium, and it is to the presence of this trace of arium that the extraordinary characteristics of the alloy are due.

"Now it is a well-known fact that the total available amount of ariumite—the rare mineral from which the metal is obtained—is very small, and it was very certain that the coiners, whoever they were, would have to ransack the market to obtain enough of this rare element that was so essential to their success.

"If, therefore, I could in any way find out who had lately been purchasing ariumite in any quantity, I opined that I should probably be very easily able to identify them with your troublesome coiners.

"My first visit after leaving you yesterday was to Anthony Carr, a mineralogist of Holborn, and I there found that someone had been buying ariumite, but through the medium of another firm, Greyson and Co., of Aldgate.

"Under the pretence of wishing to buy some ariumite I next visited them, and from them found that their customers were a rather mysterious firm of brass-founders at Stratford.

"They were sending a parcel of ariumite to-day, so I revealed my identity, and arranged with Greyson to let me take the mineral to them myself in the guise of a carter.

"I saw enough when I reached the works this afternoon to confirm my suspicions, and then—well, the rest you know."

NAME HUNTING COMPETITION: RAILWAY STATIONS.

1st Prize: £25.
2nd Prize: £10.
3rd Prize: £5.

Special Prize for Ladies. A six-guinea costume, which the winner may have made anywhere and send the bill to us.

In the event of ladies winning the first cash prize, the Special Prize will go to the lady next most nearly correct. Should gentlemen win the first cash prize, the Special Prize will go to the lady most nearly correct. In the event of a tie it will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

On the next column will be found thirty sets of words, each set describing the name of a railway station in the United Kingdom, the name of which will be found in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

Write down in the spaces provided the names of all those places you can discover. If you can't find all, put down as many as you can.

Note These Facts. . .

1. Names must be written in ink.
2. Only one name is allowed against each set of words.
3. When you have filled up your list, cut it out and get a copy of Pearson's Weekly dated March 20th, in which another coupon appears.
4. You may send in as many sets of lists as you like, but each set will be accepted independently, and must be pinned together.
5. In the event of the prize being divided, only one share will go to each successful competitor, no matter how many duplicate attempts he may send in.
6. No competitor may receive the assistance of professional competition solvers whose advertisements appear in the Press. Every person who enters for this competition must do so only on this understanding, and those selected as winners may be asked to satisfy us that they have not contravened this condition.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the reader from whom we receive coupons containing the greatest number of correct solutions. The second prize will be given to the sender of the next most nearly correct solutions, and so on. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor, whose decision is final.

The prizes are all offered by Pearson's Weekly.

A Lovers' Quarrel.

He thrust his hands into his pockets. She envied him his ability to do so, but compromised by twisting her fingers tightly together behind her back.

From her standpoint she felt that things never could be the same again. It wasn't that she blamed him for caring because she had seen too much of Tom Wells. She had rather enjoyed his jealousy at first.

She liked to see him standing by, clenching his hands and growing pale, because she knew that it was all because of love for her. But when the battle was finally on, when he had got her alone and come to the point, things changed. Instead of having him at her mercy, he, in some way, seemed to have her at his.

"There now, little girl, it's all over, and we might as well kiss and make up. I know you were thoughtless. You didn't mean to hurt me by your flirting with that little, insignificant schoolboy, so we'll forget all about it. Come, lift up your head, Trix, and——"

Trix did lift up her head, but Ewing stepped back, all at once realising that the lips weren't quite so coaxingly sweet as usual. Her chin seemed to have lost its dimple; her eyes might have been hard if there had not lurked in them a trace of hurt pleading. But her voice was very calm and even as she answered slowly:

"You seem to forget that I may have something to say about whether or not you will kiss me; also you don't seem to remember that you yourself left college only last June, just a year ahead of this other little insignificant schoolboy.

"I am almost afraid," she went on, taking on a superior tone of condescension, as though the new feminine ideas were really rooted in her dear little soul—"I'm almost afraid that men who have broad shoulders and have won questionable fame in a brutal football team when at college, somehow grow to let their physical power dominate their motives as well.

"Mr. Philip Ewing, you can't carry me before you just because your arms are strong. A woman admires fine proportions in a man, but not after he betrays that his muscle and brawn are mightier factors in his life than gentle manliness. To think about it, I don't know but I prefer Mr. Tom Wells' lack of stature, with its attendant abundance of honour and honesty, to Mr. Philip Ewing's six feet of pompous stubbornness."

She was frightened at herself, for she hadn't meant to say so much, but when she had begun she could not find a place to stop. Then, too, she rather enjoyed seeing him wince, and when he drew in his breath with a quick start of pain at her fling at his "questionable fame," she was goaded on by an irresistible power to show him, once for all, that she wasn't going to be wax in his hands.

She was too angry to consider. Pride had overpowered her love, and as she went on the big fellow only looked at the tiny fury in speechless amazement, crushed, hurt, astounded at her sarcastic deluge.

At last she finshed. He bowed his head as if to go and then turned, holding out the dear, strong arms, where she would have given worlds to creep if only she could have done so without a sacrifice to her pride, and all he said was:

"Beatrice, for Heaven's sake, don't make this mistake. Remember, dear, that you once loved me; that I was the first man you loved; that you were the first girl I loved. You can't go to someone else. I won't let another man have you and kiss you and tell you things I have told you."

But this tiny embodiment of the new woman's determination to teach man his place set her teeth and only smiled at him—smiled just as amusedly as he had smiled at her in the beginning of the little dispute which now had reached such alarming proportions.

Poor Philip stood and waited, holding out his empty arms, and she merely smiled. So he turned and went, but the new woman received a terrible shock the instant the door closed behind him, for Miss Beatrice threw herself on a mountain of cushions and indulged in a deluge of good salt tears.

There was that tea that very afternoon where she was going to pour. It would never do in the world not to go, for the girls must never dream that she cared, but she choked again as she remembered that he had promised to drop in near the end with a few of the men. And she knew what that meant, for had he not "dropped" in every afternoon during the season, ostensibly to have her hand him a cup of tea?

And hadn't he learnt to bring enough of the other fellows with him to keep the rest of the girls busy, so that he and tiny Bee could have their little talk all alone? In fact, it was at the end of the big, bewildering reception at which her mother had introduced her at the beginning of the winter that he had first dared to tell her his love—there, when the few last guests were lingering in the hall and she had crept back to one of the farther tables, a little, flushed, weary maid in a quaint, snowy gown, a bud already beginning to tire of the fierce light beating on her dear, dazed head.

She never afterwards could remember just how it came about, but it began when his sleeve caught on some of the shining bits of silver among the ferns before her, and—and—well, she was crying softly on his shoulder in less than a moment, both of them so oblivious of everything else that they didn't wake till mamma stood before them with a startled cry.

Then they had to tell mamma, even before they had really told each other very much, but papa liked Phil's father, so it had come out all right in the end.

They had told everybody by this time, and the society columns had printed the date of their wedding, with a list of the bridesmaids, and she had ordered the beloved gown, with its frightfully long train and its stern air of severe matronly elegance.

And now there wouldn't be any wedding at all, and the girls would give back the pretty pearl hearts she had presented to them as her attendants, and mamma would be so ashamed of her that she would probably be sent abroad for a year or two.

That wouldn't amount to much, however, as it would take her away from Philip, and of course she must learn as soon as possible to bear the parting. Did it take long to mend a heart? she questioned, in the midst of the big, wet pillow.

Why was it women ever were made to care so much for men if men were so cruel? Of course it was all Philip's fault.

He had certainly never been in earnest with her, she supposed, and took this way to show it when he grew tired of her. Well, she would show him that women can be hard, too, and she was going to begin by breaking every masculine heart at that tea that afternoon.

"For," mused this desperate little girl, as she arrayed herself with feverish skill in the lovely new gown sent home that very morning, "I used to be glad I am pretty because Philip—no, Mr. Ewing—liked it. Now I am glad because I know it will make me all the more capable of hurting him just as he has hurt me."

Everybody marvelled at Miss Lane's vivacity, and Tom Wells fairly tingled with joy at the look she gave him when she dropped the tiny sweet cubes from her tongs into his fragile cup. But when the other guests were gone to the cloak-room and the men were waiting to escort their fluffily-clad charges to the carriages, Beatrice sat alone and forgotten.

Philip was late, and he strode past the men into the drawing-room and soon had found the table at which Beatrice was sitting.

And at the moment when she looked up to see him standing before her, with his fine head bowed, and such a cruel, white line about his lips, all she could do was to hold out her hands.

Philip took them.

"It was all my fault," she breathed.

"No; it was all mine," he whispered. Then he went on, looking into her eyes with his face strangely sad and determined:

"It has been a terrible lesson, my love, and one we must never try again. Perhaps this may not have done much harm, except"—and his voice grew husky—"there will always be that little rift in the lute. I had hoped we should never have had that to regret, but it came, and we must use it as a warning. Hasn't it been terrible enough, Beatrice, to keep us from it for ever? "Don't say it hasn't!"

Their hostess found them both so worn and yet so happy that she understood without a word.

"Come with me," was all she said, and, taking them each by the hand she led them back to a dear little room, all palms and blossoms and soft, rosy lights, and there she left them, saying, as she stole away:

"Beatrice hasn't been well or happy this afternoon, and she is all worn out now. Do you know, Mr. Ewing, that, when I am tired and heartsick, there isn't anything in the world which rests me and makes me glad so much as my husband's kiss?"

ARTHUR ANSTELL.

She was a Victim.

"You astonish me, madam! I never should have suspected you of being a smoker of cigarettes." "I never touch them, doctor." "Why, I understood you a moment ago to say you were a victim of the cigarette craze." "I am, my husband smokes them."

Auntie had been Nursed.

AUNTIE: "You must run in, Dolly; it is bedtime." Dolly: "But why don't you go to bed, too, if it's quite time?" Auntie: "I am not a child, my dear. It is different." Dolly: "Yes, you is a child—I've seen Mr Jones nursing you."

The Husband Scored.

HUSBAND: "I am not ready to go out yet." Wife: "But I am, and we must go immediately." Husband: "But, my dear, your hat is not on straight." Wife: "Dear me! Isn't it? Wait a minute till I go to my room and put it right." Exit wife for half-an-hour, and shrewd husband completes his work.

Her First Chance.

AN extremely bashful and submissive young lady, who was being forced into a marriage against her inclination, because her guardian expected to make a good thing out of the transaction, presented herself at the hymeneal altar. "Wilt thou take this man to be thy wedded husband?" inquired the clergyman. "My good sir," replied the young woman, "you are the first person who has consulted me about this marriage."

THE Associated Bank Affair.

Being an account of the luck attending another enterprise of the "Montague and Fitchett Syndicate"; and of the part Lester Wylde — alias Philip Lester — alias Cyrus Hoffman — played in the business.

CHAPTER I.

A Conversation and its Consequences.

"EDIE!"

"Ye—s!" in a girl's shrill treble, through the half open door of the dressing-room.

"Come here, quick, if you're dressed! I've something to tell you!"

The first speaker, a tall spare, sallow-faced, but keen-eyed man of two or three-and-thirty, was conning with much apparent interest, the front advertisement sheet of the Times, at the waiting breakfast-table in the sitting-room of a private suite at the Hotel Salisbury.

"Well, what is it, Phil?"

She was certainly very sweet and winning, this piquante, petite Mrs. Cyrus Hoffman, of San Francisco.

Her husband evidently thought so, for he laid down his paper, looked up at her, and smiled his satisfaction.

"Well!" she repeated, with just a little frown of impatient curiosity, "Anything good?"

"Very good; if my suspicions are correct—and I think they are. Listen!" And he took up the Times again.

"The Associated Banking Co., Limited, 1001, Strand, W.C. Assets, £2,000,000. Fifteen per cent. allowed on deposits of £5 and upwards, on three months' notice of withdrawal. Twenty per cent. on twelve months' ditto. Interest paid quarterly. Loans from £25 and upwards negotiated on favourable terms. A few founder's shares—paying seventeen per cent.—on hand for disposal. All communications and applications to F. M. MORTIMER, Secretary."

"Well, Phil, I don't quite see!"

"Don't you? I made sure you would. Usually you can see very nearly as far as I can myself; which is a great compliment, my dear!"

"Explain, please."

"Have you forgotten Persia, yet?"

"Persia! What has Persia got to do with a London Bank?"

"Much; if you look at things in the right light. See here, Edie! Who were the dear 'had ones' in our little Persian transaction?"

"Why—why—the Montague man, and—and—"

"Yes?"

"Fitchett!—Mortimer Fitchett—Oh! I think I know now, Phil! You've got an idea that the syndicate is at work again, and that—that—"

"Secretary Mortimer is our old friend Mortimer Fitchett. Quite right! I've more than an idea, I'm sure of it; and as I know that both that gentleman and his partner love me much on the old account, I have a fancy to beat them again at their own game."

"But how, Phil—how?"

"Well, it is impossible to settle on any definite plan yet. One thing is certain, neither of them must know we are in London. As a matter of fact, we shall only remain here for, say, four days, and be in Paris on Sunday. However, I don't suppose (unless they see me, which I will take care they do not) that they imagine I am within a couple of thousand miles of the British Metropolis."

"Is there anything that I can do?"

"Yes; come with me directly after breakfast in the brougham to Coutts' Bank. When I have cashed one of my circular letters on them, I will give you a hundred pounds. This you will take with you (making use of the brougham) to this—this same Associated Bank; open an account in your own name—as a widow—ask to see the secretary, and ply your prettiest wiles to pump him for all he's worth."

"I see."

"That's all right! Now, look smart over breakfast, there's a dear girl; for my fingers are itching to put a spoke in Messrs. Montague and Fitchett's wheel. This time I don't seek to make anything; I just want to see if, like wise men, they have profited by the advice that I gave them in my letter of August last year. That's all!"

"Splendid, Phil! Don't you feel quite virtuous at the bare idea of rendering so great a service to society as the unmasking of these two rogues?"

"Why, yes! It's rather a different matter, this, to our Persian experiment, isn't it? Cyrus Hoffman has other interests than had Lest——"

"S—h! Phil! Walls have ears, and doors key-holes."

"So they have. But I suppose I am getting reckless with prosperity."

"What name am I to use when making this deposit with—our late friends?"

"The one you stopped me from uttering just now; Lester—Mrs. Cyrus Lester, of—well, of the Hotel Salisbury. That address will do as well as any other."

Breakfast over, Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Hoffman carried out their programme to the letter.

Coutts' first; there they parted company. The gentleman, after handing twenty five-pound notes to his wife, seeing her off eastwards, in the carriage, while he, hailing a hansom, drove back to the hotel.

Except a few Americans, the hotel was very empty. One or two county people, up for shopping, or kindred business, being almost the sum of the native contingent.

Hoffman, ever observant, had noticed among the the latter a couple, middle-aged and agriculturally aristocratic, who somehow peculiarly attracted him.

"Sir Arthur Stanesby, Bart., of Stanesby Moat, Lincolnshire, and lady," appeared on the hotel register, and it was not long before, over a cigar, and a bottle of "dry," the former, and Cyrus Hoffman became—conversationally, at least—friendly.

"It is time Edie was back," said Hoffman to himself, as he sat opposite to Sir Arthur in the big bay window of the smoking-room, overlooking the street.

Then, for a brief while, the talk between the two men turned upon stocks and shares and money affairs generally.

"Now," said Sir Arthur emphatically, "you would never guess what it is that has brought me up to town at this dead-and-alive time of the year!"

"No," replied the other, politely acquiescent. "It isn't at all likely; seeing that your private matters are, naturally, a sealed book so far, that is, as I am concerned."

"Just so. But you have made it clear to me, Mr. Hoffman, that you are something of an expert on the subject of money investment; and I am tempted, therefore, to violate good breeding, by asking, on so short an acquaintance, your advice with regard to a contemplated purchase of certain shares in a new financial undertaking, said purchase involving also the deposit at good interest of the remainder of my fortune."

"A new undertaking, Sir Arthur! May I ask particulars?"

"Certainly. Some time ago I had staying with me at Stanesby Moat a friend of my son's, a company director—Captain Montague."

"Captain Montague! That's curious!"—reflectively.

"Do you know him?"

"Well—er—slightly; haven't seen him for some time, though. But go on, please. I am more than interested."

"Ah! Glad I thought to consult you about it. Well, among other things relating to City matters, Captain Montague happened to mention on one occasion that one of the three companies with which he was directorally connected, was the Associated Banking Co., which he assured me was the best investment in the market."

"And you——?"

"I am up in London now to sell out my railway-stock; purchase Associated Bank shares, and to transfer my current and deposit accounts to the latter."

"Sir Arthur, you have asked my advice, and you must not take offence at the bluntness of it. Is this Captain Montague in town?"

"Oh, yes, he is coming here this afternoon to fetch me, and to himself introduce me to the other directors, and to the secretary of the bank."

"And is the sum large that you propose to invest in this manner?"

"A trifle over twenty thousand pounds."

"Now, Sir Arthur! a few hours ago you did not know that I even existed, and you only have my bare word that I am that which I say I am. Assuming, however, that I am sincere, and that my advice is good, will you consent to conduct this transaction with the Associated Bank just according as I shall direct, always supposing that my one object is to do you a good turn."

The baronet for a moment seemed to be taken aback, but soon came to the conclusion that his new friend knew what he was talking about, and really desired to render him a service.

"Well, Mr. Hoffman, it may, of course, appear strange that I should agree to put myself and my affairs in your hands, but I am so confident that you know something that will materially benefit me, that not to do so would be suicidal as towards myself, and an undoubted and direct insult to you."

"Thanks! In the first place, then, receive Captain Montague as you have arranged, and lead him to imagine that you are unable this afternoon to complete the business, but that to-morrow at noon, you will attend at the bank to 'hand over' and to 'receive.'"

"But this almost implies distrust of the captain, and of his company!"

"Let that question rest for the present. After Captain Montague has gone I will let you know how to proceed to-morrow."

At this moment a servant summoned Hoffman away. He hurried to their private sitting-room to find his wife impatiently awaiting him.

"Well?" he queried, excitedly.

"As you thought! I have seen Fitchett, who has so far over-reached himself as to boast to me of a rich new client whom one of the directors hopes to introduce to-day, and who is expected to invest a large fortune in the bank stock, and so on."

"Bravo, Edie! You're a daisy, my girl! We've got them again, as sure as their names are not what they profess to be. Wait a bit, I'm just going downstairs for a minute!"

Two seconds later he joined the baronet again.

"Sir Arthur," he said. "It's the best day's work you ever did when you asked my advice. I apologised to you a while since for being a little free with it, but I've learnt something during the last five minutes, and I say now, that if you want to serve yourself, and at the same time do your duty, as a magistrate and as a good citizen, you must be guided by me."

"Well, but what is it—what is wrong?"

"Only this, Sir Arthur! Captain Montague, his colleagues in the bank, the very bank itself, are a fraud, a delusion, and a snare! I know this, never mind how, but I know this, and the men who are responsible for the swindle know that I know, if there is any virtue in thought transference as between criminal and detective."

CHAPTER II.

The Skeleton in the Bank Cupboard.

Mr. F. M. Mortimer (as prospectus) secretary, manager, and chairman of the board of directors of the Associated Banking Co., Ltd., was ill at ease.

Always of a hungrily-lean personality, he seemed to be more attenuated than ever, while suspicion and apprehension unmistakable gleamed in his ferret-like little eyes.

"What in the name of goodness does this mean? Monty meeting with a put-off! There's something I don't understand! I wish he'd turn up. There wasn't time last night to tell me much, and for aught I know, somebody may call before I've got the strength of things."

It was the morning after Cyrus Hoffman's talk with Sir Arthur Stanesby, and Mortimer (or Fitchett, rather, to give him his right name) sat alone, a victim to unpleasant suspense, by the fire in the board-room.

Shortly after ten o'clock Montague appeared, in much the same frame of mind as his partner.

"Now then!" snarled Fitchett, "just tell me exactly how things stand. I shouldn't be a little surprised if you haven't trumped my card and lost us the odd trick. If you have I'll—well—I'll spoil you for ever doing it again."

"Then why didn't you do the negotiating yourself! Who first got the man and induced him to come up to London, prepared to put his money on our horse?"

"That's nothing to brag about!" replied the other savagely, "if you stop at that and say or do something so rankly idiotic that all you've done goes for nothing, or perhaps worse."

"Now look here," said Montague, his voice ringing mischief, "who made you my 'boss,' and schoolmaster-in-chief? If you'd been in my place you'd have done as I did, and have come out much about the same. I couldn't help the change in the old boy's arrangements, all I could do was to make the best of it, and do my 'level' to keep the game going to a finish."

Fitchett did not answer directly, but sat looking into the fire, and gnawing his finger-nails in nervously meditative fashion.

"Get a Bradshaw!" he snapped out at last, springing up himself, and going over to a big, pretentious-looking safe let into the wall, which he opened with a small key attached to his watch-guard.

"Look slippy, I tell you!" he repeated, and emphasising the remark with an oath, seeing that the other still sat on in sulky disinclination to move.

"Do you want to save your skin, you fool? Can't you see that someone not something has come between us and Stanesby? Quick, turn up in Bradshaw all information re getting to Paris before to-morrow morning—before midnight to-night, if possible!"

While speaking, he was tumbling out the contents of the safe on to the floor; bonds, scrip, notes, little bags of gold, soon lay in a mixed heap, at which Fitchett dashed, cramming his pockets and two small Gladstones, and consigning hands full of papers of all sorts to the flames.

The safe was one of those usual to banks, being in the nature of a large iron cupboard, shelved on its three sides, and with its bottom level with the floor of the room.

Before opening it Fitchett had closed and locked the door communicating with the outer, or public office, where a staff of two cashiers and four clerks was employed in the usual routine of a banking establishment.

"Well!" demanded Fitchett presently, when nothing remained of the safe's contents except a fair-sized heap of ashes on the tiled hearth, and a scattered display of empty money-bags and torn pieces of paper on the floor. "Have you got it? Ordinary train to Folkestone? Yes, that's better than the boat express! Go on, what time does it start? Half-past-eleven! We can just catch it! Where from? London Bridge. You go out first, take a hansom! tell the man to drive like the dickens!—buy the tickets and wait at the train-side for me. It's a quarter to eleven now!"

Hastily unlocking the door of communication, Montague assumed an air of unconcern as he passed through the outer office, hailed a passing hansom, and dashed off as fast as the Strand traffic would let him, in the direction of London Bridge.

Scarcely a minute after another cab drew up before the door of 1001, out of which stepped Cyrus Hoffman and Sir Arthur Stanesby.

It was the latter who addressed a request to the cashier to see the secretary on important business.

It so happened that when Montague passed through, everybody thought that Fitchett accompanied him, the counter being crowded at the time with customers.

"Mr. Mortimer is out, sir," was therefore the reply. "Just gone out."

"When will he be in?"

"I really can't say. Is it anything I can do for you; the opening of an account, or——"

"No," said Hoffman, speaking for the first time. "We will wait a bit on the chance of his coming in soon. We must see him personally."

No one saw the white face of the secretary looking through an ingeniously contrived narrow slit in the door between the panel mouldings.

Not a sound came from the room. To all intents and purposes the cashier was right, and the room empty.

As is very unusual in such cases, there was no second outlet from it, so that, like a rat in a trap, Fitchett could only hope to tire out his beleaguerers.

At the end of half-an-hour, Hoffman, without consulting anyone behind the counter, suddenly moved toward the inner-room door and opened it.

It was a faint click apparently from within, which had caught his ear and prompted his action.

Throwing open the door the disordered state of the room struck him at once as suspicious.

The safe was shut.

Before he could call to Sir Arthur to join him, a clerk hurried forward and remonstrated warmly.

"My good fellow!" said Cyrus Hoffman quietly, "Don't distress yourself, except, perhaps, in that by this time to-morrow you will be out of a situation."

"But——"

"There, there!" interrupted the American impatiently, "Call in a policeman—or two, if you can find them."

It was now the baronet's turn to appear non-plussed.

"My dear sir, what are you going to do?" he asked. "What do you suspect?"

"Oh, just a clever little stage trick, that's all!"

As he spoke Mrs. Hoffman walked into the bank and handed in her cheque over the counter for £100.

This was a bit of business "upon her own," as it were, her husband having given her full permission to get the money if she could, and to keep it for her own private use.

It seemed that no cheques were paid out except on reference to the secretary-manager, and as he was out, payment was, for the time being, refused.

This alone would have been sufficient to "tell the tale," but when an hour later, in the presence of an inspector of police and two constables, a locksmith and his assistant forced the safe in the private room, its inside revealing Secretary Mortimer Fitchett with the whole of his plunder on and at the side of him, the whole affair took on its true complexion.

"A near shave of getting boxed up for good," said the inspector, chuckling. "Never meant to pull the safe door right to, did you? Why, if it isn't Fitchett! There's a piece of paper wandering round after you, my friend; so we'll see if we can't bring you together."

"Inspector, there is my card!" said Sir Arthur, "and I charge this man with attempting to obtain twenty thousand pounds from me by fraudulent representations. Mr. Hoff—— why, where is the gentleman who came in with me," he asked of an open-mouthed junior clerk.

"Went out, sir," was the stammered answer, "just as the smith gave the last prize at the safe."

"That's most extraordinary! Oh, well, I shall find him at the hotel when I get back."

But he didn't, for the porter said in reply to inquiry that Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Hoffman had left the hotel more than an hour before; it was believed for the Continent. They took care to keep out of the way of the police in case their connection with the Great Shah Syndicate might be discovered.

* * * * *

The energetic promoter and secretary of the "Associated Bank" paid, with a term of ten years' penal servitude, the little account between himself and an indignant public.

It was one of the very few accounts he may be said to have ever paid in full.

Small depositors, and defrauded shareholders, alone were left mourning, for though the money found packed ready for removal went a little way towards reimbursement, it was only a very little way, and, although Sir Arthur Stanesby has cause for self gratulation on the score of his lucky escape, not a few who could ill afford to lose their money bitterly regret to this day their temporary faith in the "Associated Banking Co.," and its founders.

Pursued by Savages.

A True Story by a London ex-Constable.

"It's no use, Mary, women do admire brave men, and properly so, too, I think. Now just you read this series of experiences through which this officer passed in the execution of, not his mere duty, but one of the bravest deeds ever done."

So saying, Edith Avondale handed her friend an issue of the morning paper which contained the following sensational statement:—"My name is Alexander Robert Heffernan, and I live at 53 Archel Road, Fulham.

"We—the Heffernan's—are quite a soldier's family. I married a soldier's daughter, and each of my sisters is the wife of a soldier. I was in the North Staffs. Infantry Regiment—better known as "the 64th" for twelve years, and went through the second Zulu campaign, during which, on one occasion, Cetewayo's son, with an enormous army of gigantic black warriors, made us run. It was a good job we did too, for we were fearfully outnumbered, and had we not retreated, there would not have been one of us left alive. However, in the end we came out all right; and in 1891 I came home from Africa, and joined the Metropolitan police force.

"I was always a good athlete. They made me one of the T Division Metropolitan Police Cricket Team the very year I joined. I bowled in every match, usually taking the largest number of wickets, and I made the record number of top scores. The District Railway Cricket Team also used to get me to play for them.

"And how did you come to have to be pensioned off?" queried the reporter. "Ah," replied the ex-constable. "It was all through that affair in the Regent's Canal. It was on the afternoon of February 26th, 1897. I was on duty, when I was told that a man had jumped into the Regent's Canal. Rushing to the place I threw off my overcoat, and dived in to rescue him. The water at that point is made very poisonous by the refuse from the chemical works and the gasworks in the district draining into it, and the chemicals were fizzing and spluttering in the water all around us as we struggled. I was struggling in the poisonous water for twenty minutes. The man cursed me terribly, and continued to try and free himself in order to jump back into the water, even when I got him on the bank. It was some time before I could get my wet clothes changed, and I caught a terrible chill. But that was not the worst of it. The poison had got into my system and the stuff which killed the man I had rescued—for he died a few weeks after from poisoning—nearly killed me too! I began by being unable to digest my food, or even to keep it on my stomach. As soon as I had taken a meal I vomited it all back again. Of course I was placed on the sick list, and the police doctor told me that the poison in the water, which I had swallowed, had completely destroyed the coating of my stomach. The police were very kind to me, and sent me down to the Convalescent Home at Brighton twice. After the second visit I had to go back to my own home very bad indeed. I was so weak that when I attempted to walk I went blind, and had to cling to anything near me to prevent me from falling. I had fearful night sweats, and would often be seized with a kind of cramp, which seemed to be in my very bones. I could not retain food or nourishment, except in minute quantities—just enough to keep me alive

"I next went into Brompton Hospital, and there they declared it impossible to satisfactorily diagnose my ailments. For two years I remained in the police force, suffering in this way, and during the two years I was only able to put in three months' duty. Seeing that I was practically done for, in January 1899, I was given a special pension, and retired from the force.

"I continued to suffer as badly as ever, and went to the Seaford Hospital in Sussex. They gave me every attention but after a month's treatment I came back worse than ever. No matter how tempting and light the food which was prepared, I vomited all I took, and the very sight of food made me sick! I became reduced in weight to just over 10 stone, and I was as weak as a kitten. The vomiting, the pain across the stomach, and in the back, the night sweats and the cramping sensations continued until September in last year.

"In that month I tried some Bile Beans. A few doses made me somehow feel livelier, so I went in for a course, in order to give them a fair trial. By the time I had taken a few boxes I was a different man. The vomiting had stopped, and the dull, aching pain at the pit of the stomach had gone. Every day I got stronger and stronger. The cramp and the night-sweats stopped, the specks and flashes before my eyes disappeared, I became able to walk without needing support, and at night I enjoyed sound, refreshing sleep. To cut a long story short, I am now quite cured. The effects of the poison have been driven out of the system by the Beans and my stomach and digestive organs seem to have been re-made. I have eaten so well that I have gained twenty-one pounds in weight and am still adding to it. For the first time for nearly five years I was able to eat and enjoy a good Christmas dinner.

"Two months ago I was able to restart work as attendant in a picture gallery. For three weeks before Christmas I was at work there from half-past eight o'clock in the morning to half-past eleven at night, Saturdays included, and I did not feel fatigued with it.

"In my case Bile Beans seem to have worked a miracle. Publish my statement by all means, and let as many people as possible know that, amongst all the advertised remedies, there is one which does not depend for its sale on mere written advertisements, but upon living men and women whom it has saved from the grave. My case is one instance of its power, and the medicine is Chas. Forde's Bile Beans."

The above quoted account is true in every detail and was told to a London Sun reporter who interviewed Mr. Heffernan. The great lessons to be learned from it are these: Don't compare Bile Beans with ordinary medicine. They are entirely different and superior. Don't think that, because ordinary prescriptions and remedies have failed to cure a certain case, that Bile Beans will necessarily fail also. Finally, don't think that any case is too bad for Bile Beans to touch.

ASHAMED.

WHY?

False shame is a robber. It takes from us our pleasures, joys, and rightful inheritances, and gives us nothing in return. Is a woman ashamed of desiring beauty or a man of acquiring strength? According to the publishers of Professor Boyd Laynard's great work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE, there are hundreds of thousands of such cases. In a recent interview with the publishers the following statement was made: "It is perfectly astounding the thousands of letters we are receiving from the public requesting us to send Professor Laynard's work privately packed! Of course we have always made a custom of doing so; but why people should be ashamed of receiving such a book is beyond our comprehension and very uncomplimentary to the Professor, who is the greatest living authority upon personal hygiene. But for all this, the sale of his work in the English language is rapidly approaching one million copies. Hindustani and Malayalam are among the latest translations of Professor Laynard's famous book."

A REMARKABLE OFFER.

The publishers have issued a complete edition, at a price within the reach of all, so that the book may find a place in every home. The work is arranged in 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of Short Stories, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

No Chance.

School Teacher (trying to explain what a brother-in-law is): "Now, look here, my boy, have you a sister?" Tommy: "Ah, sir, it's no good, she has three young men already. You wouldn't be in it."

Very Good Reason.

Mrs. Burns has two boys and loves both tenderly. John, the younger, said: "Mamma, I love you more than you do me." "I think not, my dear. But why do you think so?" "Because you have two children and I have only one mother."

Once Bitten!

He (shortly after the introduction): "Excuse me, miss, but do you think you could ever love me if—well—if you should try?" She: "Well, I must say this is——" He: "Oh, don't be offended. It cost me more than £100 to find out whether the last one loved me or not, and I've got to economise, you know."

She Wanted a Copy.

Mistress: "I found in your room a letter of mine that had been taken out of my writing-case. What is the meaning of this?" Cook: "Oh, ma'am, I only wanted to copy it for my sweetheart." Mistress: "What can he want with it?" Cook: "Please, ma'am, he's in the Army, and he doesn't know how to write me a love-letter."

Better Thus.

Miss Saged (to veterinary surgeon): "Oh dear, Mr. Simpkins, I am so afraid dear little Fido is going to have rabies." Mr. Simpkins (after careful examination): "Indeed, miss, I don't see any signs of it." Miss Saged (caressing him—Fido): "But his poor dear little tongue is always hanging out of his mouth." Mr. Simpkins: "That, my dear madam, is in accordance with a merciful dispensation of Providence. You see if it hung out of his ear, he might experience some little difficulty in drinking."

A Use For 'Liza Jane.

It took a shopkeeper in Oxford Street the other day every dram of will-power he possessed to keep from laughing outright at an old lady from the country who came to his establishment and began examining some pieces of cheap calico. She pulled at one piece first this way, then that, wetted it and rubbed it with her fingers to try if the colours were fast. Then she paused awhile, as if not yet satisfied. At last she cut off a piece with a pair of scissors, and, and handing it to a gawky-looking girl of about sixteen standing by her side, said: "Here, 'Liza Jane, you chew that an' see if it fades." 'Liza Jane raised it to her mouth and solemnly went to work.

Only Sheep.

Wealthy Stranger "Yes; and I made my money, every farthing of it, by my pen." Tompkins: "Ah! a novelist, or a dramatist, maybe?" Wealthy Stranger "Not me. I used to keep a sheep farm in New Zealand."

Catching a Husband.

An Austrian provincial paper lately contained the following advertisement: "A widow, who still possesses the entire wardrobe of her deceased husband, is disposed to enter into correspondence with a suitable gentleman, if such can be found, with a view to matrimony."

It Wouldn't Have Done.

"I can't give you any money. A stout, able-bodied fellow like you ought to be earning a living." "But I haven't any work, sir." "That's your own fault, I'll venture to say. You lack energy. You don't throw yourself into your work." "I wouldn't like to! Nor would you, sir." "Oh, I wouldn't, eh? Why not?" "I'm a gravedigger."

They would be Needed.

"Miranda," said the proprietor, "do you know anything about the parson that is going to have charge of the church in the next street hereafter?" "Yes," replied the saleswoman, "he's a tall, fine-looking man, about twenty-eight, and isn't married." "Miranda," said the proprietor, briskly, "you may put all the new bonnets in the shop in that front window at once."

Too Lazy for That.

"I hear that your brother is given to somnambulism?" "What's that?" "He walks in his sleep." "Well, that makes me smile. You don't know my brother. He is the laziest man in London. He wouldn't walk in his sleep, no matter how sound asleep he was. He is altogether too lazy I might not be surprised to hear that he had ridden in a 'bus in his sleep, but as for his walking, that is out of the question. He doesn't walk when he is wide awake if he can help it."

His Advice Wasn't Taken.

"Remember dear," said the venerable father, as he sent his youngest and most petted daughter away to boarding-school, "that all my hopes are now centred on you. Remember in all your struggles for intellectual supremacy, your triumphs, your defeats, and your temptations, that a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." "I will, father," replied the weeping girl, and the train bore her away. Will it be believed that three years later that girl married a man who bore the villainous name of Gandershanks?

ENGAGED GIRLS!

It is always interesting to know other people's opinion of yourself, especially when that opinion is absolutely unbiassed. If you want to know what sort of a person you are, send a specimen of your handwriting to RANEE, 32 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., inclosing six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope.

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.
